Dear Sir,

I much regret that I am unable to obtain any sort of information either about Temple Sydney or his book. There is no mention of them in any work of reference. Our copy is clearly dated 1775, but beyond the fact that we bought it in 1871 there is no note of provenance. I cannot trace the sale of Adel G. Greig.

P U B L I C.

Entertainment and utility are blended in the study of history. We are delighted with the actions of the brave, the prudent, and the virtuous. We sympathize with the sufferings of injured merit, and share the sorrows of innocence in distress. We follow the hero engaged in the cause of liberty to the field, and make his labours, his pains, and his conquests our own. The transactions of former times engage our attention; because we are desirous of being acquainted with the actions of men, who have trod the stage of life before us. Pleased with the entertaining narrative, we imperceptibly increase our knowledge by the experience and maxims of others, without labour and without fatigue.

The first study of an Englishman should be the history of his country: a history abounding with events of the most interesting kind. Here he may trace the progress of liberty from its dawn; the arts and sciences from their cradle; and commerce from its infancy. True courage is here fully displayed; and the achievements of the English are equal at least to any thing performed by the boasted heroes of antiquity. But the pen of faction has disguised many important truths; while that of religious bigotry has magnified crimes into virtues. The hand of partiality has drawn the veil of deception over numerous transactions, and the pencil of envy has delineated, in false colours, the characters of the great, the wise and the virtuous.

Stimulated with a desire of correcting these enormities, and of transmitting to posterity a faithful narrative of the events that have happened in his country, the author undertook this NEW HISTORY OF ENGLAND; and has assiduously laboured to relate every transaction without disguise. His researches have been entirely directed by truth, and his relations dictated by impartiality. Nursed in the lap of liberty, and fearless of the frowns of the powerful, he has exposed oppression though executed by the sceptred hand of royalty, and stripped vice of the flimsy veil that concealed her deformity. He has endeavoured to remove the load of obloquy which slander has heaped upon the worthy, and to place virtue in its genuine light. In a word, he has sincerely endeavoured to present to the world, a faithful and impartial History of England.

In order to this, he has related every fact with candour, clearness and precision. He has avoided, on one hand, that brevity which is too often the parent of obscurity; and, on the other, that prolixity of expression, which enervates narration. Studious to elucidate the principal events in the history of his country, he has endeavoured to withdraw the veil which has long concealed the secret springs of action, and to display the political reasons on which the measures productive of these events were originally founded.

The constitution of England deserves a particular attention. It has long been the admiration and envy of foreigners, and should certainly form one of the great subjects of historical narration. The author has accordingly traced it from its source; and shewn the basis on which the boasted liberties of this country are founded. Nor has the feudal polity, which long prevailed in this island, been neglected: he has endeavoured to explain, with perspicuity, that complicated system, which was productive of so many misfortunes, and so often spread desolation over the kingdom.

Commerce, the genuine source of wealth and power in this country, merits the utmost regard; and the author has endeavoured to trace its gradual progress from its feeble condition under the Roman and Saxon governments, to its present state of perfection. He has been careful to mark every improvement, and to display the advantages flowing from every branch of trade.

The progress of learning in England forms, at once, a pleasing and useful part of the history of this country; and the utmost care has been taken to place it in a conspicuous point of light. Animated with a desire of rescuing from oblivion the memories of those who have laboured for the improvement of posterity, the writer has endeavoured to ascribe every discovery and invention to its real author; to display the merit, and, as far as possible, fix the time when every important acquisition was made.

Through the whole of this performance, the author has assiduously endeavoured to place every transaction in its proper light, to raise merit from obscurity, and to delineate, in genuine colours, the virtues and vices of his countrymen. He has exerted his utmost abilities to merit the attention of the public, and would willingly flatter himself that he has not wholly laboured in vain.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

BOOK I.

From the earliest Accounts of Time, to the final Departure of the Romans.

IT is generally difficult, often impossible, to discover the original inhabitants of any country. The events that happened during the infancy of nations are in time forgotten, or disguised by fable and fiction; a thick cloud of ignorance and error broods over the transactions of early times. The first inhabitants of almost every kingdom were surrounded with difficulties, and exposed to dangers; the whole country being little more than a continued forest, filled with beasts of prey. Rude and ferocious in their manners, their chief employments were hunting and war. They were strangers to learning, and wanted both leisure and abilities to transmit their history to posterity. It is therefore no wonder that the whole is little more than a series of uncertain conjectures, mixed with a few facts, which glimmer thro' the veil of obscurity; but afford too feeble a light to direct the historian in his researches.

These remarks are unfortunately too applicable to the ancient monuments of the history of England. The origin of the first inhabitants cannot be traced with any degree of certainty: a vague and romantic tradition only remains to lead us through the intricate mazes of fabulous times. Some writers indeed have traced the origin of the Britons from Samothres, one of the sons of Japhet; and others from Brutus, the grandson of Æneas; but both these accounts are evidently fictitious, and have been long since exploded. The most probable opinion is; that this island was peopled at various periods, and from various parts of the continent; but it is impossible, at this distance of time, to determine the æra when the first settlement was made. The earliest expedition to this island founded on historical evidence, happened in the reign of Theutat, or Mercury, king of the Celtes, who, about 1860 years before the birth of Christ, sent a colony into Britain, in order to increase the commerce of his subjects. Others followed their example, and spread themselves into different parts of the island. Every family became a separate society; and those who inhabited the inland parts, having no concern with the commerce carried on by their brethren, became in time a distinct people. They devoted themselves entirely to a pastoral life, and wandered from one part of the island to another in search of pasture for their flocks and herds. They envied not the advantageous traffic of their brethren; they desired not to share in the busy scenes of commercial employment. Strangers to the refinements of luxury, their wants were few, and easily satisfied. Hunting and feeding their flocks formed at once their business and diversions.

In their persons they were tall, well proportioned and robust. Their hair, which was generally yellow, flowed loosely over their shoulders: they constantly shaved their faces, except their upper lip, where they suffered the hair to grow to an enormous length. They stained their bodies of a sky-blue colour with the juice of woad, and wore no other covering than the skins of beasts. Their ornaments consisted of coarse paintings of flowers and animals on various parts of their bodies. Enured to all the inclemencies of the weather, to hardships and fatigue, and greatly addicted to hunting, they acquired a degree of fortitude and valour, which even their brethren on the continent, beheld with astonishment. Their agility was surprising, and the dangers they every day encountered among the rocks and precipices of their country rendered them almost strangers to fear.

Honest, hospitable, and sincere, they considered both the persons and effects of strangers inviolably sacred; they thought it an indispensable duty to afford them protection and defence against every insult. Open and generous, they disdained every species of deceit and artifice: manly and brave, they beheld effeminacy and indolence with detestation. Liberty was their darling object, and they made no scruple of sacrificing their lives in its defence. They were so jealous of that noble acquisition, that it was never entrusted in the hands of a single person. Every tribe had indeed a chief, but his authority was at once both limited and precarious. His power was rather persuasive than coercive; he was revered as a father, rather than feared as a monarch. He had no guards, no prisons, no officers of justice; and one act of ill-judged violence was sufficient to pull him from his throne. They were, however, very far from despising all kinds of authority, they were always attentive to the voice of wisdom, which experience has conferred on the aged; and they willingly served under the banners of a chief, in whose valour and military address they had learned to repose their confidence. As a shade to all these virtues, they are charged with unbounded and even incestuous concubinage. But even this declined in proportion, as they became more civilized, and was soon after totally laid aside.

Their habitations were mean huts, sometimes formed of boughs of trees, resembling arbouris, and sometimes of mud and clay, and generally covered with turf. Their towns were nothing more than a number of these huts, irregularly placed at small distances from each other, and situated in the middle of a wood, all the avenues to which were blocked up with felled trees. They often changed the places of their abode according to the different seasons of the year. In summer they generally inhabited the most fertile valleys, as affording the greatest plenty of pasture and water for their cattle, and in the winter they removed to the hills, as being at once more dry and healthy.

While the Britons lived in this state of natural tranquillity, the Belgæ finding themselves greatly streightened on the continent, sent a colony into Britain. They were hospitably received by the inhabitants, and suffered to settle on the coast, where they applied themselves to commerce and agriculture. Struck with the advantages resulting from the latter, the natives applied themselves to cultivate the soil. The increase was prodigious, and bread became the common food of the natives; the first refinement they received from their more opulent neighbours. The success of these foreigners induced many of their countrymen to follow their example, till their number was so greatly increased, and their settlements extended over so large a part of the country, that the natives feared they should soon want pasture for their flocks.

The tranquillity of the island was now destroyed; discord and faction succeeded to peace and unity. Divitiacus, king of the Sueffones, took advantage of the civil commotions of the Britons, landed a considerable army on the coast, and, being joined by great numbers of the Belgæ, inhabiting the maritime parts of the island, penetrated into the heart of the country, and reduced several of the inland provinces, which he garrisoned with Belgic troops. War and devastation now filled the island with blood and slaughter. The smaller tribes unable to defend themselves against the inroads of the enemy, joined with others, and thus seventeen kingdoms, or principalities, were formed in the island; and each governed by an independent chief.

The names of the inhabitants of these principalities, and the counties they included, are exhibited in the following table.

Before the invasion of Divitiacus, the Britons were totally ignorant of all military discipline; they hardly knew an instrument of war. Deficitude of fortifications, they had no other retreat than their mountains, their dells, their forests rendered more difficult by felled trees, and their bogs. Their only arms were sharp-pointed sticks, which they used as javelins, and long poles cleft at one of the extremities to receive a sharp edged flint secured by a band of copper. A bell of the same metal was fixed at the other extremity, with the noise of which they endeavoured to terrify the enemy. But they learned from the Belgæ the use of the sword, the dagger, and the target. They improved the war chariot, which they decorated very superbly, and fixed sharp iron instruments, resembling scythes, to the axles. Their dexterity in managing these destructive chariots was amazing; they drove them with dreadful rapidity through the thickest ranks of the enemy's infantry, cutting down and trampling upon all that opposed their passage. They could stop them in an instant when in full speed, and even on the declivity of a hill, leap from the chariot, run along the pole, and regain their seat, without checking the impetuosity of the horses. When they had penetrated into the center of the enemy, they leaped from their chariots, fought on foot till overcame with fatigue, and then vaulted into their seats. Endowed with uncommon valour and perseverance, and enured to hardships and fatigue, they charged the enemy with a fury scarce resistable by troops not covered with armour. They advanced to the attack with every circumstance that tended to inspire the enemy with terror. They clashed their arms in the most furious manner, raised a dreadful shout, while the hoarse and jarring sounds of uncouth instruments increased the confusion of the wild uproar. The charge was dreadful: the tracks of their chariots were marked with blood and slaughter, and destruction hovered over the field of battle. But their being divided into separate tribes, and governed by different chiefs, gave the enemy an advantage not easily retrieved. They were sensible of this, and endeavoured in some measure, to repair so pernicious a defect in the constitution of their country. When any eminent danger threatened their liberties, the states were assembled, and a general was chosen, who commanded the whole army, and led the combined forces against the enemy. But though he had no equal in command, his power was not unlimited. He was subject to the orders of the assembly. The same authority that conferred, could deprive him of his command; and as soon as the danger was over he resigned the ensigns of his power. A considerable interval of time, however, elapsed, before these precautions could be taken, during which the enemy was too often flushed with victory, and rendered more formidable by success.

Though the inhabitants of the sea-coasts of Britain were addicted to traffic even from the time of Theutat, it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to enumerate all the commodities in which their commerce consisted. It is known that the Phœnicians, even before the siege of Troy, which happened 1190 years before Christ,

Christ, carried on a considerable trade with the western parts of the island for tin, which they sold to other nations; giving the Britons pearls, ivory, silver and gold in exchange. The two former they manufactured, and in that state sold them to the merchants of Gaul. After the Belgæ had introduced agriculture, and extended the commerce of the island, the corn and wool of the Britons furnished valuable commodities, and were purchased with avidity by the traders on the continent. But the islanders were destitute of vessels of burden: the art of ship-building was unknown to the Britons. They had only a few open boats, poorly constructed of wicker, and covered with pitched hides. In vessels so ill adapted to out-live a storm, very short voyages only could be made; the tempestuous seas of Britain were not to be navigated in boats like these. The continent of Gaul was probably the farthest voyage they undertook, and this only in the summer months, and when the weather was calm and serene. Navigation, as well as ship-building, was introduced after the invasion of the Romans.

But though the power of their chiefs was limited and precarious, that of their priests, whom they called Druids, was more absolute and extensive. Their influence in civil affairs was great, and in religious ceremonies absolute and unlimited. They engrossed all the learning of their country, and found their account in continuing the veil of ignorance over the eyes of a superstitious people. Skilled in every art that had a tendency to excite the admiration of an uninstructed multitude, they were revered as something more than mortal, and believed to be inspired with the wisdom of the deity. The education of youth was entrusted to their care, and without their approbation, no criminal could be executed. They were governed by a chief, called the arch-druid, whose power extended to the deposition of kings. He was the supreme arbiter of all disputes, and from his sentence there was no appeal.

Every part of the druidical religion, was calculated to strike the people with the terrors of superstition. Their altars were situated in the dark recesses of some gloomy forest, and human victims were sacrificed to their gods. Their ceremonies were always striking; sometimes dreadfully awful. The knowledge of the druids in astronomy was sufficient for calculating eclipses of the sun, and they always took advantage of these phenomena. The people were summoned to the sacred grove; the arch-druid presided in person; and as soon as the eclipse began, the victims were slain upon the altar. The horror of the slaughter was doubly augmented by the darkness, which the people considered as supernatural. Amidst this scene of complicated distress, the arch-druid, agitated with enthusiastic fury, and his hands reeking with human blood, addressed the gods; and continued his prayers till the darkness was over; when the wrath of heaven visibly appearing to be appeased, he dismissed the people with his blessing.

Persuaded that the powers of nature were entrusted with their druids, and that their prayers were sufficient to call down or avert the wrath of the gods; it is no wonder that an ignorant and superstitious people, almost adored them, and that their power was unlimited. But this power which they gained by art and deception, they used for the noblest purposes. They composed, by their mediation, the civil discords of their country. Their integrity was not to be corrupted; their fortitude and perseverance were uncommon. The great as well as poor trembled at their justice; for neither riches nor power were able to warp the equity of their decisions. Their authority was sufficient to soothe the rage of exasperated armies, when on the very point of engaging. Fearless of the danger, and armed only by their sacred character; they often rushed between the javelins of furious warriors, and calmed the raging storm of contending passions into peace.

The oaks were sacred among the druids; their consecrated groves consisted entirely of those trees; and their branches composed all the ornaments of their altars. The mistletoe of the oak was a peculiar object of veneration, being considered as the choicest gift of heaven. It was annually sought for on the first day of the month in the spring, with great caution and anxiety; and its discovery hailed by the acclamations of the multitude. The arch-druid, dressed in a long robe, ascended the tree, and cropped the mistletoe with a golden pruning-knife. With this sacred acquisition in the skirt of his robe, he descended the tree, and offered a sacrifice to the gods, to implore a blessing on their own gift.

It is not easy, at this distance of time, to discover the religious tenets of the Druids. All we know is that they believed in one supreme God, infinite, immortal and omnipotent; that all things derive their origin from heaven; that the soul is immortal; and that the righteous will be rewarded and the wicked punished in a future life. Their idea of the deity was noble and sublime. They believed his presence filled the universe, his power supported the pillars of heaven, and his eye pervaded the inmost recesses of the heart. "It was, says Tacitus, an opinion universally established in all the countries where the religion of the Druids prevailed, that to suppose the presence of the deity to be confined within any enclosed place, to represent him in an human form, or by any material image, was at once derogatory to his honour, and incompatible with his divine attributes."

A. C. 55. Such were the ancient Britons, and such the religious tenets they professed, when Cæsar, after subduing the Gauls to the Roman yoke, meditated the conquest of their country. Animated with the desire of extending the glory of his arms beyond the boundaries of the ocean, he determined to transport his victorious legions into this unknown country: the conqueror of Gaul must also triumph over the armies of the Britons. He pretended, indeed, that the Britons had assisted the Gauls against the Romans; and that they had given refuge to the Belgæ, who had excited a revolt. This was considered as a sufficient reason for hostilities, it having been long a maxim with the Romans to chastise all who had in any manner assisted their enemies.

But whatever was the motive that excited Cæsar to engage in this expedition, it is certain that he took every precaution to insure success. He sent Volusenus in a single ship to survey the British coast, and obtain all the intelligence he could with safety. At the same time, he dispatched Comius, a Briton by birth, but a creature of his own, as ambassador to his countrymen, to persuade them to form an alliance with the Romans, and put themselves under the protection of the conqueror of Gaul. Both these attempts were rendered abortive. Volusenus was not able to make any material discoveries; and Comius was loaded with chains, and treated as a traitor to his country.

No disappointment was, however, sufficient to check the ardour of Cæsar. He embarked two legions on board eighteen ships, sailed from the coast of Gaul at midnight, and reached the British coast on the 26th of August, fifty-five years before the birth of Christ. Jealous of their liberties and religion, and acquainted with the design of the Roman general, the Britons had not been idle in making preparations for the defence of their country. Cæsar on his approaching the island perceived the shore lined with the natives to oppose his landing. His genius only was capable of surmounting the difficulties that now opposed his enterprize. Strangers to the manner of landing in the face of an enemy, destitute of boats, and incommoded by the surf of the sea, the Roman soldiers shrunk from the danger; the conquerors of the world were for once intimidated. Cæsar perceived their confusion, and exerted all his abilities to remove it; but still the Romans refused to leap into the sea amidst a multitude of enemies who threatened their destruction. At length the standard bearer bearer of the tenth legion, with an intrepidity truly Roman, leaped overboard with the ensign in his hand, exhorting his brother soldiers to follow his example, as the only method to prevent their eagle from falling into the hands of the enemy. The sense of honour now prevailed over the sense of danger, and reproach effected what persuasion had attempted in vain. The whole legion followed their standard-bearer, and the Roman army was soon engaged with the Britons. But here their boasted discipline was of no advantage; the irregular manner of quitting their ships had thrown them into confusion, and they were too vigorously assaulted by the Britons to form their ranks: the fortune of Cæsar was on the point of deserting him. He saw the danger, and by a furious discharge from his engines broke the ranks of the enemy. The Romans took advantage of their disorder and reached the shore. The fortune of the day was now entirely changed. The Romans recovered their ranks, attacked the Britons with their wonted intrepidity, and drove them from the field. The victory, however, was far from being complete; the Britons retreated to a neighbouring forest, and Cæsar thought it prudent not to pursue them. Convinced of the superiority of the Romans, and dreading the effects of farther opposition to an enemy, now considered as invincible, the Britons released Comius, and sent him with their ambassadors to the Roman general, with offers of submission. A peace was concluded; they delivered some hostages, and promised to send others to the continent.

But the scene of war was hardly closed, before a violent storm made dreadful havoc in Cæsar's fleet. It happened in the middle of the night, so that the darkness augmented the horrors of the tempest. Some of the galleys were dashed to pieces, and others that had been drawn up upon the shore, were filled with water. This dreadful misfortune spread such universal terror and consternation among the Roman soldiers, that they seemed not to be the same people. They had no materials for refitting their ships, and provisions began to grow scarce in their camp. The heart of the intrepid Cæsar trembled for the consequence.

The Britons perceived the distress of the enemy, and their innate love of liberty animated them to attempt the recovery of their independence. The warlike spirit of the generous islanders revived; their detestation of slavery roused them to action. Their ambassadors, after carefully viewing Cæsar's camp, secretly withdrew to their countrymen, that they might be more than spectators in the noble struggle for freedom. They collected their scattered forces, and endeavoured to cut off all supplies of provisions from the Roman camp.

Cæsar had foreseen the consequence, and took every precaution to render the attempts of the enemy abortive. He ordered all the harvest of the neighbouring fields to be secured, and a magazine of corn to be collected within the fortifications of his camp. He refitted one of his galleys, and sent her to the continent of Gaul for the necessary materials for refitting the rest. In the mean time the fragments of the ships which the storm had rendered irreparable, were used with assiduity and success. In ten days the remainder of his fleet was completely repaired. The Roman courage again revived, and the flame of conquest once more warmed the breasts of these intrepid veterans. They had gathered in the greater part of the harvest without disturbance, and the passive behaviour of the Britons seemed to convince them, that their alarming apprehensions had no other foundation than their own fears.

The most distant field of corn was still untouched, and the seventh legion dispatched to reap it. But they had hardly begun, when they found themselves attacked by a numerous army of Britons, who had concealed themselves for that purpose in a neighbouring wood. The Romans perceived their danger, and prepared for a retreat: but this was impossible. The Britons surrounded the field with their war-chariots, whose axes were armed with scythes, and attacked the Romans with a fury to which even these experienced soldiers, nursed in the lap of slaughter, were wholly strangers. Fortunately for them, and fortunately for their leader, the advanced guard of the camp perceived an unusual cloud of dust, and guessed the cause. Cæsar was alarmed, and flew at the head of the guard to the assistance of his distressed legion. His arrival prevented a general slaughter. Overpowered by numbers, and a retreat rendered impossible, a very short interval of time must inevitably have determined the fate of this intrepid legion. The presence of their general inspired them with fresh courage: the attack of the Britons became more languid: they opened their ranks and retired to some distance, and Cæsar, after joining his legion, drew up his forces in order of battle; but the Britons not advancing to the charge, he retired unmolested to his camp. This is the only instance of that general's ever neglecting to pour his vengeance on the foe. Perhaps it is not too much to say, that Cæsar was, for the first time, obliged to leave the palm of victory in the hands of the enemy.

Convinced that the Romans, however powerful, were not invulnerable, and elated with their late success, the Britons imprudently undertook what they were unable to perform. They sent dispatches into all parts of the island, inviting the chiefs of the petty states to join them with all their forces, that they might assault the Roman camp, and pour destruction on the heads of the invaders of their country. A numerous army was soon collected, and the Roman intrenchments attacked with all the fury of an enraged multitude. Cæsar, with great tranquillity, beheld the irregular and unsuccessful assault. He drew out his legions before the principal gate of his camp; and charged the undisciplined Britons with so much impetuosity, that they were unable to sustain the shock. They fled in confusion to their forests, and trembled lest the Romans should follow them to their retreat.

In this dreadful situation, the Britons once more sued for peace; nor was their request disagreeable to Cæsar. Destitute of cavalry, he found it impossible to pursue his advantages by following the enemy into the inland parts of the island, the only method of securing his conquest. The late battle was far from being decisive; the Britons were defeated; but they had still prodigious resources, and their passion for liberty would not yet suffer them to submit to the galling yoke of slavery. Provisions began to grow scarce in his camp, the harvest was over, and his army, though victorious, had suffered greatly, and were averse to winter in an enemy's country, and in an island wholly unknown. Cæsar therefore readily admitted the ambassadors, and signed another treaty of peace with the Britons. Sensible of his own dangerous situation, and that the islanders would observe the peace no longer than they were in a condition to break it, he embarked his legions, sailed on the twentieth of September, and, after a short passage, landed safely on the continent of Gaul.

Whatever lustre may adorn the victories of Cæsar, and whatever applause may be due to his capacity, his conduct, his intrepidity, yet surely his invasion of Britain can be considered in no other light than that of the oppressive act of a lawless tyrant. Actuated solely by ambition, and deaf to the soft whispers of humanity, he trampled on the laws of nations, and deluged the fields of a country to which he had not even a pretended claim, with the blood of its innocent inhabitants. Virtue was sacrificed to ambition, and justice hurled from her seat by the hand of oppression. Let the bold invaders of the natural rights of mankind, view the base acts of tyranny with delight, and applaud the man that spurns at the laws of immutable justice; but let Britons, who pretend at least to found their actions on the solid basis of virtue and honour, withdraw the stamper, which vice has woven for deformity, and display, in their genuine colours, the flagitious actions of every oppressor of the human species.

The Britons were no sooner freed from the invaders of their country, than they determined not to observe the peace they had concluded from necessity. Cæsar also made preparations for invading the island in the spring with a more formidable force. Warlike preparations were made in the ports of Gaul with great vigour and dispatch. Ships and military stores were collected in the harbours of Spain, and every precaution taken for riveting the chains of slavery on the arms of the Britons.

Alarmed at these preparations, and determined to exert their utmost force in the defence of their liberties, their country, and religion, the Britons entered into a general association, and elected a commander in chief over all their forces. Two generals, equal in abilities, and equal in valour, were candidates for this important post of dignity and honour. Cassivellaunus chief of the Cassii, or inhabitants of Hertfordshire, and Imanuentius, general of the Trinobantes, or inhabitants of Middlesex, were the two persons between whom the lot of pre-eminence was for some time suspended. The contest was warm and spirited; the suffrages were divided till the death of Imanuentius, who lost his life in the conflict, put an end to the debate. Cassivellaunus was proclaimed general of the British forces, and Mandubratius, the son of Imanuentius, to avoid the fate of his father, fled to Cæsar for protection.

The time of embarkation now advanced apace, and Cæsar saw his fleet increased with six hundred new transports and twenty-eight galleys, which, with the remains of his old squadron, he considered as abundantly sufficient for his intended invasion. This numerous fleet rendezvoused in the port of Itium, now Calais, as nearest to the British shore. Here he embarked his forces, which consisted of five legions of foot, and two thousand horse; and in the beginning of June, fifty-four years before the birth of Christ, left the port of Itium at sun-set. The next morning they approached the British coast, and came to an anchor near Deal, the place where Cæsar made his former descent.

Disconcerted at the appearance of so formidable a fleet, the Britons abandoned their first resolution of defending the shore, so that Cæsar, to his great astonishment, landed his forces without opposition. A convenient spot of ground on Barham Downs was marked out for a camp, and Q. Atrius, at the head of a sufficient detachment, was left to guard the spot, and fortify it with the utmost expedition, that in case of any misfortune, it might afford a secure retreat. This precaution being taken, Cæsar set out at midnight with the main body of his army, in search of the Britons. After a march of twelve miles, he discovered the enemy posted in a very advantageous situation, having the river Stour in their front, and a thick wood in their rear. Their war-chariots were drawn up in great order along the bank of the stream, the passage of which they determined to defend. The attack was begun by the Roman cavalry, who charged the Britons with such impetuosity, that they soon forced the passage, and the Britons retreated into the wood in their rear. All the avenues were fortified with ramparts composed of large trees laid across one another to a considerable height. Nor were these the only defences of this intricate and gloomy retreat. In the center of the wood was a very strong fortress, constructed during the civil wars, which some time before raged in this part of the country.

The difficulty of forcing a passage through those rude, but strong ramparts, was sufficiently apparent. The Roman cavalry made several unsuccessful attempts, in which they were greatly harassed by the Britons, and were at last obliged to abandon the attempt to the infantry. The fortifications for some time baffled all their force; at last, the seventh legion was successful, and the Britons were driven from their post with great slaughter.

Cæsar now determined to pursue the advantage he had gained over the enemy; but before he could carry his design into execution an express arrived from Q. Atrius, informing him that a dreadful storm, during the preceding night had destroyed the greater part of his fleet. The preservation of his navy now engaged his whole attention, and obliterated the desire of victory. Instead of following the enemy, Cæsar marched to the sea-coast, where he was himself witness of the havoc made by the tempest. Forty of his ships were entirely destroyed, and the rest greatly damaged. He was now convinced that it was necessary to secure his navy from future misfortunes before he could with safety pursue the flying enemy. He ordered his vessels to be drawn on shore above the reach of the waves, and surrounded by the fortifications of his camp. The soldiers applied themselves with great alacrity to this astonishing undertaking; and having completed the design, Cæsar, after leaving a proper force for the defence of his marine camp, marched again in pursuit of the enemy.

This misfortune, which had so greatly alarmed the Romans, revived the courage of the Britons; their numbers daily increased, and they again took possession of the wood they had been forced to abandon. Experience had convinced Cassivellaunus, that his forces were no match for the Romans in the open field; and he therefore took the wise precaution of avoiding a general engagement, and to content himself with harassing the enemy with flying parties, and cutting off their provisions. Cæsar soon felt the effects of these prudent measures. His forces were continually attacked, with amazing impetuosity, by small parties who issued suddenly from their coverts, and as suddenly retreated. They were indeed generally repulsed, but not disheartened; they returned to the charge with the same vigour, and with the same unshaken firmness.

Cæsar was now sufficiently alarmed. He saw the consequence of being distressed for want of provisions, and his troops perpetually harassed by flying parties of the enemy. He therefore determined to fortify his camp, and endeavour to bring the Britons to a general engagement. Cassivellaunus, who watched every motion of the Roman general, thought it prudent to attack them before the ramparts were completed. Accordingly, while the Romans were busily engaged in their works, he rushed upon them with the utmost fury; the advanced guard, unable to sustain the shock, gave way, and a great slaughter ensued. Cæsar saw their distress, and sent two cohorts to their assistance. But intimidated by the dreadful execution of the Britons; they halted instead of joining their companions. Cassivellaunus perceived their consternation, attacked them with his usual force, and routed them with considerable loss. Several Roman officers, particularly Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, were among the slain.

This success proved fatal to the Britons. Jealous of the honour obtained by Cassivellaunus, several of the petty princes left the camp; abandoning at once the cause of liberty and the interest of their country. The Romans, who expected a second attack, were surprised when the morning discovered only a small number of the enemy on the hills, at some distance from their camp, dispersed in scattered parties, who seemed to decline an engagement. This change of conduct seemed mysterious to Cæsar, who detached three legions of foot, supported by all his horse, on a foraging party, under the command of Tribonius. The desertion of a very considerable part of his army, had no other effect on Cassivellaunus than that of rendering him more circumspect in his conduct. He determined to harass the Roman detachment. Accordingly the horse was attacked with such fury, that they were obliged to fall back upon the foot. This small advantage brought on a general engagement.

Cæsar now led his army to the

The Britons rushed from their retreat, and fell upon the invaders of their country with their usual violence. But the compacted ranks of the Romans sustained the shock, and totally defeated the British army.

This misfortune completed the desertion which jealousy had begun. The confederacy was now almost totally destroyed; and the Trinobantes, who had hitherto been kept within the bounds of their duty, by the power of Cassivellaunus, abandoned the cause of their country, and put themselves under the protection of Cæsar. Strengthened by this acquisition, and freed from the danger of a general opposition, the Roman general turned his whole force against the unfortunate Cassivellaunus, whose country was now devoted to destruction. The Briton perceived the gathering storm, and took every possible precaution to break its force. He crossed the Thames at the head of his diminished army, and determined there to make a stand against the conqueror of the world. He fortified the opposite bank with palisades and intrenchments; and, in the only place where the stream was fordable, he drove into the bed of the river a great number of stakes, which were sharpened at the top and concealed under the surface of the water.

But these artful dispositions were of little advantage to Cassivellaunus. Cæsar was informed of the contrivance by deserters, and took the necessary precautions for rendering the whole abortive. The Roman horse first plunged into the stream, and were followed by the foot with the greatest alacrity, though incumbered with their heavy armour, and the water up to their chins. Struck with astonishment at the ardor and intrepidity of the Romans, whom no obstacle could stop, no difficulty intimidate, the Britons abandoned their intrenchments, and retreated to the woods, where alone they could hope for safety. Cassivellaunus now perceived that all resistance was in vain, and therefore determined to spare the lives of his followers, that when any favourable opportunity should offer, he might be able to revenge the distresses of his country. He therefore dismissed his forces, retaining only four thousand chariots, in order to cut off the straggling parties, and, if possible, prevent the Romans from obtaining provisions sufficient to support their army. This conduct was more alarming to Cæsar than all the attacks of the Britons. He found that the prudence of Cassivellaunus was equal to his valour. The cattle were, by his orders, driven from the fields, and the corn taken from the granaries; so that the Romans had no other subsistence than the scanty pillage of a few inconsiderable farms.

But these prudent measures were rendered abortive, and the Romans enabled to pursue their march by the pusillanimous behaviour of the Ceni magni, or inhabitants of Surry; who perceiving that the Trinobantes were freed from the calamities of war, and lived in tranquillity under the protection of Cæsar, determined to follow their example. They sent an embassy to the Roman general, with offers of submission. Their ambassadors met with a favourable reception. A peace was concluded, and the Ceni magni furnished the Roman army with provisions. Cæsar now pursued his march to the capital of Cassivellaunus, marking his rout with blood and devastation. Every village was laid in ashes, and the whole country rendered a smoking desert.

The capital of the British general consisted only of a number of huts, situated in the center of a wood, the avenues to which were strongly fortified with ditches, ramparts of earth, and felled trees. These fortifications, though formed in the rudest manner, appeared formidable to the Romans. They had before experienced the difficulty of storming ramparts defended by troops driven to despair. Cæsar saw the danger, and therefore ordered the fortifications to be attacked at two different places. The stratagem succeeded. Cassivellaunus had no assistant capable of defending the rampart against the enemy. His presence was necessary at both the avenues attempted; and wherever he commanded, the Romans were repulsed. But he could not divide his attention, and therefore thought it more prudent to retreat. The Romans now forced the rampart, and possessed themselves of the deserted capital. They found, however, great quantities of corn and cattle, Cassivellaunus having made this place a general magazine of provisions, and a retreat for his subjects with their flocks and herds.

Defeated by his friends, and defeated by his enemies, his capital taken, and his territories laid waste, Cassivellaunus was supported only by his own greatness of soul. He still retained the noble spirit of his ancestors. He preferred liberty in distress to slavery in affluence; and though unable any longer to support the cause of his country, he planned an expedition, which had it succeeded, would have overwhelmed the invaders with distress. Cæsar had left his navy within the intrenchments of his camp on the shore, and was now above eighty miles distant. The Kentish princes were still firm in their alliance, and ready to act against the invaders of their country. Cassivellaunus thought a favourable opportunity now offered for destroying the Roman fleet. He sent expresses to the princes of Kent, with orders to collect their forces privately, and attack the entrenchments of the enemy before they received any intimation of their design. His orders were strictly obeyed; but unfortunately for the Britons, the ramparts of the Romans resisted all their efforts. They were repulsed, and the Romans, not content with defending their fortifications, sallied out upon the assailants, put them to flight, and took their general prisoner.

Cassivellaunus was now convinced that all opposition was in vain. He saw that his continuing any longer in arms contributed only to prolong the miseries of his country; and was therefore desirous of sheathing the destructive sword of war. He sent an ambassador to Cæsar, who listened to his offers, and concluded a general peace with the Britons on the following conditions: that they should submit to the Roman state, pay an annual tribute, and send a number of hostages to Rome, as a security for the performance of their engagements. It was also agreed, that Mandubratius should continue unmolested in his dominions.

A general pacification having taken place, Cæsar returned to his naval camp, and prepared for his departure. His ships were launched and refitted with the greatest expedition, and about the middle of September he sailed for the coast of Gaul, which he reached after a safe and quick passage. On his return to Rome, he offered a crosier of British pearls at the shrine of Venus Genetrix, from whom he was said to be descended; and to fix a lasting remembrance of his expeditions into Britain, he employed his prisoners in adjusting the tapestry scenes of the theatre, on which the victories he gained over the Britons were represented; while others of a more robust constitution, were employed in carrying the sedans of the senators and principal nobility.

If we candidly examine the second expedition of Cæsar, it will appear rather splendid than effectual. He penetrated indeed much farther into the island, and formed alliances with several of the petty princes; but he retained not a foot of ground, nor procured any solid advantage to his country. He did not think it prudent to winter in the island, nor even to leave part of his army in garrison to keep the Britons in subjection. He retired rather as a defeated general, than a conqueror; and after laying part of the country waste, and manuring the fields with the blood of their masters, he left the Britons to repair the devastations, and cultivate with new ardor the lovely plant of liberty and independence. The treaty he concluded can be considered only a temporary submission, and of which he took no care to secure the continuance. All the honour therefore that justly belongs to that celebrated general, consists in his having carried the Roman arms, beyond the boundaries of the ocean, ocean, and defeated the inhabitants of an island known to his countrymen only by the name.

The death of Cæsar lighted up the torch of civil discord in Rome, and the affairs of Britain was forgotten amidst the distractions that filled the capital of the world. The Britons themselves were either too ignorant or too careless to transmit to posterity the transactions of their country. An interval of several years intervened without affording any remarkable events to fill the page of history. All that can be collected is, that Cassivellaunus severely chastised the Trinobantes, for having joined the invaders of their country; and that at his death he left his crown to his nephew, Tinuantius, who was succeeded by his son Cunobline, a prince of great talents, improved by an excellent education at Rome.

Soon after Augustus was settled on the imperial throne, he undertook to compel the Britons to observe the treaty they had made with Julius Cæsar, and accordingly advanced into Gaul to carry his design into execution. A revolt in Pannonia rendered his return necessary, and for some time suspended his expedition. But as soon as the tranquillity of that province was restored, Augustus once more marched into Gaul, where he was met by an embassy from Britain, and a peace was immediately concluded. From this period the Britons maintained a friendly correspondence with the Romans during the reign of Augustus, and that of his successor Tiberius. They paid no other tribute than a small duty on merchandize exported to Gaul, the only remaining mark of subjection in all other respects they were a free and independent people; This intercourse between the Britons and the continent softened their ferocious manners; they grew insensibly enamoured of the Roman arts, and began to cultivate them with success. Several of the British princes resided at Rome, and others sent their sons thither for their education.

But though the Britons were not opposed by any foreign enemy, civil discord frequently raged among the petty chiefs of the island. Cunobline, the most powerful prince in Britain, was properly the chief of the Cassivellauni, but he had reduced the Trinobantes, the Dobuni, and several other provinces to subjection, so that he was now the most powerful prince in the island. He coined money, to pay the duties imposed by the Romans on British merchandize imported into Gaul.

During his reign, a detachment of Roman troops under the command of Germanicus, in their return from the victory they had gained over Armenius on the banks of the Weser, were ship-wrecked on the coast of Britain. These unfortunate veterans were received by the natives with the greatest humanity, and afterwards conveyed safely to their country in ships provided by Cunobline. That prince had hitherto enjoyed a continued series of prosperity. Beloved by his subjects, and esteemed by foreigners, he was considered as one of the most fortunate princes of his age: but a cloud of domestic distress obscured the evening of his life. Adminius his eldest son, was of a cruel tyrannical temper. He trampled on the laws of justice, and endeavoured to raise an unnatural rebellion against his father. The people were distressed and laid their complaints at the foot of his throne. Persuasion and reproof were tried in vain, Adminius was not to be reformed. Parental fondness on the one hand, and a love of justice on the other, harassed the breast of Cunobline: the latter prevailed, and Adminius was banished. Exasperated at a sentence which he considered as cruel, and determined to revenge the disgrace, he repaired to Rome, and persuaded Caligula, who then swayed the imperial scepter, to undertake the conquest of his country. He represented the Britons as a weak and divided people, averse to union, and unable to defend their country against the attack of a feeble enemy: the very appearance of the Roman emperor would be sufficient to reduce them to obedience.

A. D. 39. Pleased with the hopes of making so important a conquest without danger or fatigue, the weak, the proud, the pusillanimous Caligula, embraced the design of subduing Britain, a task which even the great and intrepid Cæsar had attempted in vain. He assembled an army of two hundred thousand men, and advanced in person to the northern coast of Gaul, in order to invade the British island. Elated with the idea of reducing a people that had hitherto supported their independence against every attempt, he hastened the embarkation of his troops, and seemed desirous of treading in the steps of his great ancestor. But before his ships were ready to sail, advice arrived, that the Britons, informed of the intended invasion, were drawn up in order of battle on the shore, and determined to spill the last drop of their blood in defence of their country. The emperor was intimidated; the very idea of danger was sufficient to induce the dastardly Caligula to disembark his forces. But his vanity was equal to his cowardice: he was desirous of receiving the honours of a triumph, without treading the thorny path of conquest; and of wearing the wreath of victory, without facing an enemy. He ventured out to sea in his galley attended by his principal officers, and after surveying, at a great distance, the British coast, he returned with all the pomp and parade of a conqueror: ordered his soldiers to fill their helmets with shells, which he called the spoils of the ocean, and sent them to Rome as the trophies of his victory. A triumph was decreed him by the venal senate, and Caligula entered Rome in all the parade of a victor over a people he dared not attack. And to perpetuate this ridiculous expedition, or rather to transmit his own folly to posterity, he erected a watch-tower on the strand, on the top of which a fire was kept burning, during the night, for the direction of mariners. The remains of this structure may still be seen at low-water, on the sands near Boulogne.

The long intercourse the Britons had now carried on with the Romans, had greatly abated their aversion to that people. They cultivated their arts and imitated their manners. These would indeed have proved happy acquisitions, could they have been introduced without alloy: but unfortunately for our countrymen, they imported their luxuries with their arts. The hardy Britons sunk into indolence and ease; their natural love of liberty and independence was softened by effeminence, and that union which forms the only bond of security in times of distress, was dissolved: the Britons had lost their liberty before they were sensible of their danger.

While Caligula wore the imperial crown, no danger was to be feared, and this tended to increase the inattention of the Britons: they slept supinely on the couch of security. Claudius, who succeeded Caligula, was not less timid than his predecessor, but wholly governed by favourites. These sycophants, either desirous of increasing the reputation of their master, or of sharing in the spoils of so important a conquest, persuaded the emperor to undertake the reduction of Britain. The resolution being taken, pretences soon offered for beginning hostilities. Beric, a British prince, who had been banished from his country for endeavouring to excite a rebellion in favour of Adminius, repaired to Rome, and complained of having been unjustly condemned; offering at the same time, to assist Claudius in the reduction of the island. Before any answer could be given to Beric, an embassy arrived from Britain, to demand the British fugitive. They were received with contempt, and given to understand, that if the long neglected payment of the tribute was still delayed, it would be demanded at the head of a Roman army.

Confounded at so unexpected a reception, the ambassadors made no reply. They left Rome immediately, and repaired with the utmost expedition to their country. Cunobline had some time before paid the debt of nature, and his two sons Caractacus and Togodumnus, taken possession of the government. These princes highly resented the ignominious treatment of their ambassadors, and rejected the demand with disdain. They prohibited all future intercourse with the Romans, and took every precaution in their power to defend the liberty and independence of their country. They raised a numerous army, and encamped near the sea-coast, in order to prevent the landing of the enemy.

A. D. 43. Claudius, confident of success, gave the command of his army in Gaul, to Aulus Plautius, a citizen of great reputation, and famous for his military capacity, with orders to transport a considerable army into Britain; enjoining him at the same time, not to finish the conquest himself; but send him timely information, that he might reap the fruits of victory in person. The emperor was desirous of enjoying the honours of a triumph, without experiencing the fatigues of a campaign.

Plautius, in obedience to the imperial orders, led a large body of troops to the sea shore, where a sufficient number of ships were provided for transporting them into Britain. The embarkation was hardly begun, before a mutiny appeared among the soldiers. They declared they were ready to follow their general to any part of the continent; but would not pass the boundaries of the ocean: they refused to plant the Roman eagles in what they called a new world. Astonished at the behaviour of the legions, and perceiving that no arguments could prevail, Plautius suspended the embarkation and dispatched an express to the emperor, who sent Narcissus, a person universally despised, and who had lately been freed from slavery by his master. He ascended the rostrum in order to harangue the troops; but his attempt was vain. Exasperated at seeing the place, which had always been sacred to intrepid generals, who had shared in common with the dangers and fatigues of war, profaned by a slave, the soldiers set up an universal cry, in which the voice of Narcissus was totally lost: they would not suffer a person destitute of merit, and hardly free from the shackles of slavery, to interpose in the cause of a Roman army. The uproar increased; the banners of mutiny were displayed; and the imperial orders no longer regarded. Plautius perceived the gathering storm, and trembled for the event. But generosity prevailed, when power had exerted its force in vain. The soldiers revered the virtues of Plautius, as much as they despised the effeminacy of the minion, and returned to their duty. The troops were immediately embarked, and, after a short passage, landed in Kent without opposition.

The Britons had been informed of the mutiny in the Roman army; and concluded the danger was over. They thought it unnecessary to guard the coast when no enemy was expected, and broke up their camp just before the Roman legions appeared. It was now too late to regain the advantage they had lost; and instead of joining in a general body and attacking the enemy before they were ready to receive them, they retired into the inland part of the country, and divided their forces into small parties. The two principal bodies were commanded by Togodumnus and Caractacus, both celebrated for their military abilities, their intrepidity, and their virtue. But jealousies prevailed among the petty princes of Britain: they envied the talents they could not equal, and sacrificed the liberties of their country to the spirit of malignity. After defeating several parties, Plautius marched into Oxfordshire, where he attacked the army of Caractacus, and put them to flight. Instead of retreating before an enemy flushed with victory, Togodumnus, determined to give battle to the Roman forces. He suffered the passion of revenge to gain the ascendancy over his prudence. He attacked the enemy and was defeated. These misfortunes, though they weakened the power, did not depress the spirit of the Britons. They repaired from all parts to the standard of Caractacus, who, after joining his brother, encamped on the banks of the Thames in the country of the Regni. The Romans appeared on the opposite side of the river; but the stream was too deep and rapid to be forded; even by cavalry. This lulled the Britons into a fatal security. They saw the enemy; but made no preparations for defence. In the army of Plautius was a large party of German soldiers, who had long been accustomed to swim across the most rapid rivers in their armour. These plunged into the stream with so much intrepidity, that the astonished Britons abandoned their camp, and retired in confusion. A body of the Roman infantry, animated by the example of the Germans, followed them under the command of Flavius Vespasian, and his brother Sabinus. Having reached the opposite bank, and formed their ranks, they marched in search of the enemy, who had retreated to the neighbouring woods. A slight skirmish ensued, in which the Britons were obliged to retreat; but as night was coming on, it was not thought prudent to pursue the advantage. The Britons were now roused to a sense of their danger: they saw the gathering storm that threatened to overwhelm their liberties, and determined, if possible, to prevent its effects. They attacked the enemy with an impetuosity, that even the boasted discipline of the Romans could not resist. They broke through their ranks, and, with all the fury of men exasperated to madness, thinned the squadrons of the enemy. A short interval of time would have stripped the wreath of laurel from the Roman brow, had not C. Silius Geta turned the scale of victory. That able officer, who was supposed to have been taken prisoner, found means to disengage himself and his whole corps from the enemy; and wheeling about, fell upon the Britons in the rear. This assault was decisive; they faced about to repel the attack, and by that means gave the main body of the Romans time to recover. The unfortunate Britons now found themselves charged both in front and rear. They stood firm for some time; but the Roman discipline at last prevailed, and the Britons were put to flight. In the beginning of the action, Vespasian himself was surrounded, and must have lost his life, had not his son bravely rescued him at the hazard of his own. This victory, fatal to the liberties of the Britons, was dearly purchased by the Romans: another battle, fought with equal obstinacy, would have rendered the expedition abortive. The Roman senate themselves were so sensible of the important service of Geta, that they decreed him a triumph, though they hardly ever conferred that honour on an officer of his rank.

Despair now seized the spirits of the Britons. They retreated along the banks of the Thames, and being well acquainted with all the shallow places, crossed the stream a little above Greenwich, the lowest place where it was then fordable. The marshes on the north side of the river offered a retreat which they thought secure, and there they encamped. Encumbered with their heavy armour, and harassed by fens and marshes, which rendered the march both tedious and painful, the Romans followed the Britons, and the German infantry having discovered a ford, they passed the Thames, and surrounded the camp of the enemy. A battle ensued, when the Britons were again defeated, and Togodumnus, revered for his military talents, fell in the action.

This victory, though obtained with far more ease than the former, considerably increased the loss of the Roman army, and the death of Togodumnus, raised such a spirit of resentment in the Britons, that Plautius thought it imprudent to face the gathering storm. He had already experienced the fury of the enemy, and dreaded the consequence that might result from the last efforts of a people driven to despair, and fired with a sense of an irreparable injury. He therefore fortified his camp, and dispatched letters to Rome, requesting a reinforcement, and inviting the emperor to repair to Britain, in order to finish the conquest of the island in person. But Plautius was soon sensible that he could not continue long in his present situation. Provisions began to grow scarce in his camp, and the flying parties of the Britons cut off most of his convoys. The treachery of the Dobuni now preserved preserved the army of Plautius. They had already permitted a Roman garrison to be settled among them, and now afforded a secure retreat, and plenty of provisions to the invaders of their country.

A. D. 44. Pleased with the hopes of triumphing over the Britons, and of finishing a conquest which even the great Cæsar himself had attempted in vain, Claudius embarked at Ostium for Marseilles, proceeded from thence by land to Boulogne, and crossed over into Britain, where he arrived in the month of August. The junction of the emperor's forces with those of Plautius, formed a more powerful army than had ever before appeared in the island. The Britons perceived the strength of the enemy, and prudently avoided a general engagement. But the desire of retaliating the injuries they had received from the enemies of their country, animated them to hover round the Roman camp, by which means they cut off many of their straggling parties. Claudius, who had now taken upon himself the command of the Roman army, left his post, and marched in pursuit of the Britons. The cavalry effected what the infantry had attempted in vain; they cut off the retreat of the enemy, and forced them to a general engagement. The first charge was dreadful: the tracts of the British war-chariots were marked with the slain, and the standard of destruction waved over the field of battle. But the Roman discipline prevailed: the desultory attacks of the Britons were repelled, and their whole army put to flight. Claudius did not, however, pursue the enemy; he applied himself to make settlements in order to secure his conquests. He took the city of Camulodunum, now Maldon, in Essex; but used the inhabitants with great kindness. His generosity completed what his victorious army had begun. Fearful of his power, and charmed with his moderation, great numbers of the Britons came to his camp with offers of submission. Whole provinces followed their example, and firmly established the Roman power in Britain. The natives, though vanquished, were left in the quiet possession of their estates and effects; they exchanged their liberty for domestic peace. The clemency of the emperor was extolled to the skies, by a conquered but grateful people: they erected temples to his honour, and adored him as a deity.

Pleased with the success of his expedition, in which he had not only defeated, but also gained the affections of the Britons, Claudius left Plautius to command the army, and returned to Rome, where he received the united acclamations of the people. The conquest of Britain was considered as the greatest acquisition: the Roman dominions were extended beyond the limits of the ocean. Intoxicated with glory, and lavish of their honours, the senate bestowed upon Claudius the surname of Britannicus, and decreed him a most magnificent triumph. Plautius soon after received an honourable recall to Rome, and was received with the greatest marks of regard by the emperor.

A. D. 50. P. Ostorius Scapula succeeded Plautius in the government of Britain; but as some interval of time elapsed between the departure of Plautius and the arrival of Scapula, the Britons had seized the opportunity to attempt the recovery of their liberty; and the new governor found the affairs of the island in great confusion. Caractacus, inspired with the noble spirit of his ancestors, had collected a powerful army, and carried fire and sword into the territories of the Romans. Ostorius landed about the latter end of October, and though the season was so far advanced, immediately led his forces against the Britons. This sudden march was fatal to the designs of Caractacus. Persuaded that the Roman general would not take the field till the winter was over, and determined to chastise the inhabitants who had submitted to Claudius, his army was dispersed into small parties, and in that condition were easily defeated by the Romans. Peace being thus restored, Ostorius, in order to render it lasting, determined to disarm all the Britons that had formed an alliance with Rome. Provoked at an attempt to rivet the chains of slavery on a people who had hitherto remained faithful, the Iceni refused to deliver up their arms. They appointed a general rendezvous in Cambridgeshire, and having marked out a camp in a very advantageous situation, they fortified it with a rampart of earth and felled trees, leaving only one avenue, which they paved with sharp flints, in order to prevent the approach of the Roman cavalry. But nothing could abate the ardour of Ostorius. He led on his infantry to the camp, and attacked it with the utmost vigour, and all the precaution of an experienced general. The Britons made a noble defence, and more than once repelled the assaults of the Romans. But their resistance was in vain; their rude intrenchments were forced, and the Iceni fled to their woods for safety.

Ostorius had hardly gained this important victory, before a new army appeared in another part of the island. Alarmed at the success of the Roman governor, and determined to defend their liberty to the last extremity, the Cornavii flew to arms; Ostorius marched against them at the head of his legions, and endeavoured to bring the Britons to a general engagement. But all his attempts proved abortive: the Cornavii had adopted the prudent measures of Cassivellaunus. They concealed themselves in woods and marshes, and harassed the Romans in their march, cut off their straggling parties, and intercepted their convoys. Ostorius saw the danger to which his army was exposed, and took every prudent precaution in his power to prevent the consequences of this irregular war. But before he could reduce the Cornavii, a more formidable enemy engaged his attention. The Brigantes had collected a numerous army, and made a dreadful inroad into the Roman territories. Ostorius returned with the utmost expedition to the assistance of his allies; but as he was marching by the side of Hatfield forest, his army was attacked with the utmost fury by the Britons, who had concealed themselves in the wood. The success which attended the first assault proved fatal to the Brigantes. They thought themselves sure of victory, and took no measures to secure their retreat. The Romans recovered their ranks, and the Brigantes were totally defeated.

A. D. 51. Convinced by experience that conquests, without securing the advantages, are empty honours, Ostorius erected a chain of forts along the banks of the Severn and Avon, in order to prevent any future inroads by the Britons. Having finished these fortifications, he made Cogidunus, king of the Dobuni, a citizen of Rome, and confirmed him in the possession of his territories. By this prudent measure he acquired a firm and powerful ally, who garrisoned the forts Ostorius had erected, and put a final period to the inroads of the Silures.

But these precautions were not sufficient to intimidate the Britons. Liberty was still their darling object; they preferred death to the chains of slavery. The Brigantes, though defeated, were not discouraged. They joined the Silures, and under the command of Caractacus, determined to make a noble effort against the invaders of their country. Nursed in the lap of adversity, and a stranger to fear, Caractacus led his forces against the enemy. His military abilities were uncommon; his fortitude was invincible. His measures were prudent and vigorous; his resources prodigious. The Romans at once revered and dreaded his talents. Headed by so able a general, the Britons prepared to encounter Ostorius with uncommon ardour and intrepidity. Caractacus well knew that the Britons were no match for the Romans in the open field, and therefore endeavoured to supply that defect by prudent measures, and advantageous posts. He transferred the seat of war into the country of the Grovices, as being more inaccessible to the Roman army. He formed his camp on the summit of a lofty mountain, very difficult of access. The foot of the mountain was washed by a river, deep and rapid; and to increase the natural strength of the post, Caractacus fortified the bank of the river with ramparts of stones faced with sharp-edged flints. In this position he determined to wait the approach of the Romans.

Sensible of the danger of attacking forces fired with an enthusiastic love of liberty, and led by a general, prudent, intrepid, and vigilant, Ostorius led his legionary troops, composed of Roman veterans, against the Britons; and omitted no precaution to secure his army from the irregular attacks of the flying parties of the enemy.

As soon as the Roman army appeared, Caractacus drew up his forces, and conjured them to act like men on this important occasion. He told them the hour was approaching that must restore them to freedom and independence, or reduce them to the most abject state of slavery. He exhorted them to remember the glorious examples of their renowned ancestors, who drove the ambitious Cæsar from Britain, and delivered their country from the oppressive violence of Rome. He invoked the shades of their great predecessors in this important day of trial, in this final struggle for liberty and freedom. The Britons answered by a general shout of applause. They declared their resolution of preserving their liberties, or perishing in the glorious attempt.

Ostorius heard the acclamations of the Britons, and was alarmed for the event. He carefully surveyed the deep and rapid river, the rampart faced with flints, and defended by resolute troops; the hanging crags, and the close embattled ranks of the enemy. The prospect was gloomy, the difficulties hardly surmountable, and the attempt almost desperate. But the ardour of the Roman troops could not be repressed. Dangers tended only to awaken their courage, and augment their desire of glory. The prize of victory was displayed, and every difficulty vanished in the prospect. Ostorius perceived their eagerness, but would not suffer them to engage till he had discovered the shallowest part of the stream, where they might cross the river with the least obstruction.

At last the signal for the attack was given, and the Romans crossed the stream with great alacrity. A dreadful carnage ensued. The Britons defended their rampart with that unshaken firmness which results from despair. The ground was strewn with dead, and the groans of the wounded augmented the horror of the tumult. But the Roman discipline at last surmounted the difficulty; the rampart was thrown down, and both armies came to a close engagement. The Britons rushed upon the Romans like men regardless of destruction. The balance of victory was for some time equally poised, and Fortune seemed undetermined where to bestow the palm of conquest. At length the Roman veterans removed the dreadful uncertainty. Covered with armour, the swords of the Britons made little impression, while death attended every blow struck by a Roman arm. Caractacus perceived the contest was unequal, and retreated to his camp on the summit of the mountain. The ascent was steep and tedious, but the ardour of the Romans was superior to every difficulty. They gained the summit, and attacked the camp of Caractacus. The contest was dreadful; the Britons fought for liberty, the Romans for glory. Urged on by despair, the Britons assailed the ranks of the enemy with a fury bordering on madness. But their efforts were in vain; they met death on every side, and the camp became a horrid scene of blood and devastation. The victory was complete, and the standard of British liberty fell to the ground. The wife, daughter, and brothers of Caractacus, with many other persons of birth and fortune, were taken prisoners.

Caractacus himself escaped, with a few friends, the dreadful destruction of his army. Distracted at the irreparable loss he had sustained, he flew to Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes, for safety. A moment's reflection would have been sufficient to have prevented this inguarded step. He knew that Cartimandua had long been a friend to the Romans, though her husband Venutius was one of the champions of liberty. Pleased with the opportunity of acquiring the favour of Ostorius, she basely loaded Caractacus with chains, and in that ignominious manner delivered him into the hands of the Romans; an action that has branded her name with eternal infamy.

Rome had been long acquainted with the military reputation of this illustrious hero. He had several years supported the dying remains of that noble confederacy headed by Cassivellaunus, for the defence of British liberty, and had given many signal proofs of his prudence and intrepidity. The news of his captivity was received with uncommon acclamations, and the Romans were desirous of seeing a man whose power was sufficient to check the flight of the imperial eagles. Caractacus and his whole family were accordingly sent to Rome, in order to be exposed as a public spectacle to the populace. The whole city attended; the prætorian guards were under arms, and the emperor was seated on a magnificent tribunal, adorned with the trophies of war. The servants of Caractacus walked first in the mortifying procession, and were followed by the brothers, the wife and daughter of Caractacus, whose tears sufficiently demonstrated that their spirits were equally depressed with their fortunes. Not so the brave Caractacus; he marched on with a steady countenance and noble deportment; his soul soared far above his present condition; he looked down with contempt on the malice of his enemies. He approached the imperial tribunal, and thus addressed himself to Claudius.

"Had my moderation been adequate to my birth and fortune, I had entered this capital not as a captive but a friend. Nor wouldst even thou, O Cæsar! have disdained to rank in the number of thy friends a prince descended from a long race of royal and illustrious ancestors, and the commander of many nations. My present condition adds lustre to your glory, though it reflects dishonour upon me. I was once master of men and arms, of horses and chariots of war, of riches and power. Can you wonder that I fought to preserve them, and that I lost them with regret? If the Romans are desirous of universal empire, does it follow that all mankind should submit tamely to the yoke? Had the hand of perfidy sooner betrayed me, I should have been less distinguished by misfortunes, and you by glory. Had I fallen in battle, both my name and fortune had been consigned to oblivion. Punish me with death, and I shall soon be forgotten; suffer me to live, and the generous action will remain an eternal monument of your clemency."

Claudius, who had distinguished himself by many acts of moderation, was deeply affected by the manly address and majestic air of Caractacus. He ordered the British hero, and all his family, to be set at liberty, and loaded them with favours.

The senate was assembled, and the victory over Caractacus compared with the brightest periods of the Roman glory. They decreed to Ostorius the honour of a triumph; but this was the period of his good fortune. Fired with resentment at the ignominious treatment of their favourite leader, the Britons were roused to vengeance. They had acquired by fatal experience some knowledge of the Roman discipline, and carried on the war with more prudence and better success than formerly; while the Romans, flushed with victory, grew indolent and careless. The legionary cohorts left to complete the chain of forts on the Severn, were attacked and defeated. A body of Roman foragers shared the same fate. Animated with these successes, the Britons attacked the Roman army, maintained the battle till night put an end to the contest, and then retired with very little loss. The Romans were no longer considered as invincible. The standard of liberty was again displayed, played, and the Britons flattered themselves with being able to retaliate the injuries they had received on the invaders of their country.

A. D. 59. Ostorius, who now stooped under a weight of years and infirmities, exerted the last remains of life to finish a war so successfully begun. But he was unequal to the task: he found it impossible to check the progress of the British arms, and sunk into the grave with grief and dejection. Aulus Didius Gallus was sent from Rome with the title of proprætor, to take the command of the Roman forces in Britain. But before he reached his government, Manlius Valens, a tribune, who headed the troops on the death of Ostorius, had been defeated by the Silures, who now committed dreadful devastations in the Roman province. Aulus exerted all his abilities to recover the losses sustained before his arrival, and, by his indefatigable application, put a stop to the victories of the Silures.

About this time Claudius paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded in the imperial throne by Nero, a prince who had no ambition for military honours. He devoted his time to pursuits of a very different kind, and would probably have declined all farther attempts against the Britons, could he have done it with safety to himself. But the people considered Britain as one of the fairest jewels in the Roman diadem; and Nero thought it prudent to tread in the steps of Claudius, whose memory he highly respected.

During these transactions at Rome, a civil war of a very different kind broke out in Britain. Cartimandua, the infamous betrayer of Caractacus, to fill up the measure of her iniquity, had taken Volcatius, one of her menial servants, to her bed. Exasperated at such shocking injuries, her husband Venutius repaired to the Silures, represented, in the most forcible manner, the detestable conduct of Cartimandua, and expatiated on the irreparable injury she had done her countrymen, by basely betraying their intrepid leader. He did not plead in vain. Roused by the ignominious treatment of their beloved general, they expressed their resentment with a fury nearly allied to madness; and bound themselves, by the most solemn acts of their religion, either to take ample vengeance on the infamous betrayer of their country, or perish. The Brigantes readily joined the confederacy; and the deserted Cartimandua, who had preferred the gratification of a lawless passion to conjugal virtue, and the friendship of the Romans to the liberty of her country, found herself abandoned by the greater part of her subjects, and exposed to the vengeance of an enraged people. She flew immediately to the Romans for succour, and was received with kindness and respect. Supported by forces that she considered as invincible, she set no bounds to her passion, and looked upon the threatened vengeance of the Britons with contempt.

But the Roman power was become fallacious. Discipline had given place to licentiousness, and effeminacy had enervated the strength of the conquerors of the world. The Britons advanced with confidence and intrepidity, and the Romans marched out to meet them. A dreadful battle ensued; the field was covered with slain, and it was with the greatest difficulty the Romans prevented Cartimandua from falling into the hands of an enraged and injured people. All her dominions fell into the hands of the enemy. Didius, who was very old and infirm when he first came over into Britain, could not lead in person his army against the Britons: he entrusted the command to generals much inferior in merit, and the consequences reflected a stain upon the honour of the Romans. Didius saw with grief this sudden reverse of fortune, and fell a victim to the complicated attacks of disease and vexation.

A. D. 61. As soon as the news of the death of Didius reached Rome, Paulinus Suetonius, one of the most celebrated generals of the age, was sent to supply his place. A leader of abilities was never more wanting than at present. Elated by their success, and exasperated by the injuries they had received, the Britons threatened the Romans with destruction. Suetonius saw the danger, and took the most prudent methods to prevent it. The greater part of the Roman army was encamped in the country of the Ordovices, near the strait which separates the island of Mona, now called Anglesea, from the coast of North Wales. Mona was principally inhabited by the Druids; it was their university, the residence of their pontiff, a place more immediately consecrated to their religious worship, and therefore esteemed sacred by all the Britons. It had also for some years been a common asylum for the enemies of Rome, and was now very full of people. Convinced that the Britons could never be reduced to obedience while the Druids continued in their authority, Suetonius determined to destroy this seat of their superstition. He knew that enthusiasm supplied the Britons with a kind of frantic courage. Persuaded that those who fell in battle against the enemies of their religion, passed immediately into a state of perfect happiness, they did not consider the loss of life as an evil. They rushed undaunted into the thickest part of the battle, and smiled in the agonies of death. It was in vain to hope that force only could ever reduce to subjection a people inspired with such sentiments. A mind filled with superstitious notions is deaf to the voice of caution. Mona must be laid waste, the source of enthusiasm destroyed, and the Druids themselves extirpated, before the Romans could triumph over the liberties of the Britons.

The arm of the sea which divides Mona from the adjacent coast, could not be forded by the infantry; a sufficient number of boats were therefore collected for transporting the legions, while the horse crossed the strait. Suetonius perceived the inhabitants were drawn up at some distance from the water's edge, and therefore landed his troops with very little opposition. But the Britons soon advanced with the utmost fury upon the Romans, who were struck with a superstitious terror at a scene which was now presented to their view. Behind the British army were a multitude of women running about like furies with dishevelled hair, and flaming torches in their hands. Amidst these frantic women were the Druids pouring out the most dreadful imprecations, and, with their hands lift up to heaven, imploring the vengeance of their gods upon the enemies of their religion. The Romans stood for a time motionless; they seemed as it were transfixed with horror, and became an inactive mark to the missiles of the Britons. Suetonius saw their terror, and trembled for the event: he flew from rank to rank, and endeavoured, by threatenings and exhortations, to rouse them into action. At last the love of glory prevailed over enthusiastic horror. They attacked the enemy with their usual intrepidity, and, after a short resistance, drove them into the woods, with a dreadful slaughter. Being thus master of the island, Suetonius applied himself to destroy every place dedicated to the superstitious worship of the Britons. He cut down their sacred groves, and burnt the Druids on those very altars that had been so often stained with human blood.

But while he was employed in demolishing the structures and groves of the Druids, he was recalled by an event that threatened the total destruction of the Roman power in Britain. The vices of Nero were risen to such a shameful height, that a new species of taxation had for some time been introduced into all the provinces of the Roman empire, to supply his extravagance. The taxes levied on the Britons were grievously oppressive. They complained; but, instead of redress, they were treated with insolence, their misfortunes were insulted, and their miseries made a subject of ridicule. These acts of wanton tyranny raised a general spirit of resentment, ment, and the whole nation was ripe for a revolt, when an incident happened which kindled into a flame the latent sparks of vengeance.

Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, had long lived in friendship with the Romans; and having no son to inherit his dominions, bequeathed his immense treasures to the emperor, and his two daughters, as joint-heirs; hoping by that means to procure a powerful protector for his children. But he was fatally deceived. Catus Decianus, the procurator, a monster of vice, avarice and injustice, seized upon the whole, and the dominions of Prasutagus became a prey to the licentiousness of the Roman centurions. Boadicea, the wife of Prasutagus, remonstrated warmly against these iniquitous proceedings, and loudly exclaimed against the injustice of depriving her daughters of their inheritance; but instead of redress, she was treated in a manner that reflects disgrace upon humanity. Catus added insolence to injustice: he ordered Boadicea to be publicly scourged, and suffered the soldiers to violate the chastity of her two daughters.

These inhuman proceedings roused the Iceni to vengeance. They were joined by the Trinobantes, under the command of the intrepid Venutius; the band of union, which had been so long cancelled, was again revived; and the authors of these shocking acts of brutality devoted to destruction. Boadicea, who inherited all the spirit of her ancestors, animated the Britons to vengeance by her irresistible eloquence; while the druids, whose sacred groves Suetonius was then destroying, inspired them with a religious fury.

The first place which felt the vengeance of the Britons was Camelodunum, which was taken by storm, and every torture that an exasperated enemy could invent was practised on the unfortunate inhabitants. Boadicea severely retaliated in kind on the Roman women the injuries offered to herself and her daughters. The garrison retired to the temple of Claudius, imagining, perhaps, that the Britons would spare a structure dedicated to religion. A moment's reflection would have been sufficient to have convinced them how fatally they were mistaken. The destruction of Mona had roused a spirit of religious fury which nothing could restrain. They forced the temple, put every Roman to the sword, and laid the structure in ashes.

Elated with this success, the Britons continued their ravages, spreading devastation over the whole country subject to the Romans. Petilius Cerealis, who commanded the ninth legion, marched to the assistance of his countrymen, and was met by the Britons. A dreadful conflict ensued, in which all the foot of the legion were cut to pieces, and Cerealis obliged to fly, with his horse, to his fortified camp. But the infamous procurator escaped the vengeance his crimes so justly deserved. Conscious of having occasioned this dreadful insurrection, he fled to Gaul, and by that means eluded at once the fury of the enemy, and the rage of his Romans.

In the mean time Suetonius was marching with the utmost expedition to the relief of his friends, and reached London before that city had felt the vengeance of the Britons. But finding it impossible to defend the place with his small army against the numerous forces of the enemy, he retired to a considerable distance, in order to take possession of some advantageous post, and bring on a general engagement.

Informed that the Roman general had reached London, Boadicea led her army to that capital; but finding it abandoned by the enemy, she put near seventy thousand Romans to the sword, and laid the city in ashes. These sacrifices were, however, far from being sufficient to appease the fury of Boadicea; nothing less than the total extirpation of the Romans could satisfy her vengeance.

Aware of the enterprising spirit of that heroine, and sensible that an insatiable thirst of revenge in the breast of an incensed woman, at the head of a numerous army, would carry her beyond the bounds of prudence, and urge her to acts of imprudent impetuosity; the Roman general posted his forces, which now amounted to ten thousand men, in such a position as might best enable him to sustain the fury of the first attack. Accordingly he made choice of a spot of ground accessible only by a narrow defile, having an open plain in his front, and a large wood in his rear. In this situation he prepared to withstand the dreadful assault of the Britons. He placed his legionary troops in the center, the light-armed on each side, and his cavalry in the wings. In this order he waited the approach of the enemy.

Flushed with conquest, and elated with the hopes of exterminating at once the Roman power in Britain, Boadicea led her army into the plain in the front of the enemy. The number of the Britons was not less than two hundred and thirty thousand men, eager for retaliating the injuries they had received on their tyrannical masters. They did not entertain a doubt of obtaining the prize of victory, and accordingly brought their wives and children with them into the field; that they might be spectators of the vengeance they were going to pour on the heads of the enemy, and assist in plundering the invaders of their country. These being placed in waggons posted in the rear of the army, rendered a retreat extremely difficult.

At the head of the British army appeared Boadicea, drawn in a chariot, with her two daughters. She passed between the ranks of her army; and addressing herself to the heads of every tribe, represented, with the most powerful eloquence, and in the most pathetic manner, the inhuman insults that had been offered to herself and her two daughters. "But," added she, "the desire of revenging mine own injuries; however great, is the least motive that induced me to attack the tyrants of the world. It is the universal slavery that is preparing, the chains that are forging for my brave and numerous people, that have roused me to vengeance. I have taken the field to defend the liberties of my country; but if there be any here who prefer the yoke of slavery to freedom; who can tamely behold their wives and daughters ravished, and stoop so low as to kiss the feet of an insolent master; they will do well to depart. For myself, I am absolutely determined to conquer or perish."

A general shout of applause resounded in the British army, and Boadicea immediately led her forces against the Romans. The first assault was made by the Britons with the utmost fury. They valued not the swords of the enemy; they seemed rather to court than decline destruction. But the Roman ranks could not be broken; they stood firm amidst a dreadful shower of javelins, darted with violence from the nervous arms of the enraged Britons. The legionary troops now sallied out upon the enemy, and were followed by the auxiliaries. A horrid slaughter ensued. The victory was long doubtful, and the field of battle covered with the slain. But the heavy armed forces of the Romans at last bore down all opposition; and the retreat of the Britons being in a manner cut off by their own waggons, a dreadful carnage succeeded; near eighty thousand of them perished. The unfortunate Boadicea perceived with distraction the defeat of her army, and disdaining a submission, put a period to her life.

The Britons were now convinced that all opposition was in vain. They retired to their respective places of abode; but Suetonius, with a cruelty that has stained his character, pursued them with unremitting vengeance. The whole country became a scene of blood and slaughter; even the women and children were put to the sword; the villages and towns reduced to ashes, and large districts totally laid waste. A dreadful famine ensued, which depopulated those parts of the island which the sword of the Romans had spared.

Driven

Driven to despair by cruelty, and exasperated to madness by the loss of every thing they held dear, the Britons had once more recourse to arms; and many of the Romans felt the weight of their resentment. They never attempted to face the enemy in the open field, but hovered continually round their quarters, and put to the sword every Roman that fell into their hands. Death, even in its most horrid shape, had lost its terror: the Britons were rendered invincible by distress. Barbarity only increased the evil, and slaughter had no other tendency than that of depopulating the country. Julius Classicianus, who had succeeded Catus as procurator, beheld the perseverance of the Britons with astonishment, and rightly imputed their obstinate inflexibility to the haughty severity of Suetonius. He was penetrated with compassion at the sufferings of a brave and hardy people; and wrote to Rome, informing the emperor, that there would never be an end to the war, unless Suetonius was recalled. His letter had its proper weight with the emperor, and Suetonius received orders to repair to Rome.

A. D. 62. He was succeeded by Përronius Turpilianus, who, by the mildness of his administration, and his great affability, soon effected what the legions of Suetonius had attempted in vain. Instead of harassing the Britons by military executions, and keeping alive their resentment by new injuries, he suffered them to enjoy unmolested repose. By this prudent conduct, their rage abated, their losses were forgotten, peace once more extended her olive branch over the desolated country, and plentiful harvests crowned the fields that the sword of war had laid waste.

A. D. 65. After three years residence in Britain, Turpilianus returned to Rome, where he was received with universal applause: triumphal honours were decreed him; and the Romans were convinced from experience, that moderation and lenity were more effectual in subduing the Britons, than persecutions and tyranny. The same measures were pursued by several successive governors; and the Britons, though many of them still retained their love of liberty, did not look upon the Romans with the same malignity as before.

A. D. 78. But the glory of subduing the Britons was reserved for Julius Agricola, whose virtues and talents have been rendered immortal by the pen of Tacitus. Agricola was no stranger to the Britons; he had served under Suetonius with great reputation. Soon after his arrival, he received advice that the Ordovices had surprised and cut to pieces a body of Roman horse stationed on their frontiers. This sudden commencement of hostilities greatly alarmed the Romans; and Agricola, though the summer was far advanced, and the cohorts lay dispersed in different parts of the country, wisely resolved to check the insurrection in its birth. He accordingly assembled the legions and auxiliaries with the utmost expedition, and marched against the Ordovices. On his approach, they abandoned the plains, and retired to their strong holds and fortresses in the mountains, places which had hitherto been considered as inaccessible to an enemy. But Agricola was not to be deterred by dangers, nor stopped by difficulties: he ascended the mountains at the head of his army, and drove the enemy from their retreats. Harassed in every part of the country, and destitute of any place of safety, the Ordovices submitted to the Roman governor, and peace was once more restored in Britain.

A. D. 79. As soon as the winter was over, Agricola marched his army to the sea-side, in order to reduce the island of Anglesey, an undertaking which Suetonius had left unfinished. After carefully surveying the strait which separates the island from the coast of Wales, he discovered a ford, by which his forces passed into the island without opposition. Intimidated at the sight of the Romans, the inhabitants flew into the woods for safety; but soon after sued for peace, and gave him possession of the island, which still retains several monuments of his victory.

Agricola now applied himself to cultivate the arts of peace; and, in order to render his attempts successful, he made himself well acquainted with the tempers and dispositions of the people he was to govern. He began his civil administration by acts of justice and clemency. He was particularly careful to reform the discipline of his army, and to restrain the licentiousness of his troops, that no fresh cause of dispute might arise from their insolence and oppression. He was severe, but not cruel. He punished crimes with rigour, but often pardoned faults. The common soldiers became modest and agreeable, the officers generous and humane. He was an inveterate enemy to every species of corruption. No rigour was practised in collecting the tribute; no iniquitous impositions were suffered. He coveted not respect when it owed its origin to fear; but cherished obedience when it flowed from the heart. The Britons were happy under his government, they revered him as a parent, rather than feared him as a tyrant. They cherished a real attachment for his person, and imitated his conduct.

A. D. 80. At the beginning of summer Agricola took the field, and penetrated into several provinces which had not hitherto been subdued; and by sometimes harassing and alarming the inhabitants, and at others inviting them to submission by every possible allurements; he, by degrees, prevailed upon several capital cities to receive Roman garrisons. In this manner, partly by persuasion, and partly by his military abilities, he subdued the whole island, and returned to his head-quarters at the end of the campaign. He was joyfully received by the Britons; and he assiduously applied himself to finish the civil regulations he had so happily begun. He erected temples, courts of judicature, and other public structures. He encouraged the building of private houses, and inspired a noble emulation among the Britons, by rewarding the active and diligent, and punishing the indolent and slothful. He established schools and seminaries, where the British youth were instructed in the liberal arts: he extolled their genius, he applauded their assiduity. They were pleased with his encomiums, and soon became fond of the arts and manners of the Romans. Agricola conquered the Britons by kindness and persuasion: they cultivated the Roman language, and put on the Roman habit: they cherished the Roman luxury, they visited their baths and their banquets. At last they buried in the grave of voluptuousness their natural simplicity and integrity, together with the very remembrance of their former independence.

A. D. 81. Having provided for the domestic tranquillity of Britain, Agricola led his army to the northern parts of the island, and penetrated as far as the frith of the river Tay in Scotland; the Caledonians, though a robust and intrepid people, retiring before his victorious legions. Here he erected a chain of forts to secure his conquests, and stop the ravages of the Caledonians. These forts were constructed with so much art, and their situations so advantageously chosen, that it is said not one of them was either forced, surrendered, or quitted as untenable, during his residence in Britain. These forts were well supplied with provisions, and garrisoned with brave and intrepid soldiers, who, by occasional sallies, kept the enemy in continual alarms.

A. D. 82. Early in the spring he led his army a considerable distance to the northward of the forts he had erected, and subdued several of the smaller tribes. He now erected a chain of forts across the isthmus between the Clyde and the Forth. During this expedition he saw the coast of Ireland, and meditated the conquest of that island; but this design was never executed.

A. D. 83. Desirous of being acquainted with the coast of Scotland, Agricola sent out a fleet to make discoveries discoveries of the creeks and friths in those parts, while he himself marched forward at the head of his army. Alarmed at the appearance of this formidable squadron, the Caledonians attacked the forts of Agricola with great fury. Exaggerated accounts of the number of the enemy intimidated the Roman officers, who advised their general to retreat. But Agricola was not to be intimidated; he determined to continue in the enemy's country, but took every prudent precaution to preserve his army. The Caledonians were headed by Galgacus, a prince admired for his military abilities: he had served under the Romans, and was no stranger to their method of making war. Intrepid by nature, and nursed in a camp, he was a stranger to fear, and knew too well the great advantage that always attends the aggressor in the field. He knew that forces flushed with conquest were almost invincible, and that distress had no tendency to render an army formidable. He therefore attacked the forts of Agricola with great fury, before the Roman general could carry fire and sword into the heart of his country. The Caledonian army was greatly superior in numbers to the Roman, but almost destitute of discipline. Agricola saw the danger of keeping his troops in one body, almost surrounded by a numerous and active enemy, who would not fail to cut off his provisions. In order therefore to avoid the fate of perishing by famine in an enemy's country, he divided his forces into three bodies. Frustrated in his design of surrounding the Roman army, Galgacus united his forces, and fell suddenly upon the weakest division of the enemy. The advanced guard was cut to pieces, and the barbarians poured like a deluge into the Roman camp. Astonished at this unexpected attack, which appeared more terrible from having been made in a dark and tempestuous night, the legionary soldiers were unable to exert their usual intrepidity. Fortunately for them, Agricola was informed by his spies of the intention of Galgacus, and immediately dispatched a reinforcement of light armed troops to their assistance. As soon as they reached the camp, they gave a general shout, which intimidated the enemy, and animated with fresh vigour the despairing legion, who were on the very point of being cut to pieces. The palm of victory was now wrested from the Caledonians, who were obliged to retreat to the neighbouring woods for protection. But, though defeated, they were not dispersed. The spirit of liberty was roused, and the whole country entered into a general association against the invaders of their country. An army far more numerous than the first was raised with the utmost expedition, and their wives and children sent to places of safety. But, before they were ready to take the field, the season was too far advanced to decide the dreadful contest.

A. D. 84. Early in the spring Agricola renewed his military operations, by sending his fleet before him with orders to land occasionally in different places, and spread the alarm along the coast of Scotland; while he himself marched to the Grampian hills, where the Caledonian army was assembled. It consisted of thirty thousand men, headed by the intrepid Galgacus. As soon as he perceived the Roman army, he harangued his troops with all the eloquence of a consummate general. He told them, in the most pathetic manner, that the issue of the ensuing battle would be the recovery of their freedom, or perpetual slavery; for their situation having rendered a retreat impracticable if vanquished, they must either conquer, submit to slavery, or perish.

Galgacus drew up his army on the declivity of the mountain, by which means their whole number was exposed to the view of the Romans, and exhibited a very formidable appearance. Agricola formed his army into two lines; the first consisted of eight thousand auxiliary foot and three thousand horse forming the wings; the second was wholly formed of Roman legions. As soon as the signal was given, both armies began the contest with amazing intrepidity. The battle was fierce and obstinate, and, for some time, greatly in favour of Galgacus. Agricola perceived the danger, quitted his horse, and, at the head of his legions, closed upon the enemy, and engaged them sword in hand. This attack turned the scale of victory. The javelins of the Caledonians, on which they chiefly depended, and which they darted with the greatest dexterity, were rendered useless, and their swords were too unwieldy to be used with advantage. Unable therefore to stand the shock of the legionary forces, they gave way; and the Romans, after penetrating the first line, soon put the whole army into disorder. The Caledonians now attempted to drive their war-chariots through the ranks of the enemy, but the unevenness of the ground prevented the design. Galgacus exerted his whole power to rally his forces, and lead them once more against the enemy, but found it impossible; and the night coming on apace, he retired, with the scattered remains of his army, into the inaccessible parts of the mountains. Ten thousand Caledonians fell in this fatal battle, while the loss of the Romans did not exceed three hundred and fifty. The scene of desolation which ensued is shocking to humanity. Driven to despair, and dreading captivity more than death, the Caledonians set fire to their huts, and massacred their wives and children, that they might not fall into the hands of the Romans. Such are the dreadful effects of unbounded ambition; the laws of immutable justice are sacrificed to the desire of conquest, and the soft whispers of humanity plead in vain!

This victory, so destructive to the Caledonians, was fatal also to Agricola. The infamous Domitian, who now filled the imperial throne, grew jealous of the reputation of his general. The conquests of Agricola were terrible to Domitian. He was recalled, under pretence of being promoted to the government of Syria, but in reality, that a final period might be put to his victories. He returned to Rome, where triumphal honours and a statue crowned with laurel were decreed him by the senate. But he soon fell a victim to the suspicious fears of the cowardly Domitian, who found means to take him off by poison. Thus fell the renowned and accomplished Julius Agricola, the celebrated governor of Britain. He introduced the Roman arts, the Roman language, and the Roman luxuries into this island; and spread desolation and slaughter through an extensive country, because the inhabitants refused to part with their liberties, and tamely submit to the Roman yoke of slavery. He waded through a sea of blood to crop the laurels of victory, and fell a sacrifice to that ambition which led him on to conquest. As a general, as a governor, as a civil magistrate, he deserves the highest honours. His talents were great, his judgment was sound, his memory was tenacious: he was fruitful in resources, and intrepid in danger; a friend to merit, and an implacable enemy to extortion. But he stained his laurels with the blood of a people who never injured him, and against whom he had no other complaint: than their being tenacious of their liberties, and true friends to their country.

A. D. 87. Lucullus succeeded Agricola in the government of Britain; but our accounts of his administration are very imperfect. The Caledonians, immediately after the departure of Julius Agricola, issued again from their mountains; and, by their example and conduct, animated the Britons to resume the spirit of their ancestors, and to join in the common cause of extirpating the Romans. But this was an undertaking that required years to bring to perfection. In the mean time Lucullus was put to death by Domitian, merely because he had given his own name to a new kind of lance he had invented.

A. D. 111. No governor was sent from Rome to succeed Lucullus till the attempts of the Caledonians nians rendered the presence of an able general necessary. They broke through the chain of forts erected between the Forth and Clyde by Agricola, and laid great part of the country waste. Alarmed at this irruption of the northern people, Julius Severus was dispatched to drive the Caledonians back into their own country. He was a person of great military abilities; but, before he could lead his forces against the enemy, he was recalled; a rebellion having broke out in Syria, and Severus was the only general thought capable of reducing the insurgents, and restoring peace to that fertile province. The Caledonians took advantage of the absence of Severus, and continued their inroads with great success. Lucius Antoninus, who commanded the Roman forces in Britain, advanced against the northern invaders. A battle ensued, in which the Romans were defeated, and Lucius himself dangerously wounded.

A. D. 120. There was now a necessity for sending an able general to head the Roman army. The late defeat had rendered them timid and cautious, and the relaxation of discipline less able to contend with barbarians flushed with victory. The danger was pressing; a little delay might have been fatal to the Romans. Priscus Luscinus was immediately dispatched into Britain, and was soon after followed by the emperor Adrian in person. The Caledonians thought it imprudent to face the Roman army headed by the emperor, and retired to their fastnesses in the mountainous parts of their country. Adrian, however, proceeded as far as York, determined to chastise the enemy for their late insults, and put the frontier into a better state of defence. But some old officers who had served under Agricola, gave him so dreadful an account of Scotland, and painted the difficulties that attended the march of an army through bogs and forests, and over the most frightful precipices, in such striking colours, that the emperor thought proper to lay aside his intended expedition. He was, however, determined to provide for the future security of the Roman provinces. Accordingly he continued his march to the forts erected by Agricola; but thinking they were situate at too great a distance from the main body of the Roman forces, he relinquished these fortifications, and erected a wall, or rather rampart of earth, above eighty miles in length, extending across the island, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith. Garrisons were placed, at proper distances, along the whole line; and every necessary precaution taken to prevent the future inroads of the enemy. Having provided for the safety of his people, Adrian applied himself to correct the abuses that had crept into the government. This task required the authority of the emperor, and he accordingly succeeded: after which he returned to Rome, and was honoured with the title of "The Restorer of Britain."

A. D. 138. On the death of Adrian, Antoninus Pius ascended the imperial throne, and, like his predecessor, was more solicitous to preserve than to enlarge his dominions: but hearing that the northern invaders had ruined several parts of Adrian's wall, and renewed their incursions into the Roman territories; he sent Lollius Urbicus to chastise the Caledonians, and put a stop to their depredations. Urbicus soon drove them back into their own country; and, to prevent their incursions for the future, he erected a wall of stone covered with turf, extending from the Frith of Forth to the Frith of Clyde. From this period to the death of Marcus Aurelius, Britain enjoyed the blessings of peace. The invasions of the Caledonians were not renewed; possibly the wall of Antoninus was too strong a barrier for them to force, while the garrisons were well supplied with provisions, and the soldiers regularly relieved.

A. D. 180. But, on the death of Aurelius, the face of affairs was altered. Commodus, who assumed the purple on the death of his father, was famous only for his vices. His indolence and timidity rendered him contemptible; his criminal excesses, an object of detestation. The Caledonians thought this a proper opportunity for attacking once more the territories of the enemy. Accordingly they made a breach in the wall of Antoninus, near one of the principal forts; cut the Roman garrison to pieces, and poured like a torrent into the adjacent country. The contiguous stations were abandoned by the Romans, and the invaders suffered to pursue their inroads without resistance. Roused from the slumber of indolence by the danger that threatened Britain, Commodus sent Ulpius Marcellus, a general of great reputation, to chastise the insolence of the northern invaders. On his arrival, he found the Roman discipline sunk into a state of sloth and licentiousness. The hardy veterans were become effeminate; and much sonder of the couch of indolence, than the honours which result from a vigorous campaign. Ulpius saw the necessity of restoring the ancient discipline before he led his forces against the enemy. He applied himself to the task with great assiduity, and his endeavours were soon crowned with success. This difficulty being removed, Ulpius led his forces against the Caledonians, and drove them back into their own country with great slaughter. But merit is never rewarded by the ungenerous and the cruel. The success of Ulpius excited the jealousy of Commodus: he was recalled; and it was with the utmost difficulty he escaped with his life.

The Roman empire was now distracted with internal convulsions. On the death of Commodus, different pretenders to the imperial purple started up, and every part of the empire became the dreadful scenes of blood and slaughter. Violence and oppression usurped the seat of justice, and anarchy erected her throne in the capital of the world. The affairs of Britain were disregarded in this general confusion; and the Roman forces in the island became debilitated by luxury. The hardy veterans slumbered on the couch of indolence, and the desire of acquiring glory lost its force.

A. D. 207. At last Severus having defeated all his competitors for the imperial purple, determined to pass over into Britain, in order to chastise the insolence of the Scots and Picts; who, during the distresses of the Roman empire, had made inroads into Britain; and laid a considerable part of the country waste. The very name of Severus, though now old and infirm, appeared terrible to the northern invaders. As a general, he had no equal; as a friend to justice, he punished delinquents with rigour. The Caledonians feared his resentment, and determined, if possible, to divert the storm which was gathering round them. On his arrival, they sent ambassadors to sue for peace. But Severus was not to be diverted from his purpose: he dismissed the ambassadors with an equivocal answer; and having made the necessary preparations, marched into the enemy's country.

A. D. 208. His army was too powerful for him to fear any opposition from the Caledonian forces; but he met with difficulties of a different kind. The country was covered with woods, and intersected with bogs and marshes. Sometimes a frightful precipice opposed his march, and sometimes a broad and rapid river: His forces were destroyed without fighting, and intimidated without facing the enemy. The Caledonians perceived the distress of the Roman army, and renewed their requests for a peace. Severus, who had now lost above fifteen thousand men; in this dreadful march through the territories of the enemy, listened to their proposals, and a peace was accordingly concluded. But knowing that the Caledonians would observe the conditions of the treaty no longer than they were compelled by force, he applied himself to form a stronger barrier. Accordingly he faced Adrian's wall with stone, erected forts at proper distances, and finished the whole in so firm and substantial a manner, that it reflected an honour on his reign. Having finished his expedition, he returned to York, and took the title of Britannicus Maximus.

A. D. 209. The two sons of Severus, Caracalla and Geta, inherited not the virtues of their father. Both were cruel, and both enervated with vice. Caracalla was left to guard the pretence, but his imprudent conduct soon exasperated the ferocious Scots to break the peace they had so lately concluded. He suffered his soldiers to make incursions beyond the wall, and to treat the inhabitants with insolence and cruelty. Exasperated at these repeated acts of flagitious tyranny, and desirous of recovering their former independence, the Scots and Picts had again recourse to arms, and severely retaliated on every Roman soldier, who ventured beyond the wall, the miseries they had suffered from Caracalla.

A. D. 218. Severus, ignorant of the behaviour of his son, was so highly provoked at this breach of faith, that he determined to take a severe revenge. The orders he issued for chastising the Caledonians were couched in the most rigorous expressions; nothing less than the total extirpation of that people could satisfy the wrath of Severus. But he lived not to see his threatenings executed: his distempers continually increased; and, before the necessary preparations for the march of the army were completed, he died at York in the fifty-seventh year of his age; and his obsequies were performed with a splendor suitable to a Roman emperor.

The virtues of Severus, however great, were not without alloy. As a private man, he was covetous; as a commander, he was too susceptible of revenge. Where-ever he conquered, he ruined; the sword of destruction followed the wreath of victory. His spirit was dauntless, and superior both to danger and fatigue. He was a stranger to lassitude, and never wearied by the most minute enquiry into every article of his government. To his personal friends he was extremely grateful; to his personal enemies contemptuously disdainful. As an emperor, he was moderate in his expences; in public buildings of every kind, magnificent, if not profuse. He heard causes with the utmost exactness and patience: he entered the courts of justice at break of day, and stayed there till noon. His abilities were excellent, and improved by learning. He had more than the fondness of a father; he forgave Caracalla's frequent attacks upon his life. He was careful of the education of his sons; and, at his death, jointly bequeathed to them his empire. The soldiers who loved Severus paid an entire submission to his will; they readily took the oath of fidelity to both the brothers. But the manners of the Britons were not sufficiently polished to render their country a pleasing retreat to persons long acquainted with the luxuries of Rome. They made a peace with the Scots and Picts; and taking with them their father's ashes, they both repaired to the capital of the empire, and deposited the remains of Severus in the tomb of Adrian. But Caracalla, whose soul was deeply tinged with ambition and cruelty, could not bear to see a partner in the throne: he considered Geta as an enemy rather than a brother; and basely caused him to be assassinated.

A. D. 286. From the departure of these princes, till the reign of Dioclesian, who associated Maximian with him in the throne, nothing remarkable occurs in the history of Britain. Anarchy and confusion prevailed throughout the world. The continent was filled with rebels, and the sea covered with pirates. The coasts of Britain and Gaul were infested with the fleets of the Franks and Saxons. These disorders called for an immediate remedy; and one Carausius, a person of mean extraction, but famous for his courage and experience at sea, was commissioned to put a stop to the ravages of the pirates. He was very successful in his first attempts, and the barbarians were obliged to desist from their depredations. His station was near Boulogne, a port well situated for making him acquainted with the coasts, the harbours, and the inhabitants of Britain. Carausius soon found himself at the head of a powerful fleet, and was wise enough to know the weight, power, and dignity of his post. He saw himself the indisputable sovereign of the sea, and determined, if possible, to wrest the imperial scepter from the hands of the emperors. He redoubled his attention to increase his navy; he became rich by the spoils of the pirates; he formed a strict alliance with the Britons. Had Carausius been a land officer, all his schemes must have proved abortive; but from those few particulars of his life which have reached our times, he appears to have been as successful as he was ambitious, as bold as he was powerful, and as fit to command as he was ready to execute. To him we owe the first dawnings of our naval power; from his conduct we are apprised of our natural strength as an island, and from his example we have learned to set all the power of the continent at defiance.

Alarmed at the power, and exasperated at the conduct of Carausius, a person was dispatched from Rome by the emperors, with a commission to assassinate him. The attempt miscarried, the assassin was discovered, and Carausius determined to publish his claim to the imperial sceptre. The officers of his fleet applauded his resolution, and unanimously declared they would support him to the last extremity. His first attempt was upon Boulogne, which he took by assault, and fortified the place as an occasional retreat.

But his chief confidence was placed on Britain. The situation as an island rendered it impregnable to all but a maritime force, and his navy was superior to any fleet the Romans could bring against him. Accordingly he had no sooner finished the fortifications of Boulogne, than he sailed to Britain, where he was received with the greatest acclamations of joy by the inhabitants. The Roman army proclaimed him emperor, and invested him with the purple robe.

A. D. 287. A triumvirate of emperors was an unusual phenomenon; but the Roman power was so very tottering and precarious, that neither Dioclesian nor Maximian were in any degree strong enough to destroy the acquisitions of Carausius. Some faint preparations of resistance were made by Maximian; and Carausius was proclaimed a pirate and a traitor to his country; but necessity soon after compelled the Romans to lay aside their hostile intentions, and to sign a treaty of peace; by which inglorious compact, this proclaimed pirate was declared Pius; this maritime robber was acknowledged Felix; and this avowed usurper was surnamed Augustus.

Carausius who was nothing more than a nominal emperor in Rome, was a real monarch in Britain; and he held the reins of government worthily. The Britons were no longer subject to the Roman power; they paid obedience only to their own sovereign, and the laws of their country. Justice and equity were dispensed with an even hand; the commerce of the kingdom was encouraged; and the British seas were cleared of pirates.

The Scots and Picts, persuaded that the Britons unassisted by the Roman power, were unable to defend their country, renewed their ravages, and broke through the walls of partition. Carausius immediately marched against the invaders, defeated them in several engagements, and drove them back into their country with considerable loss. But having signalized his courage, and convinced the Caledonians that he was at once a powerful and vigilant enemy, he offered them peace on very advantageous terms, hoping by that means to unite the whole power of the island, and render abortive any attempt that might be made by the imperial armies of Rome.

A. D. 289. The power of Carausius, and the alliances he had formed with other maritime powers, alarmed the Romans. The imperial throne was now filled by Maximian Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus. Forces were raised with the utmost expedition, and every precaution taken to prevent the allies from joining the fleet of the British monarch. Carausius saw the gathering storm, and took the most prudent measures measures to break its force. He collected his fleet, and stationed troops in every part of the island where the Romans could hope to land their forces. Small vessels were kept continually cruising on the coasts of Gaul, in order to give him the most early intelligence of the appearance of the enemy.

A. D. 293. But while he was thus preparing for the safety of his kingdom, he was basely assassinated by the treacherous Alectus, one of his officers, and his bosom friend. That perfidious wretch did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of his villany. He seized indeed the reins of government, but lost the affections of his people. At once ambitious and cruel, he was detested by the Britons; they paid him only the obedience of fear, and were ready to join the Romans on their first appearance.

Alectus saw his danger, but wanted capacity to avoid it. He increased his navy indeed, but not for the defence of his country. He employed his maritime forces rather as a pirate than a prince: instead of encouraging the trade of his subjects, he destroyed it. The intercourse between Britain and Gaul was cut off; and the commerce of the Roman provinces interrupted. The losses and distresses of his people greatly affected Constantius. He redoubled his efforts to collect a fleet sufficiently powerful to engage the navy of Alectus; and was at last successful.

No time was lost in unnecessary preparation. The forces were immediately embarked, and Constantius sailed for the coast of Britain. Alectus, informed that the imperial navy had left the harbours of Gaul, stood off to sea to meet them; but a thick fog concealed both fleets from the sight of each other; and the Romans landed without opposition on the coast of Sussex.

Constantius knew that it would be impossible to defend his fleet from the attacks of the enemy, after his forces were landed, and therefore prudently set his ships on fire. The Britons were pleased with this magnanimous action. They saw that Constantius was determined to conquer or perish, and therefore flocked from all quarters to his standard, imploring his protection against the treacherous tyrant of their country.

The genius of Alectus was not fertile in resources. He was superior at sea, but wanted prudence to make use of that advantage. He abandoned the only acquisition that rendered him formidable to Constantius, and madly determined to meet the Roman army on the land. He should have reflected that a number of raw forces, strangers to military discipline, without armour, and without affection for their leader, were no match for the Roman veterans. Alectus was convinced of this when it was too late; the greatest part of his soldiers went over to the enemy, and the rest were soon put to flight. Despair now seized the heart of Alectus; he threw away his purple robe, rushed into the thickest part of the Roman army, and was cut to pieces.

A party of the Franks, who had escaped the general slaughter, marched directly to London, plundered the city, and fell down the river in vessels loaded with the spoils they had taken; but were met in their passage by a division of the Roman fleet, which had been separated from the rest by the late fog. A battle ensued, the Franks were totally defeated, and the Romans recovered all the booty taken by the enemy.

The Britons, now delivered from the tyranny of Alectus, once more applied themselves to cultivate the arts of peace. Constantius laboured incessantly to render them a happy people. He published a general pardon to all that had been concerned in the late revolt; he restored to the proprietors all that had been taken from them, even by his own soldiers. He dispensed justice with impartiality; he permitted the free exercise of the Christian religion, which had for some time before been planted in the island. He cleared the sea of pirates, restored the British commerce, and chastised the northern people, who, during the late troubles, had renewed their ravages. So many good qualities rendered him dear to the Britons; they considered him as their deliverer, and forgot that they were again subjected to the Roman power.

The arts which had been introduced by Agricola had arrived to some perfection during the reign of Carausius. The city of London was decorated with elegant structures; it was become considerable for its extent, its beauty, and its riches: it was the center of commerce, and the residence of many wealthy merchants. Constantius was pleased with these improvements, and encouraged them by his munificence. He viewed with delight the dawnings of science, the first essays of genius in a ferocious people. He thought the island worthy of his residence, and applied himself to cultivate the rising merit of a people who considered him as their father. Perhaps his passion for the celebrated Helena, who, according to our best historians, was a native of Colchester, contributed to increase his affection for the Britons. She was a woman of extraordinary accomplishments: the many noble works she carried on at her own expence sufficiently display her public spirit; and her liberality, which attracted the love and veneration of the Britons, was unbounded.

A. D. 306. The Britons were happy under the administration of Constantius, but it was of no long continuance. He died at York in the twelfth year of his reign, and left the Britons to lament his loss. His son Constantine, surnamed the Great, arrived soon enough to pay the last duties to his father, who named him for his successor. His choice was universally approved of; and, on the decease of Constantius, he was declared emperor by the army.

Constantine was formed for empire: his genius was piercing; his memory tenacious; his learning uncommon; his liberality unbounded. Affable, polite, equitable and humane, he won the hearts of all his subjects: they revered him as a father; they loved him as a friend. No person ever retired dissatisfied from his presence; no person ever implored his assistance in vain. Inflexibly impartial in the administration of justice, and deeply affected with every species of distress in others, he often repaid from his own coffers the loss which the needy had justly sustained by his sentence. His soul was a stranger to cruelty. His laurels of conquest were never stained with the blood of the vanquished. The sword of rapacity never followed his victories; the forfeited estates of his most inveterate enemies were restored. To be unfortunate was a sufficient recommendation to his protection, and the sufferer was always sure of finding relief. He openly declared himself a Christian, and by that means gave a fatal blow to Pagan superstition. His life was the best comment on the tenets he professed; the refined morality of the gospel directed all his actions.

Under the government of such a prince the Britons could not fail of being happy. No disturbance, no insurrection happened during his whole reign, though extended to an uncommon length. Possibly his political regulations had some tendency to promote this series of tranquillity. He divided the island into four governments, viz. Britannia Prima, comprehending the country between the Thames and the English channel; Britannia Secunda, including that part of the island that lies between the Severn and the Irish sea; Flavia Cæsariensis, containing Cornwall, Somersetshire, and part of the counties of Wilts and Gloucester; and Maxima Cæsariensis, including the northern counties, together with Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Staffordshire, and Lincolnshire.

A. D. 337. Constantine the Great paid the debt of nature on the twenty-second of May, after a prosperous reign of thirty-one years, and divided his empire between his three sons. To the eldest, who was of the same name with his father, he bequeathed Britain, France, Spain, and part of Germany. But he did not long enjoy the crown, being killed in the battle of Aquileia, three years after his accession, in attempting to make himself master of the dominions of Constantius his brother.

A. D. 343. Constantius having acquired the inheritance of his brother Constantine, passed over into Britain, in order to repel the incursions of the Picts and Scots, who, on the death of Constantine the Great, renewed their ravages on the northern frontiers. This prince possessed not the virtues of his father; he was a stranger to the noble qualities that rendered Constantine amiable. He was not anxious to promote the happiness of his people; he listened not to their complaints. Immersed in luxury, and delighting only in the diversions of the field, he left the cares of government to others who abused his confidence. His subjects were oppressed, and his revenues wasted by persons of detestable characters. Exasperated by cruelty supported by power, an insurrection ensued. Magnentius, a Gaul of British extraction, headed the tumult, and Constantius was soon after put to the sword.

A. D. 350. The family of the great Constantine was, by this catastrophe, reduced to the youngest son, named Constantius; but the vices of his brother had alienated the affections of the Britons, who now declared for Magnentius; and had that usurper been contented with the sceptre of the island, he might, in all probability, have supported his power against all the attempts of his enemies; but he grasped at empire. He was ambitious of wearing the purple robe, and rashly passed over to the continent at the head of an army. He fought two battles with Constantius, and was unfortunate in both. Driven to despair, and having only the wretched alternative of falling into the hands of the conqueror, or perishing by his own hand, he chose the latter; and falling on his sword, put an end to his life.

A. D. 354. The sufferings of the Britons began with the death of Magnentius. The emperor was implacable. They readily submitted to his authority; but their defection in favour of Magnentius was not to be forgiven. He sent over a covetous and unfeeling wretch, called Paulinus, a notary by profession, to discover the adherents of Magnentius, and, on conviction, to confiscate their estates. Nursed in the lap of extortion, and proof against the most complicated distress, he executed his commission with outrage and cruelty. Martin, the deputy of the province, saw his proceedings with grief; the sufferings of an injured people excited his compassion. He warmly expostulated with Paulinus, and even threatened to leave the island, in order to lay his conduct before the emperor. Exasperated at the threats of Martin, and terrified at the consequences of having his conduct publicly examined, he suborned witnesses to accuse Martin of crimes against the state. The deputy saw his danger, and determined not to suffer the intended disgrace. When called before the court, he looked sternly at Paulinus, drew his sword, and made a thrust at the tyrant's heart; but missing his blow, he turned the weapon against himself, and plunged it in his own bosom. Paulinus did not long, however, enjoy the fruits of his perfidy; he was, a few years after, burnt alive, by the command of Julian the apostate.

A. D. 363. From the death of Martin till the reign of Valentinian, nothing remarkable happened in Britain. The northern nations, indeed, continued their desultory war, but were always repelled before they made any considerable progress; their attempts were not sufficient to disturb the general tranquillity of the province. But a scene now opened, which more than repaid the inactivity of many years. The fleets of the Franks and Saxons committed the most dreadful ravages along the coasts; while the Scots and Picts, having broke through the walls of partition, laid the inland parts of the country waste. The Roman general advanced against the invaders, at the head of his forces; but fell into an ambuscade, and was slain. The condition of the Britons was now truly deplorable, and some forces were sent to their relief; but they were unable to stem the torrent, and the barbarians continued their ravages with greater cruelty than before.

A. D. 364. Convinced that nothing but a powerful reinforcement, headed by a general of abilities and experience, could save the province from destruction, Valentinian dispatched Theodosius, reckoned the best soldier of his time, at the head of a choice body of troops, to chastise the ferocious barbarians, and restore tranquillity in the island. The arrival of Theodosius entirely changed the face of affairs: he defeated the invaders in different parts of the country, recovered the spoils they had taken, and returned them to the original owners. These acts of justice soon endeared him to the Britons; they followed his standards with alacrity, and nobly assisted in repelling the barbarians. He pursued his advantages, and, by degrees, drove the Caledonians into their own country. But Theodosius well knew that he had yet effected only a temporary relief; the barbarians were repelled, but not rendered incapable of making another attempt. He therefore formed the country, between the walls of Adrian and Antoninus, into a separate province, which he called Valentia, in honour of the emperor. He repaired both the walls, added new works, and placed strong garrisons at proper distances, that a sufficient force might always be ready to render abortive any attempt of the Caledonians. The ravages of the Franks and Saxons now called for his attention; a strong fleet was fitted out, and the pirates totally defeated.

A. D. 370. Having thus restored tranquillity in the island, Theodosius applied himself to regulate the internal police of the state, in order to render it lasting: he corrected many abuses, and committed the department of the administration of justice to a civilian equally famous for his parts and integrity. He lessened the taxes, demolished such imposts as were burdensome to trade, and encouraged the commerce of the Britons by every method in his power. By these acts of prudence and clemency, he became the idol of the people; they considered him not only as their deliverer, but their common father. And, when he left the island, he was attended to the ship by multitudes of people, testifying, in the warmest expressions, their regret and sorrow for his departure. The emperor received him with the most public demonstrations of friendship and affection; and the senate decreed him a statue, ordering it to be placed among their most celebrated ancestors.

Among the officers that served under Theodosius in Britain, was Maximus, a soldier of great merit and experience, and descended from a noble family in Spain. Soon after the departure of Theodosius, Maximus was advanced to the chief command in Britain; and, by forming his conduct after the model of his illustrious predecessor, acquired the love and esteem both of the army and inhabitants. A profound peace reigned in the island; for the barbarians, intimidated by the valour and alacrity of Maximus, had laid aside their incursions, and continued quiet in their own country.

A. D. 375. During this period of repose and tranquillity, Valentinian paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded in the western empire by his son Gratian, a youth in every respect incapable of supporting the weight of the imperial diadem. He was wholly addicted to pleasures, and governed by favourites chosen from the lowest class of the people. His talents were mean, his learning superficial, his knowledge confined: his abilities were those of a huntsman, rather than a monarch. He was much better qualified to preside at the feasts of debauchery, than to sway the sceptre of Rome. Gratian soon perceived his own inability to hold the reins of government, and chose Flavius Magnus Theodosius, son of the great general of that name, to be his associate in the empire.

A. D. 385. Maximus could not behold the sudden rise of young Theodosius with temper. They had both served under the celebrated conqueror of the Caledonians; but Maximus being the older officer, was superior in command. His ambition would not suffer him to serve under a person he had been used to command. He complained loudly of the injustice which had been done him; and found means to prevail upon the soldiers to join in his resentment. The Britons, who were greatly prejudiced in his favour, followed the example of the Roman forces; and declared themselves his friends. Elated with this dawning of success, he collected all his forces, consisting of Romans and the flower of the British youth, and passed over into Gaul, where the legions quartered in that country and the neighbouring parts of Germany joined his standard. He fixed his residence at Tiers, and was acknowledged emperor by most of the provinces on this side the Alps.

But while Maximus was enjoying the pleasures of royalty, the Britons were reduced to a state truly deplorable. Deprived of the assistance of the Roman veterans, whose very name was terrible, and drained of their native forces, the Britons were in no condition to repel the attacks of the ferocious Caledonians. They broke through the pretences, and laid the country waste with fire and sword. Maximus rejected their repeated solicitations for succour: the calls of ambition rendered him deaf to the soft whispers of humanity.

A. D. 387. But it was now necessary for him to exert his whole strength: Gratian advanced against him at the head of a powerful army. Maximus drew up his forces; but just before the signal for engaging was given, the greater part of Gratian's legions went over to the enemy. Deserted by his troops, and in no condition of collecting a second army, he fled to Lyons, and there perished by the hand of Andragathius.

Intoxicated with success, and ambitious of possessing the whole Roman empire, he pursued his conquest with unremitting vigour, and grasped in idea the whole dominions of Constantine the great. Theodosius was not intimidated by his rival's success: he advanced against him at the head of an army of veterans, used to conquest under his standard. The battle was fierce and bloody; but the fortune of Theodosius at last prevailed, and the troops of Maximus were obliged to seek their safety in flight. He himself fled to Aquileia, where he was taken prisoner and put to death.

A. D. 388. Theodosius, though surrounded by enemies, listened to the solicitations of the Britons. Their condition, indeed, merited pity. Without troops to repel the attacks of the ferocious Caledonians; without a fleet to guard their coasts; and without generals to lead them against the invaders, they became an easy prey to the enemy, and seemed to have lost the power of resistance. But on the arrival of Chrysanthus, sent into Britain at the head of an army by Theodosius, the face of affairs was totally changed. The Caledonians were driven back to their country, the fleets of pirates, which had for some time infested the coast, were defeated, and the harassed Britons once more enjoyed the blessings of peace.

A. D. 395. While Theodosius filled the imperial throne, the Britons were happy; their commerce flourished, and the barbarians were confined to their own mountains. But the death of that great prince, put a period to their tranquillity. The Roman empire was indeed grown feeble under the weight of conquest. A deluge of barbarians pouring in from the north, attacked a power which oppressed the world. An inundation of warlike nations overflowed the plains of France and Italy. It became necessary for Rome to exert her utmost strength to repel the attacks of the ferocious inhabitants of the north. The legions were recalled from Britain, and the inha-

These fierce tribes of barbarians, who came to take vengeance on the empire, either inhabited the various provinces of Germany, which had never been subdued by the Romans, or were scattered over the northern parts of Europe and Asia, now inhabited by the Danes, Swedes, Russians, Tartars and Poles. They were driven from their native country by that restless disposition which actuates the minds of barbarians; and induces them to roam from their native seats in quest of plunder or new settlements. The first invaders met with a powerful resistance from the superior discipline of the Roman legions; but this, instead of daunting men of strong and impetuous tempers only roused them to vengeance. They returned to their companions, acquainted them with the unknown conveniences and luxuries that abounded in countries better cultivated, or blessed with a milder climate than their own; they informed them of the battles they had fought, of the friends they had lost, and warmed them with resentment against their oppressors. Exasperated at the misfortunes of their countrymen, and animated with a desire of possessing kingdoms so far preferable to their own, multitudes of armed men, with their wives, children, slaves, and flocks, issued forth like regular colonies, in quest of fresh settlements. New adventurers followed them. The lands which they deserted, were occupied by more remote tribes of barbarians. These, in their turn, pushed forward into more fertile countries, and, like a current continually increasing, rolled on, and swept every thing before them. Blood and slaughter marked the route of the barbarians. They ravaged or destroyed the countries round them. They respected neither age, nor sex, nor rank: all fell in one promiscuous carnage. Perhaps there is not a period in the history of the world more pregnant with calamities and distress, than that which commenced at the death of Theodosius, and terminated with the settlement of the Lombards in Italy. The cotemporary writers who beheld that dreadful scene of desolation, are at a loss for expressions to describe its horrors. "The scourge of God, the destroyer of nations," are the dreadful epithets by which they distinguish the most noted leaders of the barbarians.

The Britons had their share of these dreadful calamities. Deprived of the Roman legions, strangers to military discipline, and immersed in luxury, they were unable to defend their country against the ferocious inhabitants of Caledonia; who broke through the pretences, and laid the country waste with fire and sword. In vain the Britons opposed their incursions; they had slumbered too long on the bed of effeminacy, to be a match for the hardy inhabitants of the north; who ravaged the fields of their debilitated neighbours, and threatened them with the loss of those advantages, for which they had bartered their freedom.

A. D. 408. Driven to despair by their formidable enemy, they implored, in the most pathetic terms, the protection of the emperor. But their request could not be granted. Alaric the Goth pressed the Romans on every side, and threatened the destruction of their powerful empire. Honorius, who then filled the throne of the Cæsars, informed them, that no forces could be spared for their relief; and therefore advised them to arm in their own defence, and chastise with their own forces, the lawless invaders of their country. Tumult and confusion, instead of unanimity, now filled the councils of the Britons. They several times elected a king, and as often hurled him from the throne. Like the idols of some savage nations, they were set up, worshipped, and trampled to pieces. The names of these monarchs of a day are insignificant, their actions as sovereigns immaterial and uncertain: they were elected, adored, and destroyed. Affairs were now become desperate; desperate; and the Romans who resided in Britain, persuaded that all resistance was in vain, buried their treasures, and fled to the continent for safety.

A. D. 423. Valentinian III. who succeeded Honorius in the imperial throne, could not view the distressed state of the Britons without commiserating their misfortunes. A single legion was sent to their relief, and even this small force was sufficient to drive back the ferocious Caledonians to their country. The pretences were now repaired, and the northern frontiers put once more into a posture of defence. Tranquillity was restored, and the Britons began to cultivate the arts of peace. While the Romans continued in the island, the Picts and Scots remained quiet in their own country; but the legion was no sooner withdrawn, than the northern barbarians renewed their ravages: the frontier provinces were again filled with blood and slaughter. The fields were laid waste, and every species of cruelty, that a savage enemy could invent, was practised on the wretched inhabitants.

A. D. 446. The Britons, unable to repel the attacks of their neighbours, applied again to the emperor for protection; and another legion, under the command of Gallio, an experienced general, was sent to their relief. Success again attended the Roman standards; the barbarians were driven back to their mountains, and peace extended her olive wand over the island.

A. D. 447. But Gallio plainly told the Britons that this was the last assistance they must ever expect from Rome. He therefore assisted them in repairing or rather rebuilding the wall of Severus: exhorted them to practice the military discipline of the Romans, and to unite themselves firmly in one body for their defence. He gave them every necessary instruction, taught them the method of making the instruments of war, and pointed out the natural advantages they possessed from their situation. Having performed these good offices, he embarked with his legion, and took a final leave of the Britons.

No farther assistance indeed could be expected: the Roman empire itself soon became a prey to barbarous nations. Its ancient glory, vainly deemed immortal, was effaced, and Adoaces, a barbarian leader, sat down on the throne of the Cæsars. The irruptions of these ferocious people were, indeed, gradual and successive. The amazing fabric of the Roman empire was the work of ages; and it required the labour of several centuries to demolish it. The military discipline of the ancient Romans was so efficacious, that the remains of it descended to their successors, and must have rendered them superior to all their enemies, had it not been for the vices of their emperors, and the universal corruption of manners that prevailed among the people. Satiated with the luxuries of the known world, the emperors were at a loss for new provocatives. The most distant regions were explored, the ingenuity of mankind was exerted, and the revenues of provinces expended on a favourite dish. The tyranny and wickedness that prevailed under the Cæsars, could only be equalled by the barbarity of those nations who demolished the empire of the Romans.

It is well known that the christian religion was introduced into Britain during the government of the Romans; but the exact time is uncertain. Some have indeed maintained that St. Paul preached the gospel in Britain; but there is no other foundation for this opinion than a passage in Clemens Romanus, not rightly understood; and with regard to the fable of Joseph of Arimathea, it has long been acknowledged to have owed its rise to the dreams of some superstitious enthusiast. All we know is, that our ancestors received the glad tidings of the gospel in very early times, when they groaned under the yoke of foreign tyranny; and that this event happened before the conclusion of the second century; because in the general persecution under Dioclesian and Maximinus about the year 303, the christians in Britain were very numerous. St. Alban, and several others, suffered martyrdom for their faith during that persecution.

What progress the Britons made in literature during this period, is uncertain. They were, doubtless, acquainted with the Roman arts; but whether any of them excelled, is unknown. No traces of their learning have been handed down to us: not a single book written by the Britons has reached our time. Architecture and sculpture flourished during the reign of Carausius; and further improvements were made in these and other polite arts, during the peaceable reign of Constantine the great; but the names of the artists are forgotten; they are perished with their works, and sunk together in the gulph of oblivion.

BOOK II.

From the final departure of the Romans till the establishment of the Saxon Heptarchy.

A. D. 448. THE Britons were now no longer the ferocious islanders who opposed the arms of the mighty Cæsar: they lost their courage with their liberty, were become a pusillanimous people, and an easy prey to the Scots and Picts. They applied, in the most abject manner, to Ætius, whose valour at that time protracted the fall of the empire. The letter they addressed to that general, displays at once the miseries of their country, and their own cowardice. "The barbarians (said they) drive us towards the sea, the sea throws us back upon the barbarians; and we have only the wretched alternative left us, of perishing by the sword, or by the waves." But their request was in vain: Ætius himself was so closely pressed by the Goths and Vandals, that no forces could be spared to assist the distressed islanders: the ravages on the continent were at least equal to those committed in Britain.

Denied assistance by the Romans, and incapable of forming any generous effort, the Britons abandoned themselves to despair; they flew for shelter to their forests, and neglected the cultivation of their lands. A dreadful famine succeeded, during which multitudes of them perished for want of food. The ferocious Caledonians themselves severely felt the consequences of their inhuman ravages. They found it impossible to subsist in a country they themselves had laid waste, and retired to their mountains with the spoils they had taken from their effeminate neighbours.

The retreat of the enemy revived the spirits of the Britons: They returned to their former habitations, applied themselves to agriculture, and soon restored plenty to their country. But they enjoyed this interval of tranquillity without taking any care to render it permanent; they made no preparations for their future security. They were divided into parties, by the heresy which their countryman Pelagius had lately introduced among them; and even the dread of the ravages of a ferocious enemy was not sufficient to procure unanimity in their councils. Their northern neighbours, whose trade was rapine, soon threatened them with a new invasion. Alarmed at the horrors they had so lately experienced, and trembling at the thoughts of depending on their own power, a resolution was taken to procure the assistance of foreigners. Vortigern, who had made his way to the throne by the murder of his predecessor, proposed that a number of Saxons might be invited into the island. The motion was approved, and ambassadors were immediately sent to the continent to enter into a treaty with that people.

At that time the Saxons inhabited the sea-coast from the mouth of the Rhine to Jutland. Valour and the love of liberty formed the distinguishing characteristics of that people. Their chiefs, who led them to battle, and presided in their councils, were far from enjoying a despotic power; they were subject to the regulations of the state, and to the voice of the people, who always came armed to the council, in order to declare their sentiments. The attachment of the Saxons to their leaders was remarkable. When any of them fell in battle, they thought themselves obliged to revenge their death, and never to survive a defeat. They were almost strangers to agriculture; they had no lands they could properly call their own, a new division being made every year, lest the love of property should lessen their military ardour, which they considered as the true support of their state. They generally carried their wives and children with them into the field, that the presence of these objects of their affection might augment their intrepidity in the day of battle, and prevent their turning their backs upon the enemy.

Such were the Saxons; whom the Britons invited into their country, in order to defend them against the ravages of the Scots and Picts. But surely there wanted no great degree of foresight to perceive the danger that threatened them from so powerful an ally. It was nothing less than exchanging a partial for a perpetual tyranny. For a moment's reflection is sufficient to convince any thinking man, that a nation of so warlike and ferocious a disposition as the Saxons, would not omit to subdue a people who were sunk into the abyss of effeminacy, and accustomed to the yoke of slavery.

The offers of the Britons could not fail of being agreeable to a people nursed in a camp, who lived by rapine, and whose country was overstocked with inhabitants. Hengist and Horsa, two of the most famous leaders of the Saxons, entered into a treaty with the deputies of Vortigern. They were brothers, and no strangers to Britain, having often visited the coasts of that island in their piratical cruises. Nor did these ferocious generals find any difficulty in persuading a sufficient number of their countrymen to follow their standards. The northern parts of Europe were full of barbarian tribes, who were continually sending out multitudes of people in search of new settlements, so that it was in vain for them to hope they should be able to extend the limits of their country on the continent. Britain was fertile, the inhabitants opulent, and the climate inviting; charms more than sufficient to attract the wishes of a rude and indigent people, and render them desirous of exchanging their dreary and sterile soil for the beautiful plains of a country smiling in all the charms of nature, improved by the unwearied hand of assiduous cultivation.

A. D. 450. Hengist and Horsa having increased their army to sixteen hundred men, embarked their forces in three ships, and landed in the isle of Thanet, where they were met by Vortigern and his court. Hengist and Horsa approached the British monarch in the attitude of ferocious warriors, having in their hands their short broad swords, which they used with so much dexterity and effect. Their troops followed them in the same posture, in order to convince the Britons, that they had not applied to a nation incapable of protecting them against the northern invaders of their country. Before the Saxons reached the British coast, the Scots and Picts had renewed their ravages, and penetrated as far as Lincolnshire, committing the most dreadful outrages in their march. The Saxons joined the Britons, and soon convinced these northern invaders, that victory was not confined to the Roman standards. They were unable to withstand the valour of the Saxons; they fled in confusion towards the frontiers of their country, abandoning all the spoil they had taken, which fell into the hands of the conquerors. This easy victory gave the Saxons a very mean opinion of the power of the Britons, who were unable to repel the desultory attacks of so undisciplined a foe: they perceived their their own superiority, and determined to improve it to their own advantage. Little sincerity is to be expected from barbarians; their great virtue is to conquer for their own emolument. Ambitious of being masters of a country they were called to defend, and desirous of procuring a desirable settlement for their Saxon friends, they informed them of the great fertility of the island, and the effeminate manners of the inhabitants; at the same time inviting them to attempt a conquest of the utmost importance, and attended with very little difficulty.

Their invitations were not made in vain. Desirous of sharing in the good fortune of their countrymen, and settling in a country so much superior to their own, a very considerable number of the Saxons passed over into Britain, and joined the army of Hengist and Horsa. The Britons beheld this increase of the Saxon forces with anxiety. The auxiliaries, in whom they had placed their confidence, were become their terror. They had been witnesses of their valour against their northern enemies; and dreaded the consequences that would inevitably ensue, should they turn their swords against their employers. They perceived the folly of the step they had taken; and were desirous of retrieving it.

A. D. 451. But it was now too late; the Saxons were landed; and their forces daily augmenting. Reasons are seldom wanting when a barbarous army are determined to attack the possessions of a rich and indolent people. Hengist and Horsa, under pretence that the Britons had refused the subsistence they had promised; ravaged the adjacent country, formed an alliance with the Scots and Picts, and laid waste, with fire and sword, the territories of a people who had called them to their defence.

Exasperated at the perfidy of the Saxons, and scandalized at the vices of Vortigern, the Britons flew to arms, hurled the guilty potentate from his throne, and placed the sceptre in the hands of Vortimer his son. Under the banners of that active prince, the ancient valour of the Britons began to revive: they fought several battles with the Saxons; and, though generally defeated, convinced their perfidious auxiliaries, that the intrepidity of their ancestors still subsisted among the Britons. In a battle fought near Ailsford, the Britons were victorious; and Horsa, one of the Saxon generals, fell in the conflict.

A. D. 457. The Saxons were alarmed at this change of fortune, and saw the necessity of repairing their loss. But their numbers were too much reduced for them to venture a second engagement with a people flushed with conquest; and therefore retreated to their camp, in order to wait the arrival of fresh succours. The interval was of no long continuance; a large body of Saxons landed in Britain, and marched immediately to the camp of Hengist. Vortimer perceived the cloud of destruction gathering round him, and laboured assiduously to break its force; but the army of the enemy was too numerous to be opposed with success by the undisciplined Britons. Hengist now took the title of King of Kent; and the Saxons sallied from their camp, marking their route with blood and devastation. Neither age nor sex were spared; the priests were burnt upon their altars, and the prince and the peasant shared the same fate. The structures dedicated to religion were levelled in the dust; and the whole country through which they passed exhibited the most dreadful spectacle of horror and desolation.

A. D. 465. Vortimer saw with grief the ruin of his country, and exerted his whole power to stop the barbarous ravages of the Saxons; but before he could accomplish this desirable end, death put a final period to his labours, and the Britons were left without a leader. The fate of their country was too critical to admit of delay; so that the destructive parties that usually prevailed at the election of a prince were now forgotten; and Ambrosius, a Briton of Roman descent, was, by the unanimous voice of the council, placed in the seat of power. A more proper person could not have been chosen to hold the reins of government at this dangerous crisis; he was humane, prudent, and intrepid: his conduct and valour were equally eminent; he was not to be intimidated by the power of the enemy, nor provoked to rash measures by their cruelty.

Hengist perceived the alteration in the conduct of the Britons, and was alarmed for the consequences. Instead of extending his ravages, he found it difficult to keep possession of his kingdom of Kent. Assisted by the famous Arthur, whose exploits have given rise to so many fables, Ambrosius defeated several detachments of the Saxons; and filled with alarms the camp of the enemy. Hengist, to avoid the destruction of his army, sent for another tribe of his countrymen, under the command of his brother Octa; but, instead of joining the Saxons in Kent, he ordered him to land in Northumberland, in order to divide the attention of Ambrosius. But still the Saxons were in no condition to undertake any thing of consequence against the Britons; several years elapsed before they were able to make settlements in any other part of the kingdom.

While the Saxons lay inactive, new tribes of adventurers were daily arriving from Germany. Among these the Angles made a conspicuous figure, both with regard to number and military abilities. They were of a different nation from the Saxons; but being of the same religion, speaking the same language, and coming upon the same errand, they joined the forces of Hengist, and acted with them in concert against the forces of Ambrosius.

A. D. 477. The affairs of the Britons now wore a lowering aspect. The former ravages were renewed, and the standard of desolation again erected in their devoted country. In the midst of these confusions, Ella, a Saxon chief, landed, at the head of his forces, on the coast of Sussex. He was bravely opposed by the Britons, and obliged to wait for fresh succours before he could make any settlement in the country. This opposition raised the fury of Ella; he thought it an unpardonable offence in the inhabitants to defend their property, and therefore spared neither age or sex; every person that fell into his hands he put to the sword, without distinction. The wretched inhabitants that escaped the fury of their invader, took refuge in the forests, and left their possessions a prey to the conqueror, who took the title of King of the South-Saxons.

A. D. 495. About eighteen years after Ella had founded the kingdom of Sussex, Cerdic, and his son Kenrick, landed in the western parts of England, at the head of a powerful army of Saxons. But though his forces were much superior to those of Ella, he met with more difficulties in making a settlement. He was opposed by the celebrated Arthur, whose valour was now the principal support of his country. He attacked the Saxon chief with all the vigour of an ancient Briton, and defeated him in several battles. But fresh reinforcements continually arriving, Cerdic conquered all opposition, and laid the foundation of the kingdom of Wessex.

A. D. 527. The attention of the Britons was now called to another part of the country. No less than three armies landed about the same time on the eastern coast of the island. The first of these consisted chiefly of Angles, headed by Uffa, a celebrated leader of that nation. Little opposition was now made by the Britons; multitudes of them were destroyed, and others had taken shelter in the mountainous parts of the island. Uffa therefore easily defeated the few forces that opposed him, and founded the kingdom of East Anglia. Crida laid the foundations of the kingdom of Mercia; and Erkenwin established that of Essex, or the East Saxons.

A. D. 547. Though the Saxons had been, for many years, settled in some parts of Northumberland, land, they were not able to subdue the inhabitants, till they were joined by Ida, a celebrated leader, at the head of a numerous detachment. The arrival of this chief raised the drooping courage of his countrymen. He attacked the Britons, drove them, with great slaughter, from their possessions; and assumed the title of King of Bernicia, including the counties of Northumberland and Durham. While Ida was employed in conquering the northern parts of the kingdom, Ella, another Saxon prince, subdued Lancashire, and the greater part of Yorkshire, which he formed into a kingdom, under the title of Deiri. These counties were afterwards united by a marriage between the grandson of Ida, and the daughter of Ella, under the title of the kingdom of Northumberland.

Such was the establishment of the Heptarch, or seven Saxon kingdoms in Britain. History furnishes few examples of revolutions that have been more general, or more complete: for if we except Cornwall and Wales, the whole southern part of the island had changed its inhabitants, its manners, its language, and its government. Exasperated by a long series of opposition, the ferocious Saxons depopulated the country. They were not satisfied with the possessions of the unfortunate Britons; their lives were also necessary to satiate their inhuman cruelty. They stained their laurels with the blood of the innocent, and founded their power on the massacre of the inhabitants.

The history of literature, during this period, is confined to a very narrow compass. The Saxons were ignorant of letters; and, among the Britons, very few were capable of recording the transactions of their country. The long and dreadful wars which wasted their country, had almost obliterated the arts they had learned from the Romans. A few particulars indeed may be gleaned from some ancient writers, but most of them are founded on doubtful authority, and their number is too small to form a connected history. The names of Merlin, a reputed prince and prophet; Pendragon, the celebrated Arthur, Thalieffin, whose writings are said to be still extant, and a few others of less note, compose the whole catalogue of the learned in this dark period of historical narration. Literature, science, taste, were words scarce heard of in this ferocious and barbarous age. The human mind, neglected, uncultivated, and depressed, sunk into the abyss of ignorance. The taper of learning was extinguished, and a cloud of more than Egyptian darkness hovered over Europe.

Previous to the history of the Saxon Heptarchy, it will be necessary to point out the counties which formed these respective kingdoms; and these will appear in the following table.

From the establishment of the Saxon Heptarchy, to its final dissolution by Egbert.

THE history of the Saxon heptarchy is involved in obscurity. The events which happened during this period are blended together, and form rather a chaos of perplexity, than a regular series of facts proper to fill the page of history. Several writers have, indeed, laboured, with the utmost assiduity, to unravel this intricate web of political confusion, woven by the hands of ignorance and neglect; but their efforts have proved abortive, and the same doubts, the same uncertainties still continue. Historical monuments are wanting, and it is impossible to supply the defect. The historians of those times were ignorant, bigotted monks; they wanted penetration to perceive what was really necessary to be known; and learning, to convey to posterity those facts which they thought of sufficient importance. Guided entirely by the spirit of enthusiastic credulity, and wanting either abilities or honesty to detect the frauds and examine the narratives of artful men, they have adopted the most absurd fictions, and given, as historical facts, relations that shock the ear of reason. At the same time, they have often either omitted, or blended with improbable, and sometimes contradictory circumstances, such civil transactions as are necessary for continuing the thread of historical narration. All, therefore, that can be attempted with success, in this dark period, is to collect the few scattered particulars which form the outlines of the Saxon heptarchy, without pretending to finish the picture.

But it will be necessary, previously, to remark, That the Anglo-Saxon kings, during the heptarchy, usually chose one who was placed at the head of their political confederacy, for regulating their concerns, but without any jurisdiction in the dominions of others. He was general in chief, and led the combined forces of the heptarchy against the common enemy in times of war, and presided in the general council of the confederacy in times of peace. This council was never assembled but when some imminent danger threatened the existence of the whole heptarchy, and then only the whole was subject to its decisions.

THE KINGDOM OF KENT.

HENGIST, the great leader of the Saxons, and founder of the kingdom of Kent, had, by his valour and conduct, rendered it the most formidable of all the Saxon heptarchy; but his two immediate predecessors may be said to have inherited his conquests, rather than imitated his example. They sat down supinely on the throne of their great ancestor, without taking any care to render the ambitious designs of the neighbouring potentates abortive. While the original inhabitants of the island were able to make head against the invaders of their country, the Saxons were closely united, and formed one strong compacted body; but the Britons were no sooner rendered incapable of disturbing the peace of the heptarchy, than the Saxons turned their arms against one another. Ambitious of power, and envious of the prosperity of their neighbours, they could not behold the prosperity of another without repining; and made no scruple of sacrificing the laws of equity and conscience to the thirst of empire.

The first who disturbed the peace of the heptarchy was Ceaulin, king of Wessex. He unjustly seized the sceptre of Suffex on the death of Cissa; and not content with this acquisition, he formed a scheme for becoming master of the whole heptarchy. He had for some time observed the indolence of the Kentish princes, and thought this a proper time for carrying his plan into execution.

Ethelbert, the great grandson of Hengist, now filled the Kentish throne. He saw with grief the declining state of his kingdom, and determined to restore it to its original lustre. Possessed of all the intrepidity of Hengist, and superior to him in mental acquisitions, he was beloved and feared by the other Saxon princes. The ambitious designs of Ceaulin were sufficiently evident, and required the abilities of Ethelbert to render them abortive. He summoned the other princes of the heptarchy to a general council, and convinced them of the necessity of arming in their own defence. Ceaulin saw the storm that was gathering round him, and exerted his whole force to defend himself against its fury. He marched against Ethelbert, who led the combined forces, and gave him battle. The conflict was dreadful, but the fortune of Ethelbert prevailed: Ceaulin was totally defeated, and died soon after. Deprived of their leader, and the greater part of their army, the Mercians were in no condition of opposing the combined army of the heptarchy; they submitted to Ethelbert, who restored the kingdom to the lawful heir, though under such conditions and limitations as greatly augmented his own power.

But the most remarkable event in the reign of Ethelbert, was the introduction of the Christian religion. The Britons had, for several centuries, enjoyed the light of the gospel; but the Saxons were still involved in the thickest night of ignorance and error. They worshipped a plurality of gods, and had blended with their own the grossest superstitions of other nations. Their principal deity was Woden, the god of war, from whom they pretended their ancestors were descended, and to whose assistance they were indebted for all their victories. But, as their religion had no political institutions to support it, and many of their brethren on the continent had exchanged its absurdities for the precepts of the gospel, they were induced to entertain no very favourable opinion of the religion of their ancestors, and prepared to listen to the arguments brought in support of another.

Ethelbert had, for some time, been married to Bertha, the daughter of Caribert, king of Paris; and it was stipulated by the marriage articles, that she should enjoy the free exercise of her own religion. Adorned with all the charms peculiar to her sex, and with the unaffected piety which adds a lustre to greatness, greatness, she was at once beloved and adored by the king and his whole court. She was attended by Luidhard, a prelate venerable at once for his learning and a life of exemplary goodness. The church of St. Martin, built in the time of the Romans, was allotted to Bertha for the exercise of her religion; and there the pious Luidhard preached the doctrines of the gospel to very crowded audiences. The Saxon nobility listened with pleasure to his eloquent and pathetic discourses, and several of them became converts to christianity. These favourable circumstances induced pope Gregory the great to entertain the pleasing hopes of being able to destroy the superstitious worship of the Saxons and establish on its ruins the tenets of the gospel. To execute this noble design, he sent Augustin or Austin, with four other monks, on a mission to the court of Ethelbert. But the monks, on their arrival in France, were so intimidated by the accounts they received of the ferocious manners of the Saxons, their consummate ignorance, and their superstitious attachment to the religion of their ancestors, that Austin thought proper to suspend the expedition, till he received orders from his holiness. Gregory saw the dangers which threatened the missionaries, and wrote a letter to queen Brunehaut, who, though stained with the most enormous vices, was capable of promoting the interest of the church, requesting, in the most pressing manner, her assistance in this pious undertaking. He solicited not in vain. Brunehaut exerted all her power to render the attempt successful; and furnished the missionaries with interpreters from among the Franks, who still spoke the language of the Saxons.

K. ETHELBERT & Q. BERTHA

A. D. 597. Furnished with interpreters, and letters to queen Bertha, recommending the monks to her protection, Austin and his followers embarked on their mission, and, after a short passage, landed in the isle of Thanet. He immediately dispatched a messenger to court, informing the king of the intention of his coming, and requesting his permission to preach the doctrine of the gospel publicly. Ethelbert, without either granting or denying his petition, ordered him to continue in the isle of Thanet, and soon after came thither in person, with his queen, attended by his whole court. The stupidity of this prince, though the most learned and polite of all the Saxon potentates, was so great, that he received the missionaries in the open air, in order to break the force of their enchantments, should they employ magic and sorcery against him. The monks advanced to audience with a slow and solemn pace, chanting their litanies with all the marks of unaffected devotion. Austin explained the doctrines of the gospel, with which Ethelbert seemed deeply affected, but without declaring himself convinced of the great truths delivered by the missionary. He, however, granted him permission to preach them openly to his people. Austin acquitted himself nobly; and added strength to his doctrines, by the austerities of his life. The Saxons were persuaded that the followers of a religion which mortified every passion, must act from conviction; and that the tenets they professed must be founded on a basis more than human. Ethelbert was convinced of the truth of the gospel, and suffered himself to be baptized. The example of kings is always powerful. The nobles and people flocked to Austin, and the christian religion triumphed over the idolatry of the Saxons. Austin was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury; the churches that had fallen to decay were repaired; the heathen temples were consecrated to the worship of the true God, and a seminary of learning was opened in the capital of Kent.

A similarity of sentiments in religion is generally productive of civil connections. This observation was now sufficiently verified. The Anglo-Saxons opened an intercourse with the nations on the continent, and from them conceived an idea of more cultivated manners. They saw the many advantages that resulted from a polite and generous behaviour; from connections founded on virtue; from reciprocal acts of kindness and benevolence; and wished to imitate the practice. Ethelbert, desirous of promoting the happiness of his people, enacted a body of laws, and caused them to be written and published, that none might plead ignorance of the contents. The remaining part of the reign of Ethelbert, is marked with no transaction of importance, except the death of the virtuous Bertha: no disturbance happened; his people were happy, and Ethelbert, after a prosperous reign of fifty-two years, paid the debt of nature in the bosom of peace and tranquillity.

A. D. 616. Eadbald ascended the throne on the death of his father. But blinded with an incestuous passion for his mother-in-law, he abandoned his religion, that he might indulge his criminal excesses without restraint. Many of the nobility followed his example, and the tenets of the gospel were in danger of falling a sacrifice to heathen superstition. Laurentius, the successor of Austin, found means to prevent so dreadful a misfortune. Fearless of danger when religion demanded his assistance, he laboured with the utmost assiduity to make Eadbald sensible of the enormity of his vices; and at last succeeded. Convinced by the arguments of Laurentius, he renounced the pagan religion, divorced his incestuous consort, and became a remarkable penitent for his crimes. He demolished the idolatrous temples, broke the statues of the gods in pieces, and firmly established the christian religion in his kingdom. He extended his care for the interest of the gospel beyond the limits of his territories; he greatly contributed by the force of his arguments, and more by his exemplary piety, to the conversion of Edwin, king of Mercia. He died after a reign of twenty-four years; with the character of an excellent and pious prince; beloved by his subjects, and revered for his virtues, even by the pagan monarchs of the heptarchy.

This kingdom continued in the royal line of the founder till the year 794; but no event that deserves the notice of historians happened after the death of Eadbald. On the extinction of the Hengist family, the kingdom was rent with factions, and the crown became the sport of fortune. The towns were laid in ashes, and the fields manured with the blood of their owners. Nor were these troubles terminated, till Egbert united in his person the seven crowns of the Saxon heptarchy; after Kent had continued a distinct and separate kingdom during an interval of 372 years.

The Kingdom of SUSSEX, or the SOUTH SAXONS.

THIS small kingdom, which contained only the county of Sussex and part of Surry, makes the least figure of any in the Saxon heptarchy. Its whole extent was inconsiderable; and a very large part of this little territory was covered with woods and forests. At the same time it was but thinly inhabited, and therefore incapable of making any effectual resistance against the attempts of an enterprising enemy.

It has been already observed, that this kingdom was founded by Ella, who landed at the head of a considerable reinforcement, to strengthen the interest of Hengist. He died after a reign of twenty-three years. Ella was possessed of great military talents, and, on the death of Hengist, placed at the head of the Saxon heptarchy.

A. D. 514. Cissa, the only son of Ella, succeeded him in the throne; but did not possess the abilities of his father. He built the city of Chichester, and laboured incessantly to promote the happiness and tranquillity of his subjects. He engaged not in the quarrels of the heptarchy, nor endeavoured to conquer any of the territories of his neighbours. This placable disposition prevented his kingdom from becoming a scene of war and desolation. His age, and the length of his reign were both uncommon; they were both extended beyond the common limits of mankind. He paid the debt of nature after a peaceful reign of seventy-six years, and in the one hundred and seventeenth year of his age.

A. D. 590. On the death of Cissa, who left no issue, the crown was seized by Ceaulin, king of the West-Saxons, which occasioned a confederacy to be formed against him, as has been already mentioned in the history of Kent. After this event the kingdom of Sussex was subject to several revolutions; and, at length, totally subdued and united to that of the West-Saxons in the year 754.

The Kingdom of WESSEX, or the WEST SAXONS.

NONE of the Saxon kingdoms met with greater opposition in their infancy than that of Wessex. Cerdic, one of the greatest generals among the Saxons, found two powerful enemies in Ambrosius and Arthur; nor was he able to establish his kingdom till after the death of these two great leaders, who for several years supported the falling liberties of their country. With them the powerful resistance terminated; and Cerdic sat down in peace on the throne he had founded in the blood of an innocent people. He paid the debt of nature about sixty-one years after his arrival in England, and left the Saxons in possession of the estates they had wrested from the inhabitants.

A. D. 540. Kenrick, the son of Cerdic, ascended the throne on the death of his father. He came with him from Germany, and was very instrumental in defeating the Britons, and settling the kingdom. His reign, after the death of his father, was an interval of peace; no enemy made any attack upon his territories, no restless subjects disturbed his tranquillity: he died in peace, after holding the sceptre of Wessex four years.

A. D. 544. He was succeeded by his eldest son Ceaulin, who inherited the military abilities and ferocious passions of his grandfather, but without his milder virtues. His sole delight was war: he had no regard to the justice of his cause; the cries of a people, who never injured him, were fruitless and vain. He first turned his arms against the Britons who inhabited the counties of Devon and Cornwall; and laid great part of their country waste. But the territories of the ancient inhabitants was a field too small to circumscribe the ambition of Ceaulin. He formed a design of making himself master of the whole heptarchy: he could not bear the thoughts of an equal; he grasped at the sceptre of a kingdom, whose bounds were those of the whole island. Warmed with the dreams of general monarchy in Britain, and fearless of the danger that must oppose his progress, he marched his victorious army into Sussex, and soon became master of that little kingdom. But conquest now forsook the standard of Ceaulin. Alarmed at his progress, and exasperated at his conduct, the Saxon states entered into a confederacy to blast his laurels. Ethelbert, king of Kent, led the combined army against the invader, and totally defeated him. The cruelty of his disposition had alienated from him the affections of his subjects; they obeyed him only from fear. This defeat, therefore, could not be retrieved. He was driven from his kingdom, and died in misery.

A. D. 568. The victorious Ethelbert placed Ceolric, the nephew of Ceaulin on the throne of Wessex. He was entirely devoted to his benefactor, and had even joined the confederacy against his uncle; but nothing further is recorded of his reign, except that his kingdom enjoyed an uninterrupted peace while he filled the throne of Cerdic.

A. D. 597. Ceolwulph, the nephew of Ceolric, was placed in the seat of power, on the death of his uncle. The military abilities of this prince were great, and his talents for government equally conspicuous. His whole reign was one continued interval of war. He courted peace indeed, but she fled from him. Ever active and vigilant, he supported the dignity of his kingdom, and even enlarged the boundaries, though surrounded by powerful enemies. His most formidable opposer was Redwald, king of East-Anglia; then at the head of the Saxon confederacy. The contest between them was violent and bloody; but Ceolwulph at last prevailed, though he did not long enjoy the honours he had acquired. He died before he could reduce the South Saxons to obedience.

A. D. 611. Ceolwulph dying without issue, Kinegils, or Cinegils, his nephew, obtained the throne of Cerdic; and, in the first year of his reign, associated his brother Quinchelm with him in the government; and they reigned together in the greatest harmony. During two years the kingdom enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but at the end of that interval, the Britons began to make inroads into the territories of the Saxons. Roused by the injuries received from the enemy, Kinegil and Quinchelm advanced at the head of their forces, and met the invaders near Bindon in Dorsetshire. A dreadful battle ensued, in which the Britons were totally defeated, and above two thousand of them killed upon the spot.

BERINUS. Converting the SAXONS to Christianity.

A.D. 634. Though the Christian religion had, for some years, been planted in the kingdom of Kent, yet the West Saxons were still immersed in all the errors of Pagan superstition. The torch of truth had not yet been lighted up in this part of the island, to dispel the darkness of bigotry and error. But the period was now arrived when the absurd worship of the Saxons should be abolished, and the true religion established in its stead. Berenius, an Italian ecclesiastic, after being consecrated by the pope, was sent into Britain, to assist in converting the Saxons to christianity. Kinegils listened to the preaching of Berenius, declared himself convinced of the truth of the gospel, and was immediately baptized. His example was followed by numbers of his subjects; churches were erected for the worship of the true God; the heathen temples were, in many places, demolished; and Berenius was invested with an episcopal character as bishop of York. Quinchelm did not, however, follow the example of Kinegils immediately; but being seized with a violent fever, embraced the faith, and died immediately after his baptism. Kinegils survived his brother about eight years, and laboured incessantly to promote the happiness of his people.

A.D. 643. Kenwaloch, or Kenwal, succeeded his father Kinegils in the throne, but was a stranger to his virtues. Headstrong, cruel, and voluptuous, he at once oppressed and impoverished his people. He embraced christianity with his father, but was not guided by its precepts. Soon after his accession to the throne, he married one of the sisters of Penda, king of Mercia; but, not long after, he repudiated his wife, without assigning the least reason for his conduct, and renounced his religion. Exasperated at the affront offered to his sister, Penda, without giving him time to prepare for a defence, entered his dominions at the head of a powerful army, laid great part of his kingdom waste, and obliged Kenwal himself to fly to Annas, king of East-Anglia, for protection. Penda took possession of the kingdom of Wessex, and kept it three years. During that interval, Annas laboured incessantly to render Kenwal ashamed of his vices: he happily succeeded; Kenwal again professed himself a christian, and was, by the assistance of Annas, replaced on the throne of his ancestors.

A.D. 652. He was hardly fixed in the seat of power, before a rebellion broke out in his kingdom, and once more threatened him with exile. But the insurgents were too hasty in their measures: they engaged the royal army near Bradford, in Wiltshire, before they were joined by their friends in different parts of the kingdom, and were totally defeated.

A.D. 658. But though the rebellion was thus happily extinguished, peace was not yet restored to this distracted kingdom. The Britons had long waited for an opportunity of retaliating on the Saxons the many injuries they had received, and thought this a fortunate moment for striking the blow. Accordingly they invaded the kingdom of Wessex, committing the most dreadful outrages in their route. Kenwal collected all his forces, and took the field at the head of a powerful army, determined, if possible, to bring the enemy to a general engagement. He marched, with the greatest expedition, towards the place where the Britons had committed the greatest disorders; but, as he was passing along the declivity of a hill called Pine, in Shropshire, the Britons fell with so much fury upon his army, that the Saxons were obliged to give way, and victory seemed ready to desert the standards of Kenwal. But the Saxons recovering from their surprise, closed their ranks, and attacked the Britons with so much intrepidity, that they were obliged to seek their safety in a precipitate flight.

A.D. 661. Tranquillity was not, however, yet the lot of Kenwal. He was hardly returned from chastising the Britons, before his dominions were invaded by Wulphur, king of Mercia. The two armies met at Pontesbury, in Shropshire, and a furious engagement ensued. But the event of the battle is uncertain: some historians positively say, that Kenwal was defeated; while others assert, that he gained the victory. But however that be, this battle was productive of a peace, which soon after took place between the two kingdoms.

Kenwal now enjoyed some respite from the fatigues of war. Misfortunes and adversity had convinced him of his errors. He applied himself, in the evening of age, to make some amends to his subjects for the cruelties he had committed in the morning of youth. He built the cathedral church of St. Peter at Winchester, which soon after became the see of a bishop. But he did not long enjoy this interval of tranquillity. He was desirous of conciliating the affections of his people: but, before he could entirely effect it, death put a period at once to his labours and his life. He died without issue, and left his kingdom to his wife Saxeburga.

A.D. 672. Few women were better qualified to hold the reins of government than that princess. Intrepid by nature; of a piercing genius, improved by an excellent education, she held the sceptre with honour to herself, and advantage to her country. The good of her people was her principal care. Vigilant and careful to provide for the safety of her dominions, she gave her enemies no advantage, nor did she attempt to invade the territories of others. But her subjects did not long enjoy the happiness of her protection; she paid the debt of nature after a short reign of twelve months.

A.D. 674. On the death of Saxeburga, Efwinn, descended from one of the collateral branches of the Cerdic family, ascended the throne of Wessex: but the fury of parties was now arrived to such a pitch, that he was obliged to share his power with Kentwin, brother to the late Kenwal. For some time they enjoyed the crown in peace; but the restless ambition of the Saxon princes would not suffer any potentate to enjoy a long series of tranquillity. Wulphur, king of Mercia, once more invaded the kingdom of the West Saxons. Efwinn, who commanded the army, marched at the head of his forces, and met the Mercian troops at Bedwin, in Wiltshire. The contest was long doubtful; at last victory declared for the Mercians; but the advantage had been so dearly purchased, that Wulphur was in no condition to continue in the territories of the enemy. Efwinn survived this battle only two years, when he paid the debt of nature, and left the throne to Kentwin.

A.D. 676. Historians have been silent with regard to the Mercian war. Probably a peace was concluded soon after the defeat of Efwinn; because we find Kentwin, soon after the death of his partner in the throne, was at leisure to lead his army against the Britons, whom he defeated, and obliged their king, Cadwallader, to pass over into Bretagne to procure assistance. While Kentwin was employed in his wars with the Britons, his nephew, Ceadwalla, formed a scheme for seizing the crown; but before his plot was ripe for execution, Kentwin returned to his capital, and obliged Ceadwalla to fly for safety to the forest of Anderwald, in Suffex. Here he was joined by great numbers from Kentwin's army, and committed the most inhuman barbarities on the inhabitants of that small kingdom.

A.D. 686. On the death of Kentwin, Ceadwalla was placed on the throne of Cerdic. This acquisition of power enabled him to prosecute his brutal ravages with more success. He invaded the Isle of Wight, and committed such cruelties as are shocking to human nature. He had not indeed yet embraced the doctrines of Christianity, though he had been very liberal to the church; a species of devotion, which, in that ignorant age, was thought a sufficient atonement for the greatest crimes. Soon after his conversion, he repaired to Rome, where he was publicly baptized by Sergius II. who then filled the the papal chair; but survived the ceremony only a few days. He was buried in St. Peter's church, where his tomb may still be seen; and, from a pompous inscription engraven on it, we learn, that he was only in his thirtieth year when he died.

A. D. 689. When Ceadwalla departed from England, he resigned his crown to Ina, his nephew, though he had two sons, then in their infancy. Ina was one of those princes who deserves to be mentioned with honour amidst a multitude of barbarous wretches, many of whom were a scandal to humanity. He had united in his person the civil and the military virtues. He was formed to shine either in the council or the field; to lead his people to conquest, or teach them to cultivate the arts of peace. His abilities were so conspicuous, that he had not sat a year upon the throne before he was elected chief of the Saxon confederacy. He composed a body of laws, which, in the next century, formed the basis of those enacted by Alfred the Great. After conquering the Britons in Somersetshire, he did not follow the inhuman custom of his predecessors, of exterminating the people; he treated them with kindness, permitted them to retain their possessions, and incorporated them with his subjects by intermarriages, and the allurement of equal laws.

After a glorious reign of thirty-seven years, he made a pilgrimage to Rome; and, during his residence in that city, he erected the English college; and, for the support of that seminary, imposed a tax upon his subjects, afterwards called Peter's-pence. This was the last act of his reign. He resigned his sceptre, took the habit of a monk, and died in obscurity. His wife followed his example; she took the veil, and spent the evening of her life in a monastery.

A. D. 727. Ethelhard, to whom Ina had resigned his crown, found a powerful competitor in Oswald, a branch of the royal family. He was supported by many of the nobility, and appeared at the head of a powerful army. Ethelhard, who was a stranger to fear, led those troops, who had learned to conquer under the standards of Ina, against the usurper. A furious battle ensued, in which the forces of Oswald were totally defeated. Peace was immediately restored; and Ethelhard enjoyed an uninterrupted series of tranquillity, till death put an end to his life in the seventeenth year of his reign.

A. D. 733. On the death of Ethelhard, Cuthred, his relation, was placed on the throne of Mercia. Peace seemed now to have taken her flight from the territories of the West Saxons; tumult and disorder marked the whole reign of Cuthred. The ferocious nobility conspired against him, and his son fell a victim to their envy. The standard of rebellion was now displayed, and the army of the insurgents was headed by Edelhun, the most able general of his time. The royal army was far superior in numbers to that of the rebels; but, animated by the example, and conducted by the prudence of Edelhun, they attacked the forces of Cuthred with such fury, that victory was on the point of declaring in their favour, when unfortunately their intrepid leader was dangerously wounded. Confusion, instead of order, was now conspicuous in the army of the rebels. Cuthred improved the disorder, and drove them from the field with great slaughter. Edelhun was taken prisoner, but his abilities recommended him so strongly to Cuthred, that he not only granted him his pardon, but made him general of his own forces. Headed by Edelhun, the West Saxons were invincible; wherever they turned their arms, they conquered. The flames of rebellion were suppressed; and the nobles, intimidated by the power of the army, buried their animosities in the grave of circumspection. But it was in vain to expect tranquillity while the island was divided into so many petty kingdoms, without any barrier to prevent the incursions of the borderers. Ethelbald, king of Mercia, one of those restless spirits who are never contented with their fortune, entered the territories of Cuthred, and committed all the excesses that might be expected from so ferocious a leader, who had already ravaged the kingdoms of Kent, Essex, and East-Anglia. But his victorious forces could not intimidate the spirit of Edelhun; he led the army of Cuthred against the enemy, and, after an obstinate engagement, obtained the victory. Ethelbald fled with precipitation to his kingdom; and Edelhun turned his arms against the Britons, and united part of Cornwall to the dominions of West-Sax. In the midst of these successes, Cuthred paid the debt of nature, and left his crown to Sigebert, his nephew.

A. D. 755. Sigebert was but a youth when he mounted the throne; and might have reigned in peace, would he have listened to the voice of reason. But he scorned to be directed by those whom age and experience had taught wisdom. Headstrong, violent, and proud, he treated his nobles with insolence, and his people with inhumanity. He trampled upon the laws, and made his own will the rule of his government. Destitute of merit himself, he became the professed enemy of all who, for their superior abilities, were regarded with honour by the people. Sigebert was often warned of the consequences that must soon attend his conduct; but he was deaf to advice, and laughed at the cautious counsel of his friends. Exasperated by continual acts of tyranny, the people flew to arms, and were joined by the nobles. Sigebert saw the gathering storm, but wanted power to break its force. His friends had deserted him, and he could place no confidence in his troops. He saw Kinewulf, a prince of the same family, advancing against him at the head of the people, and immediately abandoned a throne he wanted courage to defend. He fled to duke Cumbran, at that time governor of a large district of Hampshire; and with him he might have ended his days in peace, had his reverse of fortune taught him to govern his headstrong passions; but this was a virtue to which Sigebert was a stranger. Cumbran still continued his inseparable friend, and endeavoured to reclaim him from those vices which had deprived him of his crown. Exasperated at what he considered as a flagrant act of disrespect, Sigebert put his benefactor to death. This inhuman action rendered Sigebert detested by those who had hitherto followed his fortunes; they abandoned him to his fate. He saw his danger, and fled to the forest of Anderwald, and there fell by the ignoble hand of a swine-herd.

Kinewulf, who now filled the throne, had a genius naturally turned to war, and defeated the Britons in several engagements; but was routed by Offa, king of Mercia, and lost all his tenetaries on the north side of the Thames. This reverse of fortune encouraged Kynchard, the brother of Sigebert, to attempt the recovery of the crown, which had been usurped by Kinewulf; but not having force sufficient to attack him in the open field, he hovered on the borders of the kingdom, in order to embrace the first favourable opportunity for carrying his design into execution, and revenging on Kinewulf the death of his brother. Several months passed without the least prospect of success. At last he was informed that Kinewulf often paid secret visits to a lady at Merton in Surry; and Kynchard determined to surprise him during one of those interviews. Accordingly he surrounded the house, and found means to penetrate to the door of the apartment where the king was, before his attendants were alarmed. Kinewulf was the first who perceived the danger; he ran hastily to his arms, and defended the door with the greatest bravery; but perceiving Kynchard among the assassins, he lost his usual presence of mind, and rushed upon the assassin; but before he could dispatch him, he fell, covered with wounds. Alarmed with the noise, the king's attendants ran to the assistance of their master, and were all of them put to death. Kynchard himself had been so desperately wounded by Kinewulf, that he was in no condition to make his escape. The news of this cruel assassination reached Kingston early the next morning; when the principal inhabitants, headed by Oseric, flew to Merton, where they found the conspirators had barricaded the house, in order to defend themselves to the last extremity. Kynchard endeavoured to divert the storm which was ready to burst upon him; by large offers, but all his promises were in vain; Oseric, at the head of his company, demolished the barricadoes, and cut every one of the regicides to pieces.

A. D. 784. Brithwick, a descendant from the great Cerdic, was placed in the seat of power on the death of Kinewulf. He was a lover of the arts of peace, and cultivated them with success. He considered war as one of the greatest scourges of heaven, and did every thing in the world to divert it from his people. But all his virtues were tinged with jealousy. The order of succession to the throne, was not at that time nicely regarded; and Brithwick was advanced to the seat of power, though his title was inferior in point of blood to that of Egbert, a prince equally distinguished by his merits and his birth. Brithwick knew this, and could not behold the great talents of Egbert without envy. His increasing popularity heightened the disgust, and Egbert soon perceived that he could not long continue in the court of Brithwick with safety. He knew it would be madness to contend singly with power; and wicked to involve his country in the miseries of a civil war. He therefore privately withdrew to the court of Charlemagne, then the most polished and polite in Europe. Under that hero he learned the art of war, his ferocious manners were softened, and his talents unfolded. The misfortunes of his youth were of the utmost advantage to himself and his country.

While Egbert was thus acquiring wisdom and experience under a foreign prince, Brithwick was employed in rendering his people happy. He married Eadburga, daughter to Offa, king of Mercia. She was insidious, incontinent, insolent and cruel. She scrupled not to sacrifice every thing to the gratification of her passions. A young nobleman having incurred her displeasure, she determined to avenge the affront. Nothing less than the life of the offender could satisfy her vengeance. She kept the secret concealed in her own breast, till an opportunity offered for executing her infernal design. She did not wait long; the nobleman was Brithwick's particular favourite, and frequently with him. One evening as they were drinking together, the treacherous Eadburga mixed poison in a cup of wine and gave it to the victim of her revenge. Unfortunately for Brithwick, he drank some of the wine, and they both expired together. Conscious that her crime must render her obnoxious to the people, she fled to the continent; and, after a series of misfortunes, died in misery.

Upon the death of Brithwick, it was determined to recall Egbert from the court of Charlemagne, in order to take possession of the throne of his ancestors. He immediately complied with their request; and, on his arrival, received the crown of Cerdic from a people that loved and honoured his virtues. This great prince, soon after his accession to the throne, put a final period to the Saxon heptarchy, and became the first king of England; but the manner in which he acquired the sceptre of England must be deferred to the succeeding book, where we shall resume the history of this celebrated prince.

THE KINGDOM OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

IT has been already observed, that a body of Saxons settled in this country, while Hengist was closely pressed by the Britons; but that Ida was the first who assumed the title of king, after he had founded the kingdom of Bernicia, which was not till near one hundred years after the first settlement of the Saxons. Ida was a brave and generous prince; equally great in council and the field. As a general he was intrepid and prudent: as a governor, equitable and humane. He fought many battles with the Britons, and was at last slain by Owen, prince of the Cumbrians. But some years before this misfortune, another party of Saxons landed in the north, and subdued the southern parts of Yorkshire and Lancashire. These formed themselves into a province called Deira, of which Ella, one of the Saxon leaders, assumed the title of king.

The Saxons were long opposed by the famous Arthur, who has been immortalized enough to be celebrated by so many fabulous writers, that his true history can hardly be known. He was born about the year 496, and nearly related to Ambrosius Aurelianus. In the year 516, he was appointed to command an army, raised to put a stop to the ravages of the Saxons; and in order to procure him more respect from the soldiers, he was crowned king of Gwent, a name then given to the country lying between the Wye and the Severn. His generosity, personal bravery, and assiduous care to promote the happiness of his soldiers, soon procured him large reinforcements; and his success against the invaders of his country was so remarkable, that the most sanguine expectations of his subjects were fully answered. But though he was often victorious, he was not always so; nor was it in the power of any hero, however great, to drive the Saxons out of Britain. He stopped their progress, and often defeated their armies, though commanded by the most able generals.

During one of his expeditions against the Saxons of Northumberland, Madred, his nephew, whom he left guardian of his patrimonial dominions, usurped the throne. Arthur returned, engaged him in several battles; and, at last, in a decisive one fought near Camlen, slew him with his own hand; but he himself received a mortal wound, of which he died, after a reign of twenty-six years, and was universally lamented by his subjects.

The histories of these times are silent with regard to the first five descendants of Ida; their names are indeed mentioned, but without any account of their virtues, their vices, their governments or their wars.

A. D. 586. Ethelfrid, one of the descendants of Ida, was a brave and active prince, but haughty and cruel; he married Acca, the only daughter of Ella, and on the death of that prince, seized on the kingdom of Deira, which he united to his own dominions, forming by that means the kingdom of Northumberland. Ella left an infant son, called Edwin, but Ethelfrid paid no regard to equity: young Edwin himself would have fallen a victim to his ambition, had not his guardians conveyed him to the court of Cadwan, king of North Wales, where he received an excellent education.

This acquisition rendered Ethelfrid one of the most powerful monarchs in the Saxon heptarchy. His restless temper would not permit him to sit down contented with this large addition to his kingdom. The love of conquest induced him to invade the territories of his neighbours. The Britons first felt the power of his arms. He laid great part of their country waste, and penetrated at the head of his victorious army to the gates of Chester. Alarmed at the progress of the army, and exasperated at the cruelties cruelties exercised on their countrymen, the Britons took the field, and advanced to meet the ferocious invader. A body of twelve hundred and fifty monks from the monastery of Bangor accompanied the army to animate the soldiers by their prayers and exhortations. Ethelfrid was surprised to see so large a body of men without arms, and asked the reason for so unusual an appearance. He was answered, that they were priests who were come out to pray for the destruction of his army. "Then", said he, "they are as much our enemies as those that employ their swords for our destruction", and immediately detached a party, who cut their monkish battalion to pieces. Astonished at this unexpected fate of their priests, the Romans made a precipitate flight. Chester was taken, and the famous monastery of Bangor levelled to its foundations. This religious structure, according to Bede, contained two thousand one hundred monks, who, according to the respectable custom of religious orders in those early times, maintained themselves by their own labour, and thence a benefit, instead of a burden, to their country.

A. D. 616. The great abilities of young Edwin now became conspicuous; he was admired and beloved. These qualities awoke the jealousy of Ethelfrid; he saw the dawning virtues of Edwin, and dreaded the consequence of their meridian lustre. The young prince perceived his danger, and repaired for safety to different princes of the Saxon heptarchy. At last he found an asylum in the court of Redwald, king of the East-Angles. The great power of that prince increased the fears of Ethelfrid. The usurper, conscious of his own flagitious conduct, was alarmed when innocence had found a protector. He had recourse to promises and threats, in order to induce Redwald to abandon Edwin. The East-Anglian prince, for some time, resolutely rejected all his messages; but at last seemed disposed to sacrifice at the shrine of interest, the rights of hospitality. Edwin perceived his hesitation, but took no precautions for his safety; persuaded that it was better to perish at the court of East-Anglia, than become a wretched exile, without friends and without support. The queen of East-Anglia was struck with his generous confidence: she pleaded strongly in behalf of innocence in distress; and revived in the heart of her husband the sentiments of friendship and of honour. At the same time, Redwald well knew the implacable and cruel disposition of Ethelfrid, and wisely determined to prevent its effects. He collected a powerful army, and marched directly into the territories of Northumberland. His army was divided into three bodies; the first was led by his son Reyner, the second he headed in person, and the third was commanded by Edwin. Reyner received orders to advance in order to secure a pass; but the impetuosity of his courage carried him too far for him to be properly supported in case of an attack. Ethelfrid, on the first information that Redwald had entered his kingdom, marched with the utmost expedition to meet him, and falling upon the advanced guard commanded by Reyner, routed them, and slew the prince with his own hand. Redwald, irritated almost to madness at the loss of his son, attacked the Northumberland army with so much fury, that they were unable to sustain the shock; they gave way and fled with the utmost precipitation. Ethelfrid exerted all his power to rally his broken forces, and lead them once more against the enemy; but perceiving all his efforts were in vain, he rushed furiously into the midst of Redwald's forces, and was slain. His body was found in the midst of a heap of enemies killed by his own hand. He still breathed, and his features still maintained that fierceness of soul, which they had expressed during the vigour of his life.

A. D. 618. Edwin was now placed upon the throne of Northumberland, and soon became distinguished for his impartial administration of justice. He reclaimed his subjects from a licentious life of rapine and disorder, to which they had been long habited. The troops, of robbers that infested the roads of Northumberland were dispersed, so that even a woman might travel from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, without any danger of being insulted. His people were happy; they loved him as a father, and were ready to sacrifice their lives in his service. A remarkable instance of this fidelity is recorded by historians. Quinchelm, prince of the West-Saxons, having been defeated by Edwin, determined to destroy by treachery a monarch he found himself incapable of defeating in the open field. One Eumer, a wretch who entertained no idea of virtue, undertook to assassinate Edwin. He found means to obtain admission to his presence, and drawing a dagger to execute the detestable crime, Lilla, one of Edwin's ministers, interposed with his body between them, received the blow, and died with the glory of having saved the life of his illustrious prince.

Soon after Edwin ascended the throne of Northumberland, he married Ethelburga daughter to Ethelbert king of Kent. But the prince's being a christian and Edwin a pagan, it was stipulated in the marriage articles, that she should enjoy the free exercise of her own religion, and be permitted to retain in her service Paulinus, a christian bishop, and such other attendants as should be thought necessary for performing the offices of christianity with decency. Paulinus was a person of great learning and parts, and well qualified for enforcing the doctrines of the gospel with reason and argument. Ethelburga, whose life was an exemplary pattern of virtue and conjugal affection, and who possessed all the zeal and piety of her mother Bertha, exerted herself successfully in establishing christianity in the kingdom of Northumberland. Struck with the amiable virtues of Ethelburga, and charmed with her humane and tender disposition, Edwin listened, with great attention, to her exhortations; but, like a wise prince, he carefully examined the foundations of the christian doctrine. Paulinus satisfied all his scruples: and Edwin, after mature consideration, declared himself a convert. Choisi, the pagan high-priest, followed his example, and was the first to demolish the idols he had so long worshipped. Edwin was baptized at York, with many of his nobles; by Paulinus, in a church built on this occasion, and dedicated to St. Peter. Among barbarians the example of the prince is always followed by the people. The Northumbrians flocked in such multitudes to be baptized by Paulinus, that the church was too small for the purpose; the prelate was obliged to perform the ceremony in the rivers Gleni and Swale.

A. D. 633. The religion of Edwin being founded on conviction, he exerted all his power to establish it in every part of his kingdom. This greatly promoted the popularity of Edwin; he was beloved and adored by his subjects, they considered him both as their temporal and spiritual father. His power increased, which the neighbouring princes could not behold without envy. Penda, king of Mercia, a prince of a savage, bold, restless and enterprising spirit, who made no scruple of trampling on the laws of virtue, equity and honour, in order to augment his power, or gratify his brutal vengeance, joined his forces with those of Cadwallon, king of the Britons, and invaded Northumberland. They had advanced as far as Hatfield forest in Yorkshire, and committed the most dreadful outrages, before Edwin was informed of their having entered his kingdom. Penetrated with the distress of his people and enraged at the perfidy of the enemy, he marched at the head of an inferior number of troops to give them battle, in order to terminate, as soon as possible, the miseries of his subjects. The contest was dreadful, and for some time fortune seemed inclinable to bestow on Edwin the palm of victory. At last an event determined the fate of the day. Offrid, the eldest son of Edwin, was pierced with an arrow, and fell dead at the feet of his father. Edwin, who till now led his forces with coolness and caution, was exasperated exasperated to madness by this fatal accident. He lost that steadiness and presence of mind which had rendered his forces invincible, rushed into the thickest part of the enemy, and was cut to pieces. Deprived of their leader, the Northumbrians fell into confusion, and were soon put to flight.

Penda had now an opportunity of satiating his brutal passion. The sword of destruction was drawn, and the fields deluged with the blood of their owners. Neither the tears of age, the depredations of youth, nor the plaintive supplications of the softer sex, had any power to move the pity of Penda. Cadwallon, king of the Britons, caught the infection, and rivalled, if he did not excel, even Penda in acts of brutality. The barbarities of the Christian were equal to the cruelties of the Pagan. Paulinus and Ethelburga fled into Kent, and the prelate was placed in the see of Rochester.

A. D. 635. This dreadful scene of horror and devastation continued till Oswald, the second son of Ethelfrid, born to be the deliverer of his country, put a stop to the effusion of human blood. When his father lost his life and crown by the invasion of Redwald, he fled to Scotland, where he studied the art of war with success, and also embraced the Christian religion. The calamities of his country called him from his retreat. At the head of a handful of men, he entered Northumberland, and took possession of a very advantageous post a little to the north of the wall of Severus. Here he waited the approach of Cadwallon, who despising the little army of Oswald, marched with all the security of a general retiring to his quarters. He viewed the intrenchments of the enemy, and immediately ordered a general assault. The attack was furious, but not successful; and Cadwallon, leading his forces to make a second assault, was pierced through the heart with an arrow, and fell dead on the ground. Confusion, instead of order, now reigned among the Britons. Oswald perceived the disorder, and issuing from his intrenchments at the head of his forces, put the enemy to flight, and drove them out of the kingdom with great slaughter.

Having thus retaliated on the inhuman tyrant Cadwallon the miseries he had inflicted on an innocent people, he ascended the throne of his ancestors, and applied himself to cultivate the arts of peace. His religion and virtue were equally conspicuous; and his mind was adorned with every acquisition necessary for augmenting the lustre of a throne. He observed with regret the languid state into which religion was fallen since the death of Edwin, and the flight of Paulinus; and determined, if possible, to revive the dying flame. In order to this, he invited Aidan, a person at once respectable for his learning, and venerable for his virtues, from Scotland, to assist him in this generous undertaking. Aidan immediately obeyed the summons of Oswald, and was received with all the respect due to his great merit; but as Aidan was not sufficiently acquainted with the Saxon language to undertake the task without assistance, the king himself became the interpreter of his discourses to the people. The success was equal to their most sanguine expectations. Aidan founded a bishop's see at Landisfarne, and several Scottish monks coming to his assistance, the number of their converts amazingly increased. Churches were built in most parts of Northumberland; monasteries were founded, and schools erected for the instruction of youth.

The great merit of Oswald soon rendered him conspicuous among the princes of the heptarchy, and he was chosen chief of their political confederacy. Penda, who still swayed the sceptre of Mercia, could not hear the praises that were lavished on Oswald without envy. A rival in power was not to be suffered by a tyrant actuated only by the principles of ambition. A stranger at once to the laws of justice and the principles of humanity, Penda determined to carry fire and sword among a people who had not injured him, and into the territories of a prince whose merits eclipsed his own.

A. D. 642. The designs of the malicious are dark and concealed. Penda, without the least complaint of injuries received, entered the territories of Northumberland, and ruined the country through which he passed. Oswald, who felt the distresses of his people, collected all the troops in his neighbourhood, and advanced to meet the inhuman tyrant, who so often trampled on the laws of nations. The two armies met at Maserfeld, where a furious battle ensued. But the troops of Oswald were too few, to contend in the open field with the Mercian forces, long used to conquest: they were totally routed, and Oswald himself was found among the slain. The whole kingdom was now exposed to the dreadful ravages of Penda, and the distress of the inhabitants is better imagined than described. The progress of the tyrant was at last stopped at Bambury-castle, which bid defiance to his power; and Penda directed his march towards the kingdom of East-Anglia.

From the death of Oswald, the kingdom was agitated with dissensions, under weak princes, whose actions are of very little importance to the reader: murders and assassinations compose the principal part of their history. Egfrid, indeed, who ascended the throne of Bernicia in 670, deserves to be remembered for the noble opposition he made to the papal authority. The popes had long been looked upon as sacred and infallible; but Egfrid paid no regard to their assumed infallibility. He deprived Wilfrid, bishop of York, of his bishoprick, and seized all his possessions, which were very great, and prodigiously opulent. Wilfrid appealed to the pope: the synod of Rome ordered that Wilfrid should be restored. He returned to England, and produced an authentic copy of the sentence. Egfrid, in a full council of the nobility and clergy, treated the papal ordinances and jurisdictions, not with contempt only, but also with resentment. Wilfrid, instead of being restored, or receiving any compensation, was taken into custody, and sentenced to a close imprisonment. So spirited an opposition to the see of Rome, in times so slavishly superstitious, ought to be remembered with honour. Agatho then filled the papal chair.

Few remarkable transactions happened in Northumberland after the death of Egfrid, except the deposition and murder of its princes. The people were treated with cruelty, and superstitious bigotry usurped the place of genuine religion. At last an universal anarchy prevailed; and Egbert, as I shall hereafter relate, seized the opportunity of reducing the kingdom to his authority.

THE KINGDOM OF EAST-ANGLIA.

THIS kingdom owes its name to the Angles, a people from Jutland, by whom it was founded. They were headed by several chiefs, all independent of one another; but none of their names have been preserved by historians. Uffa was the first who assumed the title of king, and this was not done till after he had been above forty years in Britain. But, from the time of his ascending the throne, till he paid the debt of nature, history is silent with regard to his exploits. His son Titel, to whom he left his sceptre, reigned in the same obscurity, though he filled the throne twenty-one years. The actions of both are sunk in oblivion.

A. D. 599. Redwald, on the death of Titel his father, ascended the throne. The actions of this prince eclipsed not only all those of his predecessors, but also most of the Saxon chiefs. He was placed at the head of the heptarchy, and filled the post with great honour and applause. He embraced christianity, but afterwards renounced it, at the instigation of his wife, who was an idolater. So many examples of temporary conversions, are a proof that christians, ill-instructed, are only christians in name; and that the labours of the ignorant missionaries of those times, if they produced their effects without difficulty, were attended with no permanent advantages. After a glorious reign of twenty years, he paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded by his son.

A. D. 624. Eorpwald, who was a weak and pusillanimous prince, appeared under great disadvantages after his illustrious father. Perhaps it would have been impossible for him to have kept the seat of royalty, had he not been supported by Edwin, king of Northumberland, in gratitude for the protection he had himself received from Redwald. Eorpwald embraced the Christian religion at the instances of Edwin; but this change of religion increased his inactivity: he was much better qualified for governing a convent than a kingdom. Richbert, one of his generals, who still continued a Pagan, was so exasperated at the conversion and pusillanimity of Eorpwald, that he assassinated him with his own hand.

After the death of Eorpwald, a long succession of obscure and inactive princes, who were either expelled, murdered, or retired into a convent, filled the throne of East-Anglia. It will be needless to mention the names of barbarians, whose actions are unworthy of being recorded in history. Sigebert alone deserves to be excepted. He established the first literary ceremony, and furnished it with able masters for teaching the sciences. His talents and learning would have adorned the throne, had he not been seized with the religious enthusiasm of the times, and preferred the habit of a monk to the robes of royalty.

A. D. 749. The last of the East-Anglian princes was Ethelbert, whose mind was adorned with the most amiable virtues. His subjects promised themselves a long series of happiness under the government of so generous and benevolent a master; at the same time they wished to render the sceptre permanent in his family. Ethelbert, who made the happiness of his people his principal care, made no opposition to their request; and a treaty of marriage was concluded between him and Althrida, daughter to Offa king of Mercia, a princess equally remarkable for her piety and accomplishments. The generous soul of Ethelbert was above suspecting others of treachery: he repaired to the court of Mercia to consummate his nuptials. But Offa had other views. Ambition had more charms than virtue. He was determined to annex the East-Anglian kingdom to his own, though at the price of every thing held dear by mankind. He violated the sacred rights of hospitality and honour; he caused the innocent, the unsuspecting Ethelbert, to be assassinated, and seized upon his kingdom; which, after this period, was united with that of Mercia.

THE KINGDOM OF MER CIA.

MERCIA was, by far, the largest and most opulent kingdom of the Saxon heptarchy. It was founded by Crida, a descendant from Withelga, the second son of Woden. He held the sceptre only two years; and, on his death, Ethelbert, king of Kent, seized upon the Mercian territories, as the descendant of Hengist, the first Saxon king. Three years after, however, he resigned the crown to Webba, one of the sons of Crida. He was a very indolent prince; and though he held the sceptre nineteen years, he performed nothing worthy of being recorded in history. At his death, he left his kingdom to Penda, his son. But Ethelbert, who still filled the Kentish throne, fearing the restless ambition and turbulent temper of Penda would involve the whole heptarchy in confusion and distress, seized the crown a second time, and conferred it on Ceorl, a nephew of the late king. Ceorl reigned eight years, but left no traces of his government: his actions, whatever they were, like those of his predecessor, are consigned to oblivion.

A. D. 624. Penda seized the sceptre of Mercia on the death of Ceorl. He was fifty years of age when he ascended the throne, but glowed with all the fire of youth. A long series of experience had not abated his ambition; the love of conquest was still the ruling passion of his soul. His character has been already fully displayed in the histories of those kingdoms with which he was at war. He well deserved the appellation of a sanguinary tyrant. All the neighbouring states sufficiently experienced his injustice and his violence; no less than five Christian princes fell in battle by his sword. His whole reign was a scene of blood; the sword of destruction always marked the route of his enemies. It reflects an honour to christianity, that he always refused to embrace its tenets. If his portrait will admit of any softening, it is his never molesting any who became converts to the faith, provided they lived up to their profession: he was an implacable enemy to all whose actions were a contradiction to their principles.

Time seemed to have no power over Penda. The flame of ambition, which generally grows languid with age, glowed with full vigour in his breast. He planned conquests when others are tottering on the brink of the grave: and, in the eightieth year of his age, marched, at the head of his army, into Northumberland, fully determined to depopulate the country, country, render the whole kingdom a smoking desert. But victory now forsook his standards: he attacked the Northumbrian army and was slain.

A. D. 655. Peada succeeded his father in part of his dominions, and exerted himself nobly in propagating christianity in Mercia. His labours were crowned with success; the tender branch he planted during the reign of his father, now spread itself over the whole kingdom. But he did not long enjoy the crown; he fell a sacrifice to malevolence, perhaps to ambition. Some writers say, he was poisoned by his mother. At his death, Oswy, king of Northumberland, seized upon the whole Mercian territories, which he held, till Wulpher, the second son of Penda, wrested them out of his hand.

A. D. 660. Wulpher, who seems to have inherited the restless ambition of his father, was continually engaged in war, which was his darling passion. Far from being contented with his own territories, though much larger than those of any other prince of the heptarchy, he turned his arms against his neighbours. The first monarch that felt the power of his arms was Kenwalch, king of the West Saxons, whom he defeated, and over-run great part of his territories. He next attacked the Britons, and drove them from their possessions between the Severn and the Wye. He reduced the kingdoms of the East Saxons and East-Angles, to a state of vassalage, from which they never entirely recovered. But victory forsook him in the close of his reign: he was defeated by Egfrid, and he paid the debt of nature after a reign of fifteen years, leaving his crown to Kenred his son.

A. D. 675. Kenred, who was an infant at the death of his father, wanted power to hold the sceptre: his uncle Ethelred, celebrated for his military talents, wrested it from his hand. He invaded the kingdom of Kent, and laid great part of it waste. He defeated the king of Northumberland, and made himself master of Lindsey. Here he put a period to his conquests; determining to spend the remainder of his days in peace and tranquillity. Reflection now painted the former scenes of his life in different colours from what they had appeared at the head of his army. His mind was deeply affected with the gloomy superstitions of the times. He restored the crown to Kenred his nephew, from whom he had unjustly taken it, retired into the monastery of Bardney, which he himself had founded, and died in obscurity.

A. D. 705. Kenred did not long fill the throne of his ancestors. He had no talents for war; he was fonder of the indolence of private life, than the active scenes of royalty. After a reign of four years he resigned his sceptre to his uncle Ceolrid, and accompanied with his aunt Kiniswintha, and Offa, king of Essex, repaired to Rome, where they all ended their days in a cloister.

A. D. 709. Ceolrid possessed very different sentiments from his predecessor. He saw with concern the ascendancy of the monks over the mind, when tinged with the gloomy superstition of the age, and determined, if possible, to lessen their power. Accordingly, he deprived them of several of their privileges. This was abundantly sufficient to arm the whole fraternity against him. The prince, not suspecting his danger, admitted them as usual to his presence. Their vengeance was not long delayed; they poisoned his wine, and he died in the greatest torments. Nor was his death sufficient to satisfy their malice; they imputed the delirium occasioned by the strength of the poison, to his conversing with the devil, and charitably devoted his soul to eternal perdition. So dangerous was it in those times of ignorant bigotry to molest a fraternity of men, who, by living on the labour of others, became a real burden to their country.

A. D. 716. This unfortunate monarch was succeeded by Ethelbald, the grandson of Eoppa, brother to Penda. He possessed that restless ambition, which formed a part of the Saxon character. He invaded the territories of his neighbours, and filled the whole heptarchy with alarms. His abilities were great, and had they been confined to proper objects, his reign would have been glorious to himself and his people: but he deviated from the paths of honour. His manners were depraved; and a deluge of vice overspread his kingdom. This procured him a severe reproof from the pope; and to avert the threatened vengeance of heaven, he had recourse to the religious practices of the times, he founded the famous monastery of Croyland, which in magnificence far exceeded any then in Britain. He exempted the clergy from all taxes and secular services, except such as were necessary for building bridges, or repairing fortresses.

By these acts of benevolence to the church he was supposed by the clergy of that ignorant age, to have made a sufficient atonement for the inundation of immorality which had covered the kingdom. But he did not end his days in peace. A rebellion broke out among his subjects; and Ethelbald fell in a battle with the insurgents. Beornred, who headed the rebels, took possession of the throne; but the nobles, incensed at the insolence of the rabble, flew to arms, soon hurled the usurper from the seat of power, and placed Offa, the son of Eawa, brother of Penda, on the Mercian throne.

A. D. 758. Offa was one of the most distinguished of all the Mercian princes. Fortune perpetually followed his standards. He reduced the kingdom of Kent, after killing the prince with his own hand. He invaded Northumberland, and annexed the county of Nottingham to his own dominions. He conquered all the dominions of Wessex to the northward of the Thames, and made them a part of his own territories.

The Britons had, for some time, made incursions into the frontier provinces of Mercia; and committed the most dreadful disorders. Offa marched against them, drove them back into their country with great slaughter, and to prevent their incursions for the future, threw up a strong intrenchment; which began near the mouth of the river Dee in Flintshire, and running along the mountains terminated at the influx of the Wye into the Severn near Bristol. This was the most stupendous work executed during the heptarchy; part of it still remains, and is known by the name of Offa's dyke.

The character of Offa was now raised to the greatest height. The lustre of his victories, added to the merit of some good qualities, made the world willing, for some time, to overlook his vices. He perceived the advantages of commerce, and gave every encouragement in his power to the merchants of his country. Charlemagne thought him worthy of his friendship, sent him several presents, and remitted his subjects some duties which had before been usually paid. But he stained his laurels by basely assassinating Ethelbert, king of East-Anglia. That young prince, allured by the invitations of the perfidious Offa, came to the Mercian court to espouse his daughter. He was received with every appearance of friendship and esteem, but amidst the joy of what he fancied was his nuptial entertainment, the cruel Offa caused him to be put to death, and immediately made himself master of his dominions.

A. D. 792. Awakened by the stings of conscience, and desirous of re-establishing his character among his people, he had recourse to the superstitious customs of that age to expiate his crime. He enriched the cathedral of Hereford; he gave the tenth of all his goods to the church; and undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, where he received absolution from the pope. In return for this favour, he established in his dominions an annual tax called Peter's-pence, because it amounted to a penny each family. This tax, after the union of the seven kingdoms, was levied all over England, and exacted as a tribute by the Roman pontiffs, till the reign of Henry VIII. who demolished at once that tribute, and the pope's authority.

On his return to England, he erected the magnificent monastery of St. Albans, where he resided some years in the quality of a steward, and died in obscurity. These, and other acts of piety, completely expiated all his crimes in the opinion of his subjects. Moral excellence or perfection was less regarded, in those times of ignorant bigotry, than the founding of religious houses, and the exterior practices of devotion.

A. D. 794. Egfrid, his son, ascended the Mercian throne on the death of his father; and, from some of the first acts of his reign, the people promised to themselves a long series of happiness: but their hopes were soon rendered abortive: Egfrid held the sceptre only five months, when he paid the debt of nature, amidst the tears and lamentations of his subjects.

Kenulf, descended from a collateral branch of the Penda family, received the sceptre on the death of Egfrid. He was equally brave and superstitious.

The kingdom enjoyed a profound peace during his whole reign; and his great beneficence to the church acquired him the character of a wise, courageous, active and equitable prince; though, perhaps, it would be difficult to find a single instance in his whole reign that deserved these epithets, except his munificence to the clergy. He filled the throne of Mercia twenty-four years.

A. D. 818. Kenelm was but an infant when his father Kenulf paid the debt of nature; and Quendrida, his sister, was entrusted with the care of his education: but, instead of performing the duty she owed to her father, she basely caused her brother to be murdered, and usurped the throne. She did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of her perfidy; she was driven from the seat of power by another usurper, who was, soon after, expelled by a third.

It will be needless to pursue the history of this kingdom any farther. A succession of perfidious actions can give very little entertainment to a humane and candid reader. The series of usurpers continued till Egbert subdued the kingdom, and put a period to the Saxon heptarchy.

THE KINGDOM OF ESSEX, OR, THE EAST-SAXONS.

ERKENWIN was the first of the Saxon chiefs who assumed the title of King of Essex; and even that prince held his kingdom as a fief of Kent. Nor has any of the ancient historians informed us at what period it became an independent monarchy. If either Erkenwin, or his two immediate successors, performed any actions worthy to be transmitted to posterity, they are buried in oblivion. Their names, and the length of time they filled the throne, are the only circumstances they have recorded.

A. D. 596. Sebert, Sibert, or Sigebert, was a Pagan when he ascended the throne of Essex. The darkness of heathen superstition had not then been dispelled by the light of the gospel. Ethelbert, king of Kent, desirous of rendering others partakers of the same happiness he himself had received from the preaching of Austin, dispatched Melitus into Essex, in order to plant Christianity in that kingdom, and convert his nephew, Sibert, from the errors of idolatry. Melitus succeeded, and Sibert readily joined Ethelbert in erecting the cathedral church of St. Paul. It was built upon the foundations of a heathen temple dedicated to Diana by the Romans, when they were masters of Britain. Melitus was the first bishop, and exerted his great abilities nobly in the cause of true religion. The great increase of profelytes to Christianity, that followed on the opening of the cathedral, encouraged the two princes to rebuild the church of St. Peter at Westminster, which had been demolished by the Saxons. That structure was erected in the time of Constantine the Great, on the foundations of a temple built by the Romans, and dedicated to Apollo. The founding of these two churches gave a fatal blow to the idolatry of the Saxons; the temples were, in many parts of the kingdom, destroyed, and the images broken in pieces. But Sibert died too soon; he paid the debt of nature, after holding the sceptre of Essex almost seventeen years.

A. D. 613. Sibert was succeeded by his three sons, Saxred, Seward, and Sigebert, who formed a triumvirate, and reigned together. The piety of their father had produced very little effect on the minds of these three princes; they were still idolaters, and endeavoured to restore the heathen superstition. Melitus laboured incessantly for their conversion: but his attempts were vain; they ridiculed the sacred mysteries of christianity, and at last banished Melitus from the kingdom. Not long after, they led their army against the Kentish forces, and were all slain in the action. They reigned seven years. Sigebert the Little, son to Seward, ascended the throne: but his actions, whatever they were, are consigned to oblivion; even the time of his death is uncertain.

He was succeeded by Sigebert the Good, who again restored the Christian religion, after it had been almost extinguished by the triumvirate of idolaters. But we have no farther account of the actions of this pious prince, except that his people enjoyed an uninterrupted series of peace during his whole reign. He was assassinated by two of his generals, in revenge for his having shewn a partiality to the bishop, who had passed an ecclesiastical censure on one of them for his vices. This event happened in the year 622.

The reigns of the other kings of Essex are not worth a place in history. They performed no actions that deserve to be recorded. Their reigns, like the lives of peasants in a sequestered valley, are barren of incidents; they are equally obscure; and it were to be wished they were equally innocent. After an interval of about 190 years, the kingdom of Essex was reduced by Egbert, who, soon after, put an end to the seven kingdoms of the Saxons.

Such is the history of the Heptarchy, a structure founded on rapine and perfidy, and demolished by ambition. Christianity has, doubtless, a powerful influence in disposing the mind to acts of kindness, benevolence, and humanity; in polishing the manners, and introducing a gentle and polite behaviour; but it lost its force among the Anglo-Saxons; they were too ignorant and too superstitious to receive the benefits that result from its precepts. Instead of that simplicity of worship enjoined in the gospel, they substituted an unbounded reverence for saints and relics; the practices of an absurd devotion supplied the place of the evangelical virtues. Nursed in superstition, and strangers to a just and rational method of reasoning, every operation of nature was considered as a miracle; the common accidents of life were believed to be the effects of the interposition of providence, and every misfortune the scourge of heaven. Hence they were prepared to receive, without examination, every fable, however absurd, and every opinion, however extravagant. Religion, instead of enlightening their minds, involved them in the thickest night of superstitious bigotry. Ambitious bitious of acquiring the praise of sanctity, and desirous of expiating crimes without suffering the pains of repentance; they buried themselves in the gloomy recesses of a cloister, and gave munificent donations to churches and the clergy: No less than ten of their kings, and eleven of their queens, retired from the world, and were lost to society. They grasped the shadow instead of the substance; and substituted the lifeless and gloomy devotions of a cell to the practice of justice, benevolence, charity, and the other virtues so strongly recommended in the gospel.

No discoveries in the arts mark this period of history: literature was little cultivated; the monks were the only people that had any tincture of letters, and their studies confined almost entirely to theology. It is, indeed, in vain to expect the sciences should reside in a country where the torch of civil discord is lighted by the hand of rapine, and disperses its malignant beams from one extremity to the other. Bede, indeed, was a person of great learning; considering the times in which he lived. His ecclesiastical history has reached our times, and displays a genius and assiduity, which, in more enlightened ages, might have conducted to the most important discoveries.

B O O K IV.

From the destruction of the Saxon Heptarchy, to the Norman conquest.

E G B E R T.

IT has been already observed, at the conclusion of the history of Wessex; that the messengers dispatched to Egbert, when Brithwic fell a victim to the passion of his wife, found him in the service of Charlemagne. In that polite and martial court Egbert had polished his manners, and learned to conquer. On his ascending the throne of his ancestors, a very extensive prospect opened to his view. The royal families, in all the kingdoms of the heptarchy, except his own, were extinguished; anarchy and disorder had rendered all of them weak, and some of them almost defenceless. Egbert was the only descendant of those chiefs who had conquered Britain, and boasted their descent from Woden. The superior qualities of his mind gave him as much advantage as his birth, so that he had the fairest prospect of extending his dominions, and of rendering himself the sole monarch of the whole heptarchy.

He began with introducing among his troops the discipline he had learned in the armies of Charlemagne, and then turned his arms against the Britons. His success over that brave and hardy people established his character as a general, and he was chosen chief of the Saxon confederacy. The Mercians were the only people capable of defending themselves against the power of Egbert: the kingdoms of Kent, Essex, and East-Anglia, were become tributary to that people. Bernulf, who then filled the Mercian throne, was alarmed at the success of Egbert: he saw, that unless something happened to blast his laurels, he must soon be master of the whole heptarchy. He therefore increased his army, and took the opportunity of Egbert's absence to attack the provinces of Wessex that bordered upon Mercia. Egbert was in Cornwall when he received the news of the Mercian invasion, and marched, with the greatest expedition, to put a stop to the ravages of the enemy. The two armies met at Ellandune, now Wilton, in Wiltshire: a furious battle ensued, in which the forces of Bernulf were totally defeated, and the greater part of them who escaped the carnage of the engagement were cut off in their retreat. Another decisive battle, fought soon after, finished the contest, and made Egbert master of Mercia. He pursued his success, marched towards Northumberland, and was met by the principal inhabitants, who came to do him homage. Egbert was content with reducing the several kingdoms of the heptarchy; he suffered them to enjoy their former laws and customs; and to elect their own kings, who governed their respective provinces, but paid an annual tribute to Egbert.

A.D. 829. Thus the heptarchy was consolidated into one kingdom, and called England, from the name of one of the Saxon tribes; who, about four hundred years before, had established themselves in this country. Egbert was solemnly crowned at Winchester, and immediately issued an edict for abolishing all distinctions among the Saxon kingdoms.

But, though Egbert had restored peace throughout his dominions, and gained the affection of all his subjects by his humane government; yet this tranquillity was of no long duration. The northern parts of Europe were so overstocked with people, that multitudes of armed barbarians were continually issuing from their native soil, in search of plunder, or countries more fruitful than their own. A party of these wandering ravagers landed on the coast of England; where they were known by the appellation of Danes.

They were composed of different nations, many of whom being driven from the country by Charlemagne, settled in Jutland, before inhabited by the Angles and Saxons. By the addition of these refugees, the country soon became too populous, and they were obliged to seek new settlements in a distant kingdom. Great part of their country was covered with woods, which furnished them with timber sufficient for building ships, and these they managed with great dexterity. But, instead of applying themselves to commerce, they became pirates, and frequently landed on the coasts of different kingdoms; and, after plundering the adjacent country, returned home with their booty. Piracy soon became the support of their state; and, instead of being considered as infamous, was looked upon as an honourable profession. Their kings engaged in these piratical cruises, and became the leaders of a band of lawless plunderers. They made several descents on the British coast during the heptarchy, but were always repulsed with loss.

A.D. 833. Persuaded that their miscarriages were owing to the smallness of their parties; and desirous of plundering a country at once rich and fertile, they joined their fleets, and landed a body of fifteen thousand men at Charmouth, in Dorsetshire. So formidable a number of barbarians struck the inhabitants with terror: they found themselves unable to resist their ferocious invaders, and fled for safety to the woods and marshes. Egbert, on the first news of their landing, flew to the defence of his people: but his army was too weak to chastise the barbarians; they gained a complete victory; and Egbert himself was indebted to the darkness of the night for his safety.

safety. But though the Danes had been victorious, they suffered so greatly in the engagement, that they did not think proper to continue their ravages; they retreated to their ships, and disappeared.

A. D. 836. The Cornish Britons, desirous of freeing themselves from the Saxon yoke, invited the Danes to join them against the enemy. A numerous body of these pirates accordingly landed in Cornwall, and were joined by the Britons. This combined army immediately took the field, in hopes of surprising the English forces. But Egbert had learned wisdom from experience; his last defeat had rendered him cautious: he expected the Danes would return, and kept his troops ready to receive them. He marched immediately against the enemy, and met them at Hengdown-hill, in Cornwall. Surprised to see the English army so near them, the Danes and Britons would have willingly retreated, but it was too late. Egbert attacked them with the utmost fury, and put them to flight. The Britons took shelter in their mountains, and the Danes retired to their ships.

A. D. 837. Egbert saw the necessity of a fleet to check the progress of those rapacious invaders; and had even fitted out a few ships for that purpose: but he died too soon for his people, leaving the crown to his son, who was ill qualified to sustain its weight. Egbert was formed both for conquest and government: he was intrepid, wise, and humane. He acquired a kingdom by his valour; and he rendered his people happy by his prudence, beneficence, and impartial dispensation of justice.

ETHELWOLF.

A. D. 838. ETHELWOLF ascended the throne on the death of his father, but inherited few of his qualities. His virtues were those of a monk, rather than a king. He received his education in the monastery of Winchester, where he contracted the indolence and inactivity so general in a cloister. The Danes did not fail to take advantage of his weakness; they landed in several parts of the kingdom, plundered the adjacent country, and retired with their booty, leaving behind them such dreadful marks of their brutality as are shocking to humanity. Their small vessels ran easily up the creeks and rivers; where, after drawing them ashore, they surrounded them with entrenchments; and spreading themselves in every part of the adjacent country, they carried off whatever they thought valuable, retreated to their ships, and disappeared. Driven from one place, they appeared in another. The alarm was spread through the whole kingdom; terror became general; every season of the year was dangerous.

A. D. 840. But hitherto they had attempted no settlement; the intention of their descents reached no farther than plunder. They landed in small parties, and were opposed by the militia of the county. The resistance they met with had no effect to discourage their incursions; their insatiable thirst of booty supported them under every misfortune; defeats, as well as victories, incited them to greater enterprizes. They had now discovered the fertility of the country, and were determined, if possible, to fix themselves in the island. They landed a numerous body of forces at Charmouth, where Egbert had, some years before, been defeated. The danger that now threatened his country, roused Ethelwolf from his lethargy. He marched at the head of his army, gave battle to the Danes, and was defeated. But the barbarians were convinced, from the opposition they had met with, that a settlement could not then be attempted with any hopes of success. They abandoned the design; and, after ravaging the country, retired to their ships.

The fatigues of military duty were not at all agreeable to Ethelwolf. He saw that a continued course of activity was necessary to frustrate the attempts of these restless invaders, and determined to divest himself of part of his dominions, in order to procure that indolent tranquillity which he valued much more than power. He resigned to Athelstan, his eldest son, the counties of Essex, Kent, and Sussex. This prudent expedient contributed greatly to the security of the southern coast; but the other parts of the kingdom were still exposed to the dreadful ravages of those barbarous invaders. A large detachment landed near the mouth of the river Parret, in Somersetshire; but they did not long continue their ravages; they were attacked by the militia of those parts, and defeated, with such terrible slaughter, that the kingdom was, for some years, free from their attacks.

A. D. 851. But this interval of tranquillity proved nothing more than a prelude to more general attempts. The Danes landed in several parts of the kingdom, but were every where defeated, though not till after they had committed the most dreadful ravages. A fleet of three hundred and fifty sail landed their forces in the isle of Thanet, great part of which they laid waste, burnt the cities of London and Canterbury, and penetrated into Surry. Ethelwolf was now once more roused from his lethargy: he led his army against the invaders, and obtained a complete victory. But, notwithstanding their loss was prodigious, they took up their winter quarters in the isle of Thanet.

A. D. 853. Alarmed at the barbarians making a settlement in the island, the militia of Kent and Surry attacked their camp with great intrepidity, but were repulsed with loss, and obliged to abandon the design. The Danes being thus left at liberty, added new fortifications to their settlements, and determined to wait for fresh reinforcements.

But even these alarming circumstances could not divert Ethelwolf from the resolution he had taken, of making a pilgrimage to Rome. Such power have the delusions of superstitious bigotry over the human mind, when unassisted by the force of reason. He immediately dispatched his youngest son, Alfred, to inform the pope of his pious intentions, who received confirmation from the hands of the holy father. Alfred was received with the greatest marks of esteem by Leo the fourth, and obtained every thing he requested.

A. D. 854. But this mark of his esteem for the Roman pontiff was not sufficient to satisfy a person of Ethelwolf's bigotry; he persisted in his former resolution, and set out for Rome. He continued a year in that city, where he spent his time in exercises much better adapted to edify the inhabitants of that metropolis, than comfort his own oppressed subjects. He rebuilt the English college, which had been burnt down: he promised to extend the tribute of Peter's pence over the whole kingdom; and to pay his holiness three hundred manches (about thirty-eight pounds sterling) two-thirds of which were to support the lamps in the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the other third was a present to the pope himself. Nor were his religious exercises less remarkable. He visited every shrine, paid his devotions to every relic, and viewed every place that had been rendered remarkable by some event in the first ages of christianity.

A. D. 855. After taking leave of his holiness, Ethelwolf set out for his own dominions; but stopping at at the court of France, he fell in love with Judith, daughter of Charles the bald. She was a widow, though very young, and adorned with all the charms of the softer sex. Ethelwolf, notwithstanding the great disparity of their years, married that princess, and indulged himself for some time in the pleasures of the French court, without paying the least regard to the distresses of his country.

But these imprudent actions of Ethelwolf occasioned disturbances in his kingdom. Athelstan had paid the debt of nature before his father left the kingdom, and Ethelbald, his second son, now determined to seize a sceptre which the weakness of Ethelwolf seemed to offer to his ambition. Many of the nobles joined him; and the torch of civil discord was on the point of being lighted when Ethelwolf returned to his dominions.

Ethelbald was not intimidated by the arrival of his father; he prosecuted his design with the same vigour as before. And Ethelwolf made preparation for reducing him to reason. The nobles perceived the dangers that threatened their country; and interposed their good offices to bring about a reconciliation. Ethelwolf consented to cede the ancient kingdom of Wessex to his son, reserving the other parts of the island to himself. By this sacrifice the internal peace of England was restored, and Ethelwolf spent the remainder of his days in tranquillity.

His passion for augmenting the power of the church, however, did not forsake him. He bestowed on the clergy a donation, for which they had contended during several centuries. They maintained that the Mosaic law, which gave to the Levites the tenth part of all the produce of the land, was obligatory upon christians; and notwithstanding the obvious absurdity of this application of the Jewish law; they were desirous of extending it to the tenth of all industry, merchandize, wages of labourers, and pay of soldiers. This doctrine they had preached up with the utmost assiduity, but hitherto the interest of the laity had been too strong for their arguments. The power of Ethelwolf effected what all their eloquence had attempted in vain; and the states of the kingdom at his request, consented to the establishment of tithes throughout all the kingdom. Perhaps the English were persuaded that this remarkable benevolence to the church, would procure them the assistance of heaven against the Danes. It is natural for people in distress to be willing to pay liberally for deliverance.

A. D. 857. Ethelwolf now found his end approaching, and was desirous of preventing any domestic disputes between his own children, from disturbing the tranquillity of his subjects. In order to this, he bequeathed all the territories he governed himself to his son Ethelbert, but in case of his death they were to descend to Ethelred, and for want of male issue, entailed upon Alfred. He gave his personal estate to charitable uses, and ordered that all his successors should maintain one person out of every tenth family. Having thus settled his temporal concerns, Ethelwolf gave himself up entirely to the exercises of religion, and died in peace, after swaying the English sceptre nineteen years.

ETHELBALD AND ETHELRED.

A. D. 857. NO opposition was made to the will of Ethelwolf. Ethelbald had for some time been seated upon the throne of Wessex, and Ethelred took possession of the dominions of his father. The king of Wessex followed not the steps of Ethelwolf; he was not fearful of breaking the laws of his maker: almost the first action of his reign, was the incestuous marriage with Judith, his father's widow. His government was arbitrary and cruel; he was at once both indolent and perfidious, and practised every vice that solicited his depraved appetite. Swithin, bishop of Winchester, saw with grief the enormous actions of his master, and exerted all his power to make him sensible of his crimes. He at last succeeded: Judith was divorced, and a change of government immediately followed.

A. D. 860. But Ethelbald did not long enjoy the crown of Wessex. His people were hardly sensible of the happy alteration in their condition, before the king paid the debt of nature, and left the crown to Ethelbert his brother. The dispositions of these two princes were directly opposite; Ethelbert was as remarkable for his virtues, as Ethelbald had been for his vices. Humanity and moderation formed the principal characteristics of his reign. No civil commotion disturbed the tranquillity of the state; no complaints of injustice were heard from the people. Happiness seemed to have taken up her abode in the kingdom, while the olive wand of peace was extended over the whole island.

But this interval of undisturbed enjoyment, lulled the people into a fatal security. They had, for some time, been free from the barbarous ravages of the Danes, and made no preparations to prevent their being again afflicted with the like misfortunes. A naval force, the only bulwark that could defend them from the inroad of a piratical enemy, was neglected; the coasts were unguarded, and the whole kingdom exposed to the invasion of every embarkation of marine freebooters. The natural consequences of this indolent security were felt too soon. The Danes landed at Southampton, and meeting with no opposition, they extended their ravages to Winchester, plundered the city, and reduced it to ashes. Their route was marked with desolation and ruin. Their armies were preceded with terror. No resistance was made to their progress; the inhabitants thought of nothing but flight to save themselves from their shocking brutalities. But the spirit of their Saxon ancestors was not yet wholly lost. Ofric and Ethelwolf, the two generals of the English forces, marched with the utmost expedition against the lawless invaders of their country. The flight of the inhabitants had filled the Danes with an insolent confidence. They feared no opposition; and spread themselves in a very disorderly manner over the country for the sake of plunder. In this fatal security they were overtaken by the English generals, and easily defeated. A dreadful slaughter ensued, and the few barbarians that escaped the sword, were glad to escape to their ships without their booty.

A. D. 865. This defeat did not, however, deter their countrymen from their piratical cruises. A considerable number of them landed in the isle of Thanet, and filled the adjacent country with terror. Their horrid massacres, which shock humanity, intimidated the people from making any resistance. Recourse was therefore had to negotiation; and the inhabitants agreed to pay them a considerable sum of money, in order to save their estates from inevitable ruin. But little confidence can be placed in the promises of those who live by rapine, and daily trample upon the laws of justice and humanity. Persuaded that they could gain more by pillage than the sum stipulated in the treaty, they perfidiously took the advantage of the truce to carry destruction among an unsuspecting people. They commenced their shocking ravages in the night, and laid waste the whole eastern part of the county.

A. D. 866. These dreadful disorders greatly affected fects the mind of Ethelbert. He saw with grief the miseries of his country which he could not prevent. The barbarians spared neither age nor sex; a total destruction marked the paths of the invaders. The churches were destroyed, the monasteries reduced to ashes, and the religious treated with the most inhuman brutality. In the midst of these distresses Ethelbert died, and was universally lamented by his subjects, who loved his person and revered his virtues. He was succeeded in the throne by Ethelred his younger brother, pursuant to his father's will, though he left behind him two sons, Adelheim and Ethelwold.

ETHELRED I.

A.D. 866. THE reign of Ethelred is marked with victories and misfortunes. Flushed with conquest, and grown insolent by success, the Danes extended their ravages, and threatened the destruction of the whole country. The continual descents of these invaders had greatly weakened the authority of the kings of Wessex over the provinces of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland. Their tributary kings had almost thrown off their allegiance, and were on the point of assuming the same authority they possessed during the heptarchy.

Soon after the accession of Ethelred, a difference happened between him and his brother Alfred, on account of some territories which had been given them. Ethelred violated the contract, and Alfred appealed to the nobles who had been witnesses to the deed. The dispute became violent, but was at last amicably determined; and the two princes agreed to act in concert against the invaders of their country. Perhaps there never was a time when unanimity was more necessary: the strongest union only could repel the attempts of the enemy.

Bruen Brocard, a nobleman of Northumberland, in order to revenge an affront he had received, in the person of his wife, from Osbert, who then filled the throne, invited the Danes into that kingdom. He sacrificed to a personal injury the lives of thousands, and involved his country in misery and distress. Under the conduct of Ivar and Hubba, two bold and warlike princes, the Danes landed in East-Anglia, and took up their quarters in that country till the spring.

A.D. 867. Osbert kept his court at York when the Danes entered Northumberland; and, had he satisfied himself with defending that city, the Danes would, in all probability, have been defeated. But the impetuosity of his courage gained the ascendant over his prudence. He sallied out to meet the enemy, and was slain in the action. The whole army was defeated; and the inhabitants, to prevent the dreadful ravages of these lawless invaders, entered into a treaty with Ivar, by which he was left in quiet possession of that kingdom.

A.D. 878. But the kingdom of Northumberland was not sufficient to satisfy the avarice of the Danes. They marched through Lincolnshire, where, among other inhuman acts of cruelty, they levelled to the ground the monastery of Bardney, and put all the monks to death. The monasteries of Peterborough, Ely, and others that lay near their route, shared the same fate. The catastrophe of the nuns of Coldingham abbey was very deplorable; the abbess, to prevent their charms from exciting the lust of these lawless sons of rapine, proposed, that they should disfigure their faces, by cutting off their noses and upper lips. The proposal was embraced; and the abbess, in order to inspire her nuns with courage, began with herself. This expedient saved their virtue. The Danes, disgusted at their appearance, and incensed at their disappointment, set fire to the monastery, and the whole sisterhood perished in the flames.

After committing these inhuman outrages, the Danes divided themselves into two bodies. Ivar led his forces into East-Anglia, and Hubba continued his march towards the territories of Wessex. The East-Anglians met the forces of Ivar at Thetford, but were totally defeated. Edmund, the tributary king, was taken prisoner; and, after having sustained a thousand indignities, was transfixt with arrows, and afterwards beheaded.

A.D. 871. Ivar pursued his conquests with great rapidity, but found it necessary to re-join Hubba's forces, in order to attack the kingdom of Wessex, the only country that seemed able to put a stop to their victories. The two princes marched in conjunction, to Reading, in Berkshire; a town, from its situation on the confluence of the Kennet and Thames, very capable of being defended with a small force. Here the Danes fixed their head quarters; and, to render the post more difficult of access, they connected the two rivers by a deep trench, which they fortified with ramparts.

A few days after their taking possession of Reading, one of their foraging parties was cut off by Ethelwolf, earl of that county, and their leader slain. This gleam of success encouraged Ethelred and Alfred, who had joined their forces, to advance near the enemy. Nor did they continue idle in their camp; they cut off all the advanced parties of the Danes, and made preparations for attacking the fortress itself. The Danes perceived their danger, and, collecting all their force, sallied out upon the British forces, and, after an obstinate engagement, obtained the victory. The intrepid Ethelwolf fell in the contest.

Exasperated at the loss of so able a leader, and desirous of retrieving the honour they had lost by their late defeat, the English once more advanced against the barbarians, who determined to meet them in the open field. Accordingly they marched to a plain near Ashdown, where they waited the approach of the British forces. The troops of the invaders were divided into two bodies; one of them headed by their princes, and the other by their nobles. This disposition rendered it necessary for the English to divide their army. Ethelred placed himself at the head of one division, and Alfred at that of the other. The attack was begun by Alfred with incredible fury, and he nobly sustained the shock of the whole Danish army. His brother being engaged in hearing mass when Alfred charged the Danes, refused to support him till the service was over. As soon as Ethelred advanced, the Danes, who had stood firm against the charge of Alfred, gave way; a dreadful carnage ensued, and the enemy were obliged to seek their safety in a precipitate flight. One of their princes, and a vast number of their nobles, were found among the slain. Soon after this victory, the two brothers engaged another party of the Danes, and were defeated. Ethelred was mortally wounded, and died soon after, leaving his crown to his brother Alfred, who was born to support the tottering throne, and establish the happiness of his people.

A L F R E D, furnamed THE GREAT.

A.D. THOUGH Ethelred left several children, 871. yet Alfred was placed on the throne of his ancestors. The voice of the people, the distressed situation of the kingdom, and the testament of Ethelwolf, all conspired in calling this prince to the exercise of royalty. He was only twenty-two years of age when his brother Ethelred paid the debt of nature; but had given so many convincing proofs of his valour, and the genuine goodness of his heart, that, perhaps, no prince ever ascended the throne with more happy presages of being the darling of his people; but he was surrounded with difficulties, and exposed, on every side, to the most imminent dangers. Nothing less than a genius and abilities equal to his own could have been sufficient to have restored stability to the throne, and happiness to his subjects. Which ever way he turned, the prospect was dismal; a few gleams of hope only cheered the dreary gloom. The cities and religious structures were levelled in the dust; the farms were destroyed; agriculture was neglected; and the dejected peasant pined for want of bread, in the midst of fields that lately waved with all the beauties of a golden harvest. He wanted subjects to recruit his armies; many of them had perished by the sword and famine; some, dispirited by the toils of war, had submitted to the yoke of slavery; and others had fled to the mountains and forests for protection against a rude and barbarous enemy.

Alfred alone viewed this scene of complicated distress with unshaken firmness; his soul seemed superior to misfortunes. His penetrating genius pointed out resources, which supported him in this alarming crisis. He did not despair of surmounting every difficulty, and of changing this scene of melancholy dejection into happiness and joy. The firmness of the monarch revived the drooping spirits of the subject. The soldiers caught the noble infection; they promised themselves, that under so able and intrepid a leader, they should attack the brutal enemy with success; that victory would follow the standards of Alfred.

Secure of the affections of his people, and the unshaken confidence of the army, Alfred applied himself, with the utmost assiduity, to correct every abuse which had crept into the civil administration; and revive among his troops that discipline which always leads to conquest, and without which the most numerous armies would attempt it in vain. He knew that great difficulties could only be surmounted by great efforts; and that the utmost activity is necessary to prevent the most alarming misfortunes. He pursued these maxims, and succeeded; and left an example to posterity, that if the natural strength of the island be properly exerted, Britain has nothing to fear from the attempts of a foreign enemy.

The ravages committed by the Danes called his attention from the affairs of government to the field. It is a misfortune to society, and to mankind, that it is the indispensable duty of great and enlightened princes to engage in war. Awakened by the cruelties of the barbarians, Alfred took the field at the head of a small body of forces, and engaged the Danish army at Wilton. The action was severe, and the enemy were obliged to retreat; but gaining an eminence near the field of battle, and perceiving that Alfred's army was far inferior to their own in numbers, they returned to the charge, and Alfred was obliged, in his turn, to retreat. The English, however, were far from being intimidated: they were persuaded, that, under the banners of Alfred, they should at last conquer: they saw the power of the enemy was much superior to their own, and imputed the advantage they at first gained; and even their being able to face so numerous an army, entirely to the good conduct and intrepidity of their beloved monarch.

Alfred soon perceived, that it would be impossible to conquer an enemy whose armies were continually reinforced with fresh troops; and therefore wisely applied himself to prevent, if possible, this perpetual inundation of barbarians. He fitted out a fleet of ships, in order to guard the coast. The advantages resulting from this prudent measure were soon apparent: Alfred's squadron defeated a Danish fleet; took one of their ships; and obliged the rest to retire.

A.D. 876. Halsten, one of the Danish kings, surprised Wareham-castle, the strongest fortress in Wessex. Alfred immediately marched against them; and Halsten not thinking it prudent to engage the English, sued for peace, and offered to give hostages for the faithful observance of the treaty. Alfred listened to his proposals; a treaty was concluded, by which the Danes engaged to quit the kingdom. Alfred, that he might engage them not to break their oaths, lest heaven should punish their impiety, made them swear to observe the treaty on the holy relics; and also on a bracelet, which they considered as sacred. But it was in vain to expect, that men who had never submitted to laws, should pay any regard to an oath: the precaution of Alfred had no effect on the barbarians: they swore to observe the treaty, and broke it immediately. They continued quiet, indeed, for two or three months, and seemed to make preparations for their departure; but waited only for an opportunity of attacking his army to advantage. It was not long before the fortunate moment arrived. The British cavalry, confiding in the faith of the barbarians, dispersed themselves into small parties, in order to procure forage with more facility. The Danes perceived it; and issuing from their camp in the night, attacked the parties of cavalry, seized their horses, and mounting their own men, fled to Exeter. The sudden and unexpected appearance of the enemy struck the inhabitants with despair: they flew to arms, but it was too late; the Danes entered the city without opposition, increased the fortifications, and there took up their winter quarters.

A.D. 877. Convinced that no treaty made with an enemy, who trampled upon all the laws of justice, could be binding, and that force only could bring them to reason; Alfred applied himself to put his navy on a more respectable footing, in order, if possible, to destroy their naval force. A formidable fleet was soon fitted out, and sailed immediately to block up Exeter by sea, while Alfred attacked the city by land. In their passage to Exeter, the English squadron fell in with the grand fleet of the Danes, consisting of one hundred and twenty sail, and having on board a strong reinforcement for Halsten's army. A furious fight ensued, in which the Danish fleet was totally destroyed.

Terrified at the loss of their squadron, the Danes had again recourse to negotiation: they renewed their oaths; they gave fresh hostages, and engaged to quit the island immediately. Alfred had now learned caution from experience: he concluded a treaty with them, but would not suffer them to remove from Exeter, till they embarked for their own country.

Soon after their departure, the fleet of the famous Rollo appeared on the English coasts. He expected no opposition, and was astonished when the fleet of Alfred approached. The engagement which ensued convinced him that the attempt would be attended with danger, and thought it not prudent to make the experiment: he stood over to the French shore, and made himself master of Normandy.

Another army of the Danes had, some time, before, made themselves masters of Mercia, and driven Burhead from his throne, who fled to Rome, and took shelter in a cloyster. That prince was the last that bore the title of king of Mercia. Alfred gave him no disturbance; he observed religiously the terms of his treaties. The barbarians, however, were not charmed with this rigorous observance of public faith; the laws of virtue were unknown to the Danes. The country they had conquered was very fruitful, and, by a little assistance from agriculture, would have supplied them with every thing necessary to render life agreeable; but they had been so long used to rapine, that they despised every other employment: they had been nursed in the lap of violence, and early initiated into the practice of brutal cruelty. From such an enemy nothing but perfidy could be expected. While Alfred's fleet guarded the coast, they remained quiet; but, on the landing of a new reinforcement, they joined their countrymen, and immediately renewed their dreadful ravages. Opposition was now in vain; their numbers were so greatly increased, that it would have been temerity to have met them in the open field. Astonished and intimidated at this inundation of barbarians, the English abandoned their habitations, and sought their safety in a speedy flight. Some passed over to the continent, and others took up their residence in mountains and forests. Alfred alone continued superior to misfortunes: he laid aside the ensigns of royalty, but he was still the father of his people. He dismissed his attendants; and, in the disguise of a peasant, concealed himself in the cottage of a cow-herd, whose wife put his patience to the severest trial, by requiring his assistance in her domestic affairs. He had not continued long in this humiliating retreat, before he found an opportunity of collecting a number of his friends; and with these he retired to an inaccessible morass in Somersetshire, formed by the waters of the Parret and Thone. In the center of this morass he built a fortress, and often sallied out upon the barbarians, who felt the vigour of his arm, but knew not from what quarter they received the blow. They never suspected that Alfred was so near their camp; they were persuaded he had fallen among the slain.

A fortunate event drew Alfred from his retreat. Hubba, a Danish prince, having landed at the mouth of the Taw, in Devonshire, laid siege to the fortress of Kenwith. Odun, earl of Devonshire, at the head of twelve hundred men, advanced towards the barbarians. A battle ensued, when Hubba was totally defeated, and Odun took the famous magical standard of the Danes. This standard was called Reafan, from its having the figure of a raven embroidered upon it, by the three sisters of Hubba. Magical incantations had also been used to render it prosperous; and the Danes, fully persuaded, that the army, where it was displayed, would be invincible, ascribed to it a miraculous virtue. Alfred now perceived a gleam of hope, and determined to take the advantage that offered. The camp of the enemy was at no great distance, and Alfred was desirous of discovering what discipline they observed in this period of security. He took the disguise of a harper; and penetrating into their camp, entertained them so highly with his music and facetious humour, that he was introduced into their general's tent, where he continued several days, and even gained the favour of that ferocious leader. Alfred, though his time seemed to be wholly devoted to mirth, did not forget the intention of his visit: he observed their supine negligence and security; riot had usurped the place of order, and discipline was lost in intemperance.

Animated by these discoveries, he returned to his friends, and raised their drooping spirits with the hopes of an easy and certain victory. Dispatches were immediately sent to the most considerable of his subjects with this favourable intelligence, ordering them to assemble all their forces, and rendezvous at Brixton, in the forest of Sherwood. He was readily obeyed; the hopes of meeting their king, whom they had long regarded as dead, revived their hopes: the dangers of war now appeared far less terrible than the dominion of the Danes. The ravages of the barbarians had roused them to vengeance; they were desirous of retaliating the cruelties they had suffered on the brutal invaders of their country. Alfred drew a favourable preface from the alacrity of his subjects, who flocked to the standard of a king they adored, and led them immediately against the enemy.

The Danes had advanced to Yatenden, on the borders of Hampshire, in a confused, irregular manner: they dreaded no opposition; they imagined they had no enemy to fear. Astonished and confounded when attacked by the English, their opposition was feeble; they were terrified at the name of Alfred, and sought their safety in flight. A fortress was near, and thither they fled for shelter. Alfred surrounded their retreat, and famine soon forced them to surrender. Lenity still glowed in the breast of Alfred; he could not be cruel, even to an enemy that had ruined his country. Persuaded that the practice of agriculture would soon give them a distaste to pillage and rapine, especially if they became converts to the doctrines of the gospel, he offered to establish them in East-Anglia and Northumberland, which they had depopulated, provided they would undertake to defend those countries against any future enterprises of their countrymen, and also embrace the tenets of christianity. The conditions were joyfully accepted: they had little religion of their own; and, when their interest pleaded, they had no objection to be Christians. The event justified the policy of Alfred. Guthrun, the Danish chief, with thirty of his principal officers, were immediately baptized: Alfred was sponsor, and gave Guthrun the name of Athelstan.

This change of religion had the expected effect on the conduct of the Dane; he contracted a much greater regard for the sacred nature of an oath: he polished the ferocious manners of his countrymen. They had now a more tender regard for the lives of their hostages. They admired the abilities and virtues of Alfred, and seemed to have abandoned their former brutality with their former religion. Houses were erected in the country assigned them; the lands were cultivated; virtue and industry were encouraged; and Alfred presented the Danish chief with a short code of laws for the government of his subjects.

A.D. 880. Ever attentive to the happiness of his subjects, Alfred employed this interval of tranquillity in restoring order in the state, and in establishing measures which tended to prevent a return of similar calamities. He had seen the effect produced by his navy, and applied himself to augment its force. At the same time, he took every precaution to prevent any misunderstanding between his English and Danish subjects. He governed them by equal laws; he made no difference between them in the administration of civil or criminal justice: an injury committed on a Dane was punished with the same severity as if the sufferer had been an Englishman; the satisfaction, the fine was the same. The country again wore the aspect of plenty; the fields again waved with golden harvests: the cities were rebuilt; and London once more became rich and opulent; commerce again took sanctuary within her walls.

Alfred had experienced the difficulties that attended the raising of an army on any sudden emergency: to this principally he attributed all the miseries suffered by his people. He therefore formed a regular and formidable militia for the defence of the nation: Every person in the kingdom, capable of bearing arms, was obliged to do military duty in his turn: strong bodies of forces were thus always in readiness to act against the common enemy. Part of these were stationed in garrisons; others were encamped in different parts of the kingdom; and others employed in cultivating the land, till an appearance of an enemy called them to arms. The kingdom was by these wise regulations always capable of opposing any invasion; the fields were properly tilled; no individual had a right to complain that his burden was heavier than that of his neighbour. Content appeared in every countenance: the late interval of sorrow was changed into an interval of joy.

But among all the establishments of Alfred, those relating to his navy were the most useful and advantageous. The very situation of the country, its being an island, pointed out a maritime force; though it had hitherto been unaccountably neglected. Alfred saw its necessity; he was convinced that while the English are masters of the sea, they have nothing to fear from the attempts of a foreign enemy. He stationed one hundred and thirty vessels of war at proper distances along the coast. He instructed his subjects in the art of navigation; and invited the most expert seamen from different nations to serve in his marine. The cruises of the pirates, so injurious to trade, now received a severe check; they hardly dared to venture out of their harbours.

Nor did he neglect to put the sea coast into a proper state of defence. He built castles and fortresses in places most exposed to the attempts of an enemy. They were well garrisoned, and furnished with every requisite for making a noble defence. Beacons were erected on the summits of the most conspicuous hills, and in the most proper places for spreading an alarm. Wherever any enemy appeared, the beacons were lighted, and a proper number of disciplined forces, under the lieutenant of the county, were ready for immediate action.

A. D. 892. By these wise measures and precautions, Alfred had, in appearance, secured the tranquillity of his kingdom, when Hastings, a celebrated Danish pirate, after ravaging great part of France, made preparations for invading England. He was no stranger to the great abilities of Alfred; and well knew that the wisest precautions had been taken to render any attempt of that kind abortive. But he persevered in his design; not to make settlements, but to enrich himself with the spoils of a trading people. He fitted out three hundred sail of ships, and embarking all his forces, stood over to the English coast. This powerful fleet was divided into two squadrons, one of which, consisting of two hundred and twenty sail, entered the harbour of Rye in Sussex, where they landed their forces, and seized the castle of Appledore. The other, commanded by Hastings himself, entered the mouth of the Thames, and landed at Milton, where the Danes threw up an intrenchment. They afterwards erected a castle at Middleton, and another at Beamsfleet. The dreadful ravages which had ceased for several years, were now again commenced; and an emulation seemed to exist between the two chiefs, who should excel in acts of outrage and cruelty: the country was again filled with blood and slaughter.

A. D. 893. These acts of barbarity augmented the glory of Alfred. That prince was in East-Anglia, employed in settling the affairs of that province, Guthrun having lately paid the debt of nature, when Hastings landed his forces. On the first information of this descent, Alfred flew to the defence of his people, and marched immediately to attack the armies of the enemy. The advance of Alfred was terrible to the Danes. The party from Appledore, had carried destruction through the counties of Sussex and Surry, and were now returning to their fleet loaded with plunder. Alfred met this powerful band of lawless pillagers at Farnham, where he attacked them with the utmost fury, obtained a complete victory, and took all their baggage. The few that escaped the slaughter fled to their ships, sailed up the Colne, and fortified themselves at Brickelsey in Essex.

A. D. 894. This victory would have put an end to the ravages of the Danes, had not their perfidious countrymen, who had received so many marks of kindness from Alfred, taken up arms in favour of the invaders. Regardless of oaths, and strangers to gratitude, the Danes of Northumberland and East-Anglia renounced their allegiance; fitted out a numerous fleet, and landing in Devonshire, besieged the city of Exeter. Alfred marched with the utmost expedition to the relief of the inhabitants; and arrived in the neighbourhood, when the insurgents imagined he was employed in the eastern parts of the kingdom. The approach of Alfred struck them with terror; they immediately embarked, and joined Hastings at Beamsfleet. Encouraged by this powerful reinforcement, the pirate extended his ravages into Mercia, wasting the country through which he passed. Alfred had left a strong body of troops in London, for the security of that city: these were not idle. They took advantage of the absence of Hastings, attacked his fort at Beamsfleet, and carried it by storm. The plunder of many successful cruises, during a course of several years, were deposited in this fortress. The conquerors returned loaded with riches, and among the prisoners were the wife and two sons of Hastings. These were sent to Alfred, who generously returned them to the pirate, with this remarkable message, "That he did not make war upon women and Christians." Struck with the noble generosity of Alfred, and terrified by the power of his arms, Hastings sued for peace; which was granted him, on condition of his immediately departing the kingdom. Hastings accepted the stipulation; but observed it no longer than suited his own interest: he embarked his forces, and joined his countrymen on the other side of the Thames. But the vigour and alacrity of Alfred, rendered all their attempts abortive; they were driven from one end of the kingdom to the other; and exposed to the miseries of famine. At last, in despair, they forced a passage to their ships, and abandoned the island, without being able to carry with them any part of the plunder they had wrested from the inhabitants.

A. D. 896. Alfred found no difficulty in reducing the Danes of Northumberland and East-Anglia to their duty, after the departure of the pirates. But he was desirous of establishing a lasting tranquillity in his country. He had long perceived that peace was incompatible in a kingdom divided into petty states, and governed by feudatory princes. He wisely abolished that form of government, and took the people under his immediate authority and administration. The Welsh, who had hitherto preferred their independence, acknowledged the authority of Alfred. Peace was again established in the island, and the great genius of Alfred was once more at liberty to pursue the wisest measures for promoting the happiness of his people.

Nothing less than the prodigious talents of Alfred were equal to the amazing task of restoring government and order in a kingdom reduced to the most dreadful state of anarchy and confusion. The last ravages of the Danes had obliterated all order and subordination. The people were reduced to such a state of misery and want, that they were obliged to procure a wretched subsistence by committing the greatest crimes. The whole country was infested with bands of robbers, whose dreadful incursions rendered all property precarious; nor were the lives of the inhabitants safe from their rapacious attempts. The execution of a very severe justice only could put an end to those alarming enormities, and establish order in the state. Alfred saw all the difficulties, but was not intimidated: he applied himself to regulate these crying abuses, and he could not confer a greater favour on his people. He began with dividing the kingdom into counties; these he subdivided into hundreds, and the hundreds into tythings. By this regulation every man in the kingdom became a member of some tything; the householders became mutual pledges for one another; and each was answerable for his children, his servants, and his guests. Every youth, at the age of fourteen, was obliged to register himself in some tything, when all the householders immediately became answerable for his conduct. Nor could any person change his habitation, without a certificate from the head of the tything to which he belonged. As the tything was answerable for the conduct of each individual, so the hundred was answerable for the different tythings, and the county for its different hundreds. The county, the hundred, and the tything, had each its particular court. The aldermen, bishop, and sheriff, presided in the first, the constable in the second, and the tythingman in the third. By these admirable institutions, rendered absolutely necessary by the circumstances of the times, every householder was obliged to watch over the actions of his neighbour; nor could any crime be long concealed, or long unpunished. Smaller injuries were punished in the tything court, but the larger were heard in that of the hundred. Twelve freeholders were chosen, who, upon oath, enquired into the crime of the accused, and he was either condemned or acquitted, according as they thought him guilty or innocent. This was the origin of juries, who still determine all civil and criminal matters in the English courts. Perhaps it is not possible to devise an institution better calculated to secure the liberty of the subject, or the equal dispensation of justice.

But the people had still a greater confidence in the impartiality and integrity of their king, than in a jury of their neighbours. They perpetually appealed to him from the sentence of the inferior courts. Alfred suspected that the judges wanted either abilities or honesty in their proceedings, and was determined to remove the complaint. He took particular care that his nobles and judges should be well acquainted with the laws of their country; and, that none might plead ignorance, he formed a new code, which served at once to instruct and direct his magistrates. This body of laws is now unhappily lost, but is still regarded as the foundation of the common law of England. It must, however, be remembered, that Alfred was not the sole author of this code of laws; he collected them from the scripture, from the laws of Ina, Offa, Ethelbert, and the customs of the various nations that inhabited Britain; but in many places he reformed and extended previous institutions. A body of new laws would have been dangerous to the peace of the kingdom.

But it was not enough to procure a body of excellent laws; it was necessary also to put them strictly in execution. Alfred was equally diligent in this particular: he examined very strictly the conduct of all his ministers and judges, revised their decisions, and severely punished all who were guilty of partiality. By pursuing these prudent measures, all violences and oppressions were banished from a country where they had so long resided. Robberies were no longer feared: a breach of the peace, a public offence, or a private injury, were almost unknown. He ordered gold bracelets to be suspended in the highways, and no man ventured to take them down; and if a purse of money was dropped on the road, no person dared to touch it but the owner. Nor was Alfred less attentive to the liberty of his people than to the execution of justice. He ordered that the states of the kingdom, or general assembly of the nation, should meet twice a year in London; and that the members should owe their admission to their own quality or virtue, independent of the king's pleasure. He never invaded, he never wished to invade the rights of his people. And we find in his testament this remarkable expression, "That it was just the English should for ever remain as free as their own thoughts."

It is, perhaps, impossible to reform and polish the manners of a rude, ferocious people, without the assistance of literature. Alfred was not to learn this truth: he knew that the rays of learning would dispel the gloomy night of Gothic ignorance, at once the parent of vice and superstition; and therefore neglected not this noble object, whose advantage he well knew from his own experience. The education of Alfred had been greatly neglected, through the indulgent tenderness of his father. His mind had not received the least tincture of knowledge when he had attained his twelfth year. His genius was first awakened by the perusal of some Saxon poems, but they had no tendency to improve his mind. The Latin language opened to him inexhaustible sources of instruction and improvement; and the early taste he discovered for works calculated at once to inform his understanding, and inspire him with the noble sentiments of honour and virtue, prognosticated his future greatness. The whole kingdom was involved in a dreadful night of ignorance. There was hardly a person in the island that understood the Latin service; many of the priests could not even read with propriety. Alfred laboured incessantly to dispel this darkness. He erected schools in various parts of the kingdom; and obliged all freeholders, who possessed two hides of land, to keep their sons at these seminaries till they reached their sixteenth year. He invited learned men from every part of the continent. He founded, or at least rebuilt, the university of Oxford. Persons of merit and learning only were appointed to offices of trust; the ignorant and indolent gained not the favour of Alfred. His own example was a powerful incentive to the industry of his subjects; a noble emulation was excited, and emulation is the parent of improvement. He divided the natural day into three equal parts; and measured the time by burning wax-tapers, of equal lengths, in lanterns. The keeper of his chapel had the care of these tapers; and it was his business to give him notice of every hour. The first of these portions of time was devoted to study, and acts of piety; the second to the dispatch of business; and the third to the relaxation and refreshment of his body. By thus husbanding every moment of his time, he became one of the most learned persons of his time. He understood the Latin perfectly; and translated the fables of Æsop, the history of Bede, and several other works, for the use of his subjects. He understood architecture and music, and was the best mathematician of that age. He composed several fables, parables, and short poems, in the Saxon language, adapted to the capacities of a rude and ferocious people. How unjustly do we complain of our want of time to pursue the paths of knowledge! Alfred, who was afflicted with many bodily infirmities; who, during the greater part of his life, was surrounded with enemies, had fought thirty-six battles in person, and omitted nothing that had a tendency to increase the happiness of his people, was master of every species of learning then cultivated. The fact is astonishing; we are but little acquainted with the powers of the human mind, when fully exerted.

The same economy prevailed with regard to the public revenues. Alfred divided these into two parts; one he dedicated to sacred, and the other to civil uses. The former he subdivided into four parts; the first was dispensed to the poor in general; the second to the support of religious houses founded by himself; the third to the public schools; and the fourth to the building and repairing churches, monasteries, and other public foundations. The moiety devoted to civil uses was subdivided into three parts; the first was destined to the support of his household; the second to the payment of his workmen; and the third third to the entertainment and relief of strangers who resorted to his court.

The happiness and advantage of his subjects formed one of the principal cares of Alfred. His court was the resort of all who were eminent in their profession; and Alfred omitted not this opportunity of enriching his country with all the improvements made in various countries. Agriculture, navigation and commerce, engaged his attention. He lent both ships and money to merchants of character; many of whom extended the trade of their country to Alexandria, and imported from thence the rich commodities of the Indies.

In private life he was great and amiable. His temper was even; his disposition chearful; his conversation agreeable. He was temperate, charitable, beneficent, and generous; at once the prince and father of his people; possessed of every talent, of every acquisition that adorns the human mind; without one vice to fully the lustre of his virtues. No prince had ever a better title to the surname of Great.

A. D. 900. He died on the sixth of October, in the fifty-second year of his age, and the thirtieth of his reign; leaving the nation to lament his death. The tears of a grateful people watered the tomb of Alfred. He left five children; two sons, and three daughters; who all inherited a considerable share of their father's talents and virtues.

EDWARD THE ELDER.

A. D. EDWARD, who ascended the throne on 900. the death of his father Alfred, obtained the surname of Elder from his being the first prince of that name who held the English sceptre. The Danes were in possession of the kingdoms of Northumberland and East-Anglia, and had continued quiet during the latter end of Alfred's reign; they were afraid to provoke a prince of his abilities. But when Alfred paid the debt of nature, they formed a design for shaking off the yoke of servitude, and rendering themselves independent of the English crown. They were persuaded that Edward was not possessed of the great talents of his father, and that a fair opportunity now offered for breaking the shackles of obedience, and, perhaps, of becoming masters of the whole island. Edward, doubtless, appeared to great disadvantage, after so illustrious a father; but he was far from being unable to wield the sceptre with honour to himself, and advantage to his people. He was, indeed, inferior to Alfred in capacity and knowledge; but he equalled him in military skill and conduct. The Danes were, however, fearful of the event; and, under a pretence of submitting chearfully to the government, continued quiet in their territories; till an unforeseen event called them to action.

A. D. 901. Ethelwald, the eldest son of Ethelbert, laid claim to the throne of his father. The Danes supported his pretensions; and these barbarous people, who still retained their native ferocity, sent out bands of robbers, who laid waste the country through which they passed. How feeble are the foundations of the wisest systems of government, till the minds of the people are reclaimed from their vices, and are acquainted with the principles of religion and virtue! Inveterate evils must be destroyed by degrees; a considerable length of time is necessary to change the dispositions of the human heart.

Ethelwald, at the head of a Danish army, made himself master of Wimborn, in Dorsetshire, and Christchurch, in Hampshire; but, on the approach of Edward, he abandoned his conquests, and fled to Normandy, from whence he was afterwards conveyed to Northumberland, and acknowledged king of all the Danish territories in Britain. Edward, who followed the example of his father in giving the enemy no time for preparations, marched directly into Northumberland, reducing all the towns that lay near his route, and laying the whole country waste. Astonished at the expedition of Edward, and finding themselves in no condition to defend their territories against the victorious army of Edward, they banished from their kingdom the prince they had undertaken to protect, and submitted entirely to the clemency of the conqueror.

A. D. 904. Deprived of a sceptre he had hardly received, Ethelwald again returned to Normandy, where he solicited and obtained assistance. He immediately embarked his forces, and landed in East-Anglia. The Danes laid aside their fears at the appearance of a Norman army, and declared openly for Ethelwald. But the abilities and alacrity of Edward rendered all his attempts abortive. He marched, indeed, into Gloucester, and committed the most dreadful ravages on the peaceable inhabitants; but was obliged to fly into East-Anglia on the approach of the English army. Edward carried his arms into the enemy's country, and laid the frontiers waste; but thinking it would be imprudent to penetrate into the heart of East-Anglia, retreated at the head of the main body of his army. A considerable body of Kentish forces, either to revenge themselves on the perfidious Danes; or to acquire a larger share of plunder, did not follow Edward, notwithstanding repeated orders for that purpose. Ethelwald perceived the imprudence of the Kentish forces, and resolved to take advantage of their temerity: they were accordingly surrounded, and cut to pieces. But the advantage was purchased too dear; both Ethelwald, and Eric, the Danish leader, fell in the action.

A. D. 911. But the death of this pretender to the crown established not the public tranquillity. The Danes continued their ravages, and the country again became a scene of misery and distress. Exasperated at the cruelty and perfidious behaviour of the Danes, Edward led his army against the insurgents, totally defeated them, recovered all the booty they had taken, and suffered his army to lay waste the country of these restless infringers of domestic peace.

Edward was nobly assisted in his wars by Elfreda, his sister: her masculine spirit greatly contributed to his success. This intrepid princess disdained the occupations of her sex, as unworthy of her care; the happiness and peace of her country engaged her attention, and she successfully laboured to procure the one and establish the other. Her prudence and virtue were equal to her courage; she seemed to possess the soul of her father Alfred.

A. D. 913. Having, by the assistance of his heroic sister, procured an interval of tranquillity, Edward applied himself to works of public utility, and the encouragement of learning. He rebuilt the city of Hereford, which the Danes had laid in ashes; fortified Witham; repaired several churches and monasteries; and erected the seminary of Cambridge into an university.

A. D. 917. But this interval of peace was terminated too soon. Ever restless, and ever perfidious, the Danes again began their inroads. They delighted in a desultory war; their ferocious souls rejoiced in cruelty; the unsettled occupation of a robber was more agreeable to the brutality of their nature than the placid labours of domestic life. Defeat succeeded defeat: in one part of the kingdom the insurgents were cut to pieces by Elfreda, and routed by Edward in another. But they still continued their depredations: an insatiable love of plunder induced others to follow their example, though common prudence might have told them, that the same crimes would undoubtedly occasion the same punishments.

A. D. 918. These small incursions were, however, nothing more than a prelude to much greater misfortunes. A storm was gathering which required all the abilities of Edward and his intrepid sister to break its force. The Danes in Britany were now so prodigiously increased, that the country was unable to sustain them: an emigration became absolutely necessary. A numerous body under the command of Otar and Rohault, embarked from the southern coast of Britany, entered the mouth of the Severn, and ravaged the country both on the Welsh and English sides of the river. Encouraged by their first success, they extended their incursions as far as Erchenfield, laying the whole country waste. Alarmed at their danger, and exasperated at the cruelties of the enemy, the inhabitants joined the forces of Edward, and marched against the invaders. A battle ensued, in which the Danes were totally defeated, and all the spoil they had taken fell into the hands of the conquerors. Rohault and a brother of Otar were slain in the action; and the fugitives obliged to take shelter in a wood, which was immediately invested by the English. The invaders had now no other method than that of negotiation to avoid inevitable destruction. They sued for peace, and offered hostages for the performance of the conditions of the treaty, and promised to depart the kingdom immediately. But no promises, no treaties, no hostages, have power to bind barbarians, who live by plunder, and continually trample upon the laws of virtue and humanity. They embarked, indeed, and sailed from the mouth of the Severn, but they landed again on the coast of Somersetshire, and again fell to plundering the country. They did not, however, long continue their depredations before they were attacked by the militia of the county, who put the greater part of them to the sword, and the few that escaped fled to Ireland.

A. D. 920. But Edward soon perceived that the Danes were not the only enemies he had to fear. Leofrid the Dane, who was settled in Ireland, assisted by Griffith ap Madoc, brother to the prince of West Wales, landed on the coast, and penetrated as far as Chester. Edward flew at the head of a few forces to the defence of his people, and met the invaders at Sherwood, where a desperate battle ensued. During the action Leofrid encountered hand to hand with Edward, and the contest continued equal for some time, till Edward in giving the Dane a violent blow, broke his sword at the hilt, and he must have fallen a victim to Leofrid had not his son Athelstan flew to his assistance. That prince was more fortunate than his father; he wounded Leofrid so desperately in the arm, that he dropped his spear, and surrendered himself a prisoner. The forces of the enemy were totally defeated, and forced to abandon the kingdom.

A. D. 921. A general insurrection of the Danes now threatened the English with all the horrors of savage barbarity. But the activity of Edward baffled all their designs; they were defeated in every attempt, and forced to abandon every enterprise. They were driven from one part of the country to another: their castles were taken, and their towns laid in ashes; they felt the same distresses they had so often inflicted upon the English. Submission now became their only resource: they accordingly laid down their arms, and readily embraced the terms offered by the victor. Edward, who knew from experience, how little confidence could be placed in the promises and oaths of the Danes, applied himself to render his conquests lasting, by fortifying several towns, and erecting castles in various parts of the kingdom. He even carried his arms beyond the former limits of his territories, and the princes of the Cumbrian and Strathclyd Britons submitted to his government. The Scots also sued for peace, and their king consented to hold his dominions in vassalage of the English crown.

A. D. 925. Edward had now attained the summit of human glory. He saw tranquillity established in every part of his dominions. He saw his subjects happy under his government, and cultivating with the utmost assiduity, the arts of peace. But how short are the periods of human felicity! Edward had hardly subdued his enemies, and terminated the calamities of war, when death put a period to his life in the twenty-sixth year of his age.

Edward was a worthy successor to his father: he imitated his conduct; he imitated his virtues. He was respected by his neighbours; and the ferocious Danes revered his abilities. Intrepid, vigilant and cautious, he was dreaded by his enemies; he never lost a battle. Kind, generous and humane, he was beloved by his people; he laboured for their happiness. He was an enemy to injustice; an implacable scourge to the sons of rapine and violence. He was a friend to learning, and encouraged it to the utmost of his power; persons of merit were sure to meet with protection and encouragement at his court. His people revered his virtues while he lived, and watered his grave with the tears of affection.

ATHELSTAN.

A. D. 925. ATHELSTAN succeeded his father in the throne, by the unanimous voice of the people. A conspiracy was, however, formed to wrest the sceptre from his hand, before he was fixed in the seat of power. Alfred, a nobleman of considerable authority, was at the head of this faction. But before the design was ripe for execution, the secret was discovered, and Alfred sent to prison. Strong suspicions of guilt only appeared against the incendiary; no direct proof could be produced. Alfred resolutely denied the charge, and offered to prove his innocence by an oath before the pope. In these times of superstitious bigotry it was thought, that such a perjury could not escape the vengeance of heaven; the offer was therefore accepted, Alfred repaired to Rome, and the oath was administered by John X. who then filled the papal chair: but Alfred was immediately seized with violent convulsions, and in a few days after expired in the greatest agonies. Whatever might be the cause of this tragical event, which bears a very suspicious aspect, the conspirator was considered as guilty; Athelstan confiscated his estate, and gave it to the monastery of Malmesbury.

But the danger of the conspiracy of Alfred did not terminate with his death. Persuaded that a strong party was formed against Athelstan, the Danes of Northumberland revolted: they hoped to be joined by a powerful faction, and enabled to regain their independence. They penetrated as far as the city of York. Their army was led by their two chiefs Sithric and Inguald; and for some time success followed their standards. But Athelstan marched with such expedition, that the insurgents were surprized, and Sithric was obliged to sue for peace, which was granted granted. Athelstan, who perceived that it would be impossible to establish a lasting peace with the Danes in Northumberland, imagined, that by attaching Sithric firmly to his interest, an union might be effected between the two people. He therefore made Sithric king of Northumberland, and gave him his sister Edgitha in marriage. This political stratagem might possibly have been attended with very happy effects, had not an unforeseen event rendered the scheme abortive. Sithric unfortunately died a few months after his accession to the throne, before the projected union could take place.

A. D. 926. Two of his sons, whom he had by a former marriage, thought themselves entitled to the seat of their father, and took possession of the throne, without waiting for the consent of Athelstan, who resented the insult offered him, and drove them from the kingdom. One of these princes escaped into Scotland, and took refuge in the court of Constantine, who then filled the Scottish throne. Athelstan demanded the fugitive; which being refused, he marched a strong army into Scotland, and reduced the kingdom to such distress, that, in order to preserve his crown, Constantine was obliged to make the most humble submissions. It is generally said, that Constantine did homage to Athelstan for his dominions; but this is disputed.

A. D. 934. Ambitious of recovering the honour he had lost, Constantine joined in a confederacy with Anlaff, a Danish prince settled in Ireland; and Owen, king of the Cumbrian Britons, in order to attack Athelstan, and reduce his power to narrower bounds. Owen accordingly marched, at the head of his Britons, to join Constantine; and Anlaff came from Ireland with a numerous army, in a fleet of two hundred and sixteen sail of large ships. The forces of Anlaff were landed on the north side of the Humber, and marched immediately to join the allies. It was some time before Athelstan could raise an army sufficiently powerful to chastise the invaders of his country; and, during the interval, the troops of the enemy committed many disorders in Northumberland: they even imagined that Athelstan did not dare to meet them in the open field; and this opinion rendered them insolent and careless. But they soon found themselves mistaken; Athelstan appeared, and a decisive battle became inevitable.

For some days the two armies continued quiet in their camps; no acts of hostility passed between them. During this interval of inaction, Anlaff formed a design of seizing or assassinating Athelstan in his tent. He accordingly entered the English camp in the dress of a harper, and was well received by the soldiers. At last he was introduced to Athelstan, who was so delighted with his music, that he rewarded him nobly. A soldier, who had formerly served under Anlaff, had some suspicion that it was his old general concealed in this disguise, and determined to observe all his actions. Anlaff, who scorned to carry away the reward he had received from Athelstan, was no sooner beyond the limits of the English camp, than he cut a hole in the ground, and hid the money. The soldier was now convinced that it was Anlaff, and immediately informed Athelstan of the discovery. The king, suspecting some treacherous design, ordered his tent to be removed; and the spot being left vacant, was occupied by a bishop, who had that evening joined Athelstan with a reinforcement of troops. Every thing continued quiet till midnight, when Anlaff, at the head of a chosen body of troops, broke into the English camp, repaired immediately to the spot where he had observed the king's tent, and slew the bishop, with all his followers. This action gave the alarm, and Anlaff escaped, with difficulty, to the allied army.

As soon as the morning appeared, the English attacked the enemy; and the action soon became general. The victory was, for some time, doubtful; but at last declared for the English. The allies were driven from the field of battle with prodigious slaughter; and the few that escaped, sought their safety in a precipitate flight. Anlaff and Owen, with a small number of their followers, reached their ships with the utmost difficulty. Constantine was wounded, and taken prisoner. But unable to recover his spirits after this defeat, or determined not to do homage for his dominions, he resigned his crown, and retired into a convent.

A. D. 941. Athelstan now rested from the toils of war, and applied himself to a task more agreeable to his nature, the cultivation of the arts of peace. He applied himself, with the utmost assiduity, to promote the happiness of his people, and render it lasting. But while he was labouring for the good of his country, he paid the debt of nature, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and the sixteenth of his reign.

Athelstan was one of the greatest princes among the Saxons. His valour and affability were equally great, and equally admired. Though successful in war, he was naturally a lover of peace. He was at once intrepid, prudent, beneficent, and religious. He was learned himself, and a generous friend to the learned; respected by his enemies, and beloved by his friends. Convinced that commerce is the true source of riches, he encouraged it to the utmost of his power. He enacted a law, by which every merchant, who had made three long voyages to the Mediterranean, on his own account, was advanced to the rank of nobility. The same honour was conferred on a farmer who had acquired, by his own industry, five hides of land, and who possessed a chapel, a kitchen, a hall, and a bell. His desire of spreading the knowledge of the gospel among his subjects, should be mentioned with honour. He caused the Bible to be translated into the Saxon language, that every person might enjoy the advantage of being acquainted with the sacred writings.

E D M U N D I.

A. D. EDMUND was not eighteen years of age 941. when he ascended the throne, on the death of Athelstan his brother; but had given so many proofs of his valour against the enemies of his country, that the greatest expectations were justly conceived of his reign.

The Danes, however, considered his youth as a favourable circumstance, and that an opportunity now offered for recovering their independence, and placing one of their own countrymen on the throne of Northumberland. They considered Anlaff as a person well qualified for leading their armies, and supporting himself against the whole power of Edmund. Messengers were accordingly dispatched to Ireland; and Anlaff, pleased with an opportunity of wiping out the stain of his late defeat, readily embraced the offer. But not thinking his own army sufficient to oppose Edmund, he formed an alliance with Olaus, king of Norway, and received from that prince a strong reinforcement of ships and men. With this additional force he invaded Northumberland; and the Danes, who were governed by the spirit of revolt, joined his standards. He found means to carry on a secret correspondence with the principal inhabitants of York, and was admitted into that city on his first appearance. Many towns opened their gates to the invaders, and others were easily reduced; so that Anlaff was soon in possession of the chief places in Northumberland. But his ambition increased with his acquisitions; the crown he came to receive was not sufficient to satisfy the desires of Anlaf. He advanced into Mercia, at the head of his army, and was very favourably received by his countrymen, who joined his standards, and assisted him to reduce several places that had been wrested from that kingdom by Edward.

The insolence of Anlaf fired young Edmund with a desire of revenging the insults offered to his country. He assembled his army with the utmost expedition, and marched immediately against the enemy. The two armies met at Chester, where a very obstinate battle ensued, and continued till night put an end to the contest. The victory still continued doubtful: neither appearing to have gained any advantage over the other. Both armies encamped upon the field of battle, in order to renew the fight as soon as the morning appeared. But Odo and Wulfstan, archbishops of Canterbury and York, laboured the whole night to put a stop to the further effusion of human blood, and had the good fortune to succeed. A peace was concluded, by which all the country north of Watling-street was ceded to Anlaf, who now sat down on the throne of Northumberland without opposition.

A.D. 943. The Danes soon perceived they were strangers to their own interest, when they called Anlaf to the throne. He had agreed to pay Olaus, king of Norway, a very considerable sum for his assistance, and soon after he received the sceptre, laid a very heavy tax on his subjects to fulfil his engagements. The impoverished state of the country rendered this impost doubly severe. They complained, but obtained no redress: Anlaf was inexorable. The natural consequences followed: the affections of the people were alienated from their king; they considered him as an usurper whom they had invited to the throne. The inhabitants of Deira went still farther: they sent for Reinald, the nephew of Anlaf, from Ireland, and crowned him at York. Anarchy succeeded unanimity: the kingdom was divided into parties, and each endeavoured to establish their own power on the ruin of others.

A.D. 944. A favourable opportunity now offered to reduce the insurgents, and Edmund was careful to embrace it. He made preparations for invading Northumberland, but carried them on in so secret a manner, that the Danes never suspected that their country would soon become a scene of war and desolation. They were wholly employed in harassing one another, when Edmund entered Northumberland, and laid it waste with fire and sword. The Danes were confounded: they had made no preparations for a defence, and were therefore obliged to submit to the clemency of the English monarch. The soul of Edmund was too generous to insult a fallen enemy. He even permitted each of them to wear the crown they had received from the people; but insisted on their embracing the christian religion. The Danish princes made no difficulty of complying with the terms of the treaty. It was no uncommon thing for them to be pagans or christians, as they were induced by circumstances or conjunctures: they were always swayed by interest: they were too ignorant to comprehend, and too ferocious to embrace the tenets of the gospel.

A.D. 945. The Cumbrian Britons having assisted the Northumbrians in their late revolt, Edmund marched into their country at the head of his army; drove their prince from the throne, and bestowed his dominions on Malcolm, king of Scotland; who undertook the defence of the northern border, and did homage to Edmund, as lord paramount of the soil.

A.D. 946. The success of Edmund restored the tranquillity of England. Disappointments and misfortunes had taught the Danes that opposition only accumulated distress; and that there was no other method of acquiring happiness, than that of submitting quietly to the government. The English, freed from the ravages of the ferocious Danes, applied themselves to cultivate the arts of peace. They were happy under the government of a prince, whose valour had reduced their enemies to subjection, and whose generosity and humane government, encouraged them to improve the advantages that resulted from the tranquillity of their country. But while they were pleasing themselves with the hopes of enjoying, for a long interval of time, the blessings of uninterrupted happiness, a tragical event blasted all their hopes, and put a final period to all their expectations. While the king was celebrating the feast of St. Augustine in the church of Puckle in Gloucestershire, he observed at one of the tables a notorious robber called Leoff, whom he himself had banished for his crimes. Provoked at his insolence, he commanded the steward to apprehend the villain. But Leoff being too strong for the officer, refused to quit the place. Exasperated at seeing his orders disobeyed even in his presence, Edmund leaped from his seat, seized Leoff by the hair and threw him on the floor. Perceiving his death inevitable, the villain drew a dagger, and plunged it into the monarch's breast. Death followed the wound, and Edmund fell by the ignoble hand of a robber. His nobles, exasperated to madness, fell upon the regicide and cut him to pieces with their swords.

The youth of this prince, and the short time he sat upon the throne, render it impossible to draw his character with justice and with truth. Too young to display the talents which time would have unfolded, it can only be observed, that the imperfect specimens he gave of his prudence seemed to indicate that he would have cast no dishonourable shade on the illustrious virtues of his father. Equally valiant with his immediate predecessors, he reduced the enemies of his country to obedience; he hushed the jarring passions of different people into peace. His victories in the field are irrefragable proofs of his courage; the pains he took to render his people happy are demonstrations of his humanity.

E D R E D.

A.D. 946. EDMUND left two sons, but being both infants, and therefore incapable of holding the reins of government with that steadiness which the complexion of the times rendered necessary, they were set aside, and Edred, brother to the deceased monarch, placed upon the throne.

A change of government was a signal of rebellion to the Northumberland Danes. They renounced their allegiance on the death of Edmund, and flew to arms to defend their independence. Edred, who was no stranger to their turbulent dispositions, marched immediately into Northumberland, and wasted the country with fire and sword. Terrified at the progress of the English army, the Danes had recourse to their usual method of negotiation: they sued for peace in the most abject manner. Edred granted their request; but to prevent any insurrections for the future, he placed garrisons in all the fortresses of strength, under an able governor, who was charged to watch the motions of the restless Danes, with the greatest circumspection.

A. D. 953. Peace being thus restored, Edred applied himself to exercises more agreeable to his inclinations than those of war. Religion, or rather superstition, formed the chief feature in the character of Edred; and Dunstan, the famous abbot of Gloucestbury, was his adviser, his director, and, in reality, the sole governor of the kingdom. Dunstan was one of those bold and enterprising men, whom pity cannot soften, and whose stubborn prejudices frequently interrupt the tranquillity of nations. He had no merits but those of a churchman; as an Englishman, they were execrable. He was zealous without discretion; artful without wisdom; profuse without elegance; and open without sincerity. The superstitious monarch was, however, deceived; he even submitted to receive corporal punishment from his hands. The great object Dunstan had in view, and which he pursued with the most unwearied diligence, was the celibacy of the clergy, which he was desirous of extending over the whole kingdom; and, to effect this, he did not scruple to sacrifice the lives of the innocent, or the peace and harmony of his country. Before this period, the monks in England lived without any other restraint than that of virtue; they were even at liberty to marry. The kingdom was full of priests and monks, who lived publicly with their wives. Celibacy was little known in England; the rule of St. Benedict principally prevailed. The new monks, under the patronage of Dunstan, attracted the veneration of the people by the austerity of their lives: they declaimed with warmth against the secular clergy, whose lives were immoral and offensive. Provoked at this attack, and more at the loss of their benefices, of which they were deprived to make way for the preferment of the new monks, the secular clergy inveighed against them in the most violent manner; their harangues were plentifully seasoned with invective and abuse. These disputes disturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom; they excited very alarming commotions among a superstitious and bigotted people.

A. D. 955. But heaven thought proper to stop, for a season, this unchristian contention. Edred was seized with a quinsy, and expired on the twenty-third of November, in the tenth year of his reign; lamented by Dunstan and his monks, who lost a powerful friend, and a generous benefactor.

The flatteries of the monks, and the servile applauses of a deluded multitude, have given a false lustre to the character of Edred. His valour was unquestionable; his virtue was never impeached. But superstition, the parent of misery and disorder, blasted his fame, and tarnished his reputation. He discarded his reason, to follow the dictates of a blind enthusiasm; and exposed his people to contentions and distress, to indulge the caprice of a blind and headstrong zeal.

E D W Y.

A. D. E DWY, who ascended the throne on the 955. death of his brother Edred, was not above seventeen years of age when he was placed in the seat of power by the unanimous suffrages of the people. His soul was very susceptible of the tender passions; and the charms of Ethelgiva, a beautiful princess of the royal blood, had made a strong impression on his heart. She was related to him in the third or fourth degree; but his passion was too strong to submit to the ecclesiastical rules of consanguinity; he married the princess without publishing his nuptials. Edwy did not tread in the steps of his predecessor; he was no slave to superstition. He had a piercing genius of his own, and dared to follow the dictates of his reason. Dunstan saw that he should no longer be trusted with the rod of power, and declaimed violently against the vices of Edwy. The whole fraternity of monks joined their leader, and concerted the disgrace of the monarch. An opportunity soon offered for putting their scheme in execution. On the day of his coronation, Edwy, fatigued with the tedious ceremony, and willing to avoid the excessive drinking then universally practised, retired from table to the apartment of Ethelgiva. The nobles looking upon the absence of their king as an affront offered to themselves, complained of the insult. Dunstan saw their disgust with a secret satisfaction, and starting from his seat, rushed into the apartment of Ethelgiva, reproached the king for his behaviour in the harshest terms, and dragged him forcibly back to the company of the nobles.

Exasperated at this outrage of the insolent monk, Edwy determined to restrain his power, and convince him, that a polite behaviour at least is due to a monarch of England. His friends, who hated Dunstan, cherished the flames of resentment, and made use of every method in their power to infligate Edwy to revenge. The prince accordingly called upon Dunstan to render an account of his administration of the treasury during the reign of Edred; Dunstan refused to comply; upon which he was declared guilty of malversation in his office, and banished the kingdom.

This exertion of the royal authority roused the attention of the whole clergy. Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, one of the most virulent fanatics of the age, suspecting that the resentment of Ethelgiva had been the principal cause of Dunstan's banishment, determined to take a severe revenge on that innocent princess. His soul was a stranger to compassion; he cherished not the virtue of humanity. He sent into the royal palace a company of soldiers, who, with more than brutal violence, dragged the fair Ethelgiva from the arms of her royal consort, branded her face with a red-hot iron, and conveyed her into Ireland. Happily for Odo, and unfortunately for his country, the blind superstition of the times supported his insolence. The monks had filled the minds of the people with a false, ridiculous terror; they pretended that christianity itself must stand or fall with their order; they construed the just resentment of offended majesty into an act of the highest impiety; they represented Dunstan as one of the vicereagents of heaven, and his banishment as a prelude to the total destruction of the religion of the gospel.

Exasperated at the insolence and barbarity of Odo, and afraid of his power, Edwy turned all his rage against the monks; whom he banished from the kingdom. Had he pursued the blow, and drove Odo also out of the island; had he employed the same resolution in securing his throne, as in vindicating his honour; the wreath of royalty would, probably, have flourished on his brow, and an interval of tranquillity succeeded the clamours of disappointed bigotry. But the popularity of Odo intimidated Edwy: he suffered the insolent prelate to enjoy his power unmolested, and lost his crown by the very method he took to preserve it.

A. D. 957. There is no difficulty in arming a superstitious people against their prince, when they are persuaded he is an enemy to religion. The virulence of disappointed malice had blackened the character of Edwy; he was considered as a monster of impiety, whose actions cried to heaven for vengeance. The inhabitants of Mercia and Northumberland flew to arms; placed Edgar, a younger brother of Edwy, at their head, and proceeded to acts of violence. Dunstan was recalled from banishment, and Edgar put himself wholly under his direction. The standard of rebellion was changed into the standard of religion, by the sanction of a miracle. It was asserted that a voice was heard from heaven, commanding the nobles to set the crown on Edgar's head. Edwy was abandoned by all his subjects, except the West Saxons, and finding it impossible to stem the torrent of opposition, shut himself up in the city of Gloucester. About this time the lovely Ethelgiva, having been cured of her wounds, was returning from Ireland to enjoy once more the happiness of her husband's company. But the heart of Odo was steel'd against the soft pleadings of compassion: his emissaries intercepted her in her journey, and Ethelgiva fell a victim to the fury of unrelenting bigotry.

The civil war still raged with unrelenting violence; till at last both parties, fatiated with blood and slaughter, and perhaps feeling some compassion for the miseries of their country, agreed to terminate their quarrel by a treaty of peace; by which Edgar was permitted to enjoy all his conquests, with the title of king; and Edwy obliged to content himself with the kingdom of Wessex. Odo paid the debt of nature during these unhappy divisions: he died without seeing the triumph of the monks over the secular clergy. Dunstan was promoted to the bishopric of Worcester, to that of London, and to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. The conscientious monk scrupled not to enjoy all these three benefices at the same time.

A. D. 959. Robbed of his amiable Ethelgiva, stripped of his kingdom by an unnatural usurpation, and considered by his subjects as a monster of impiety, Edwy became a prey to melancholy. He had lost every thing that was dear to him, and life itself became a burden. He pined in secret, and at last paid the debt of nature; but not without some suspicions of treachery. Several monks have related, that his soul having been carried into hell, one of those malignant spirits flew immediately to Dunstan with the news; but that the saint, instead of giving himself up to a cruel joy, prayed so fervently for the deceased, that the deity granted his salvation. Very little confidence surely can be placed in the veracity of writers, who scruple not to propagate such absurd relations.

The characters of few princes have suffered more from monkish malevolence than that of Edwy. They have loaded him with almost every vice, though they have not been able to bring a single instance to support the calumny. His severity to Dunstan has been represented as a crime of the deepest dye; a crime against the majesty of heaven. But surely the insolence of that reforming monk deserved a severer chastisement. Whatever power the harangues of pretended sanctity might, in that age of superstitious bigotry, have over the minds of an ignorant people, they have long since lost their force. Reason has resumed her throne, and stripped hypocrisy of the flimsy robe woven by the hand of monkish subterfuge to conceal her deformity; and exposed to the detestation of the humane and the virtuous, the detestable vices that so long lurked under the cloak of religion. It is not, however, intended to represent the character of Edwy as perfect. Frailties form one of the characteristics of humanity. A prince absolutely faultless must be more than man. His youth, however, may be urged as an apology for all his failings. Had he, like his predecessors, submitted to the government of Dunstan, all his faults had been forgotten; and his virtues displayed with all the powers of monkish eloquence.

E D G A R.

A. D. COULD any excuse be offered for rebellion, 959. the merits of Edgar would have excused the insurgents. Desirous of cultivating the arts of peace, he took the most prudent methods to secure tranquillity. He was too well acquainted with the turbulent disposition of the Northumbrian Danes to trust them with any power. He divided their country into two governments, and stationed a strong body of troops on the northern borders, that they might be always at hand to stop the inroads of an enemy, and quell any insurrection that might happen among the restless inhabitants.

But what rendered him far more formidable, and will transmit his name with honour to posterity, was his powerful navy, which was far superior to any thing enjoyed by his predecessors. His fleet was superior to all the marine forces in Europe. Authors are not agreed with regard to the number of his ships: Malmesbury says, that his navy consisted of no less than four thousand eight hundred vessels: others, that their number was not more than three thousand six hundred. But however that be, this powerful navy was divided into three squadrons. The first was constantly stationed on the eastern, the second on the western, and the third on the northern coasts of the kingdom.

Nor did he suffer this powerful navy to be idle and rotting in different harbours; he kept them cruising during the summer months, and always in readiness to attack an enemy on his first appearance. He himself sailed round the island constantly once a year. His custom was to go on board the eastern squadron immediately after Easter, and sailing to the westward scoured all the channel from the mouth of the Thames to the Land's-End in Cornwall. This being the limit of their cruise, he went on board the western fleet, and standing to the northward he looked into every bay and creek, on the English and Scottish coasts, and also of Ireland and the Hebrides. Then going on board the northern squadron he visited all the harbours in that quarter, and landed at the mouth of the Thames. These and other regulations conceived with prudence and executed with vigour, preserved his own subjects in a due subordination, and rendered him the terror of his enemies. But the favour he shewed the monks was the most powerful method he employed to establish the public tranquillity. It is not, however, easy to determine, whether these indulgences flowed from his inclination, his gratitude, or his policy. This, however, is certain, that Dunstan and two other bishops, who were equally devoted to him, were consulted in all the affairs of government; they may even be said to have directed every measure of importance. The secular clergy were ignominiously expelled from the monasteries, and their places filled with Benedictine monks, who were equally zealous in promoting the interests of their own order, and in exposing the vices, and loading with obloquy the members of other religious establishments. They were supported by the hand of power, and all arguments urged against them were in vain. Edgar convened a general council of the ecclesiastics of his kingdom, and pronounced in that assembly a long discourse against the secular clergy. He painted their vices in the most glaring and odious colours. This speech, which was then considered as a master-piece of eloquence, is deeply tinged with the spirit of the times. Among a multitude of grave accusations, there occurs a ridiculous charge against the secular clergy, on account of the smallness of their treasure, which in that superstitious age, was considered as an accusation of no small importance.

The first interview of EDGAR (A. D.) ELFRIDA

This harangue procured him the most unbounded adulation of the monks. But their endeavours to change crimes into virtues have now lost their force; their eulogiums are obnoxious to suspicion, and their panegyrics to ridicule.

Edgar was remarkable for the dissoluteness of his manners. The virtue of no lady was safe, if celebrated for her beauty. Even the sacred recesses of devotion were not sufficient to protect innocence, nor exclude from the amorous monarch the votaries to religion. He carried off and ravished a nun, though opposed by the whole convent. Dunstan, indeed, reproached him for this atrocious crime, but no other punishment was inflicted on him, than a prohibition from wearing his crown during seven years. Edwy, who had not been half so criminal, was deprived of his sceptre. But Edwy opposed, and Edgar supported Dunstan.

A. D. 961. But, among all the amorous adventures of Edgar, that by which he obtained the beautiful Elfrida is the most singular, and therefore must not be passed over in silence. Elfrida was the daughter and heiress to Ordgar, earl of Devon; one of the first and richest noblemen in the kingdom. Desirous of fixing in her mind the principles of virtue, Ordgar caused his daughter to be educated privately in the country; but the fame of her beauty could not be confined; it filled the whole kingdom. Edgar often heard the praises of Elfrida, and conceived a design of making her his partner in the throne. But, desirous of knowing whether her charms were really equal to the portrait delineated by fame, Edgar dispatched Athelwold, his favourite and first minister, into Devonshire, with directions to pay a visit to her father, in order to obtain a sight of Elfrida, and bring him a certain account of her beauty. Athelwold himself was young, and very susceptible of the tender passions; so that the charms of Elfrida stifled in his breast every sentiment of duty, and inspired him with a resolution of attempting to gain her for himself. He returned to Edgar, and made a false report of the charms of Elfrida: he represented her as a person of ordinary beauty; and convinced Edgar, that she was not an object proper for his affections. He, however, artfully insinuated, that though she was unworthy to be the consort of a king, she would be an advantageous match for a subject; and that the vast estate of her father would be to him a sufficient compensation for the want of beauty in her person. Edgar readily gave his consent, and Ethelwold, soon after, married Elfrida. Conscious of the danger that must attend him, should Edgar discover the treacherous part he had acted, Athelwold took every precaution in his power to conceal the beautiful Elfrida from observation. But his perfidy was not long concealed. Edgar, either by chance, or the information of some enemy to Athelwold, was informed of the whole transaction. Exasperated at the treachery of his favourite, Edgar determined to take a severe revenge; but, in order to render the blow more certain, he dissembled his rage, and told Ethelwold, in a very careless manner, that he intended to hunt in the neighbourhood of his seat, and proposed to pay him a visit. The favourite, alarmed at the king's design, and being incapable of making any plausible excuse to elude the royal visit, set out a few hours before the king, under pretence of making the necessary preparations. On his arrival, he discovered the whole to Elfrida, conjuring her to use her utmost address to conceal from the amorous monarch those charms which nature had so lavishly bestowed upon her, lest they should prove the destruction of their domestic peace. But his request was made to a woman conscious of the power of beauty, and enflamed with the ambition of seeing a monarch at her feet. Instead of pursuing the advice of her husband, she studiously displayed all the graces of her person. Love and fury took possession of the insulted monarch's breast; but he concealed the gathering storm from the eyes of his perfidious favourite. He carried him with him to hunt in the forest of Harewood, and stabbed him with his own hand. Elfrida, to expiate the guilt of being accessory to the murder of her husband, erected a monastery on the spot where he was slain, and was, soon after, married to Edgar.

A. D. 974. But these follies of irregular passion did not divert the attention of Edgar from promoting the happiness of his people. The whole kingdom had hitherto been infested with wolves, and Edgar nobly exerted his authority to extirpate that ravenous species of animals from the kingdom. But, on being closely pursued, they took shelter in the mountains and forests of Wales. Edgar, therefore, changed the tribute, which had been imposed upon the Welsh princes, into an annual tax of three hundred heads of wolves. This produced the desired effect; that creature, in a little time, was no longer to be found in any part of the kingdom.

The monks, who have given us the history of Edgar's reign, have shamefully neglected the chronology, in order to dress up every period of his government in the tinsel robe of flattery. The whole is rather a panegyric on his person and character, than a regular series of his actions. It was, however, about this time, that Edgar gave an instance of his vanity, which it would have been no reproach to their endeavours to add a lustre to his character; had his historians suffered it to glide down the current of time neglected and forgotten. Edgar summoned the tributary princes to attend him at Chester, and going on board his barge, they rowed him down the river Dee to the monastery of St. John the Baptist, while he himself sat at the helm.

A. D. 975. The peaceable reign of Edgar now drew towards a close. Few princes, in those turbulent times, ever enjoyed a longer interval of tranquillity; indeed, few ever took such prudent methods to obtain it. He was feared and respected by his enemies, from his accession to the throne, till he paid the debt of nature, which happened in the thirty-third year of his age, and the nineteenth of his reign.

It is no easy task to draw a just character of Edgar. The monks, not satisfied with displaying his virtues as a king, have been ambitious of making him pass for a saint. But surely it is difficult to reconcile his actions and the dissoluteness of his manners with the christian perfections that constitute that character. If the enriching churches and monasteries be considered as the greatest virtues, Edgar may be justly considered as a saint. This was indeed the opinion in that age of ignorance and bigotry, and on that basis the sanctity of Edgar is founded. The ages of superstition are not the same with the ages of morality.

But though Edgar has no claim to the title conferred upon him by the pen of adulation, his political talents for government add a real lustre to his character. Notwithstanding his youth, he was a consummate politician, a wise legislator, a patriot king. The prudent methods he pursued for preventing invasions, do him the highest honour. His laws for the preservation of civil happiness are equally admirable. Ever attentive to the trade of his subjects, he regulated the coin of the kingdom, and took care that it should be of a proper degree of fineness, in order to support the credit of the nation in foreign markets. He also reduced the weights and measures to one standard. In a word, he exerted himself so nobly to procure the happiness of his people, and maintain the honour of his crown, that it were to be wished his failings had been less, or that they had been for ever buried in the gulph of forgetfulness.

EDWARD, surnamed THE MARTYR.

A. D. 975. DISCORD, and all the horrors of a civil war, threatened the nation on the death of Edgar. The great power of Dunstan had alarmed the nobles, and they were now desirous of preventing the mitre from giving laws to the crown. The ambitious Elfrida was no stranger to their sentiments, and determined, if possible, to obtain for Ethelred, her own son, the sceptre of his father, and exclude Edward from his birthright. She fanned the flame of suspicion in the breasts of the nobles, by placing the tyrannical designs of the monks in the most odious point of light. Success at first attended the labours of Elfrida: the nobles were alarmed at their danger; the monks were driven from their benefices in many parts of the kingdom, and the secular clergy restored to their possessions. This successful beginning encouraged Elfrida, whose credit increased in proportion as that of the monks declined. Some doubts had long subsisted with regard to the former marriage of Edgar, and Elfrida lost not the advantage: she urged them, with all the force of female eloquence, as a sufficient reason for setting aside the succession of Edward. Dunstan saw his danger; and, by vigilance and activity, rendered the scheme of Elfrida abortive. He summoned an assembly of the states, and met them in all the pomp of ecclesiastical greatness. He knew the power of Elfrida's party, and feared the majority would declare for Ethelred. No time was therefore given for debate: the archbishop, instead of explaining the intention of this general meeting, led Edward into the midst of the assembly, and set the crown on his head. The members were astonished at his arbitrary proceeding, but the great power of Dunstan silenced every complaint. The resentment of the people, who considered that prelate as a prophet, and one of the viceregents of heaven, extorted a general consent. Edward was placed upon the throne of his father.

The reins of government fell into the hands of Dunstan on the accession of Edward, who was only fourteen years of age when he received, from the hands of that prelate, the sceptre of Edgar. The secular clergy were now exposed to all the fury of monkish resentment. But as the declarations of a prince in his minority, and wholly at the devotion of Dunstan, would carry the most glaring marks of suspicion, recourse was had to miracles and revelations in behalf of the monks. A general council was held at Winchester, where a voice issuing from a crucifix declared in favour of the order of St. Benedict. But this pretended miracle was performed in too blundering a manner to extort conviction; the monks only asserted it was real. Dunstan was exasperated at the obstinacy of his opponents, and took care his next miracle should be attended with more alarming consequences. A general council was held at Calne, in Wiltshire, where, before the major part of the members were arrived, Beornholm, an Irish bishop celebrated for his learning, offered to undertake the defence of the secular clergy; but Dunstan declined the contest, under pretence that he was old and infirm; adding, that it would be the highest degree of impiety to dispute on a subject which had been determined by a miraculous voice from heaven. Beornholm considered this answer as a mere subterfuge, and determined to maintain his thesis before the whole assembly; but a dreadful catastrophe prevented his design. He had hardly begun the debate, before the floor of the room, in which the assembly was held, fell down, and great numbers were crushed to death; but the beam which supported the seat of Dunstan, stood firm, and the prelate remained unhurt amidst the general slaughter. These pious frauds, considered as miracles in these times of ignorant bigotry, put an end to the contest. It was thought that the Deity had visibly interposed in favour of the celibacy of the clergy, and no farther opposition was made to the scheme for extending it over the whole kingdom.

Soon after Edward's accession to the throne, Elfrida retired, with her son, to Corfe-castle, in Dorsetshire. All animosities between her and the reigning prince seemed to be entirely forgotten, and the former peace and harmony to be restored. On the part of Edward, this reconciliation was real; but Elfrida nursed in secret the fury of revenge, and waited only for a favourable opportunity to execute her horrid design.

A. D. 978. Edward, who harboured no suspicion of treachery, left his attendants in the adjacent forest, where he was hunting, in order to pay a visit to his mother-in-law. He was received with all the external marks of affection by Elfrida; but while he was drinking a cup of wine, he was treacherously stabbed in the back by one of her servants, whom the ambitious Elfrida had prevailed upon to execute her horrid purpose. Edward, on receiving the wound, immediately set spurs to his horse, to escape a second blow, and reach his companions; but the stroke was mortal. He fainted with the loss of blood, fell from his horse, and one of his feet catching in the stirrup, he was dragged a considerable distance along the road; and expired. The servants of Elfrida followed Edward, took up the body, and threw it into a well, to conceal, if possible, the horrid murder. But their attempts were in vain; the body was found a few days after, and buried at Wareham. Elfrida, either stung with remorse for the horrid crime she had committed, or to prevent the effects of the storm which threatened to overwhelm her, retired into one of the monasteries she erected to expiate her guilt, and passed the remainder of her days in penitence and obscurity.

The small time the unfortunate prince Edward filled the throne, his youth, and the few civil events that happened in his reign, render it impossible to draw his character. The monks, who were the only historians of these times, have represented him as a saint, but without giving any reasons for conferring the appellation upon him. They have, however, furnished us with the only plausible reason that can be given for his acquiring the surname of martyr. They tell us, that miracles were wrought at his tomb. The peculiar favour conferred by the Deity on the ancient martyrs, was, if we believe the monks, extended to Edward.

E T H E L R E D II.

A. D. 978. ETHELRED was now the lawful heir to the throne of England. The crime of Elfrida, which secluded her from the world, procured the sceptre for her son. Dunstan saw it would be in vain to oppose his accession, and therefore anointed Ethelred, and placed the crown upon his head. He knew the dispositions of Ethelred were never favourable to the monks, and suspected that his own behaviour in the contest between him and his brother had not rendered them more propitious. But he hoped that time might efface the injury, and the sanctity of the monks recommend them to his protection.

Ethelred was only in the twelfth year of his age, when he ascended the throne of his ancestors. He was without experience, without learning, without knowledge. He had no capacity, no genius, no courage. His abilities were unequal to the task of governing a kingdom in the midst of a profound peace, much less in times of danger and distress. The nation was rent into two factions, both courted the favour of Ethelred, and both endeavoured to blacken the character of each other. He wanted penetration to distinguish the caresses of fidelity from those of adulation, and became fluctuating and irresolute: hence his whole conduct was a series of timidity, indolence, perplexity and distrust. The nobles had taken advantage of his brother's weakness, to render their power almost independent of the crown. The royal authority had, in a great measure, lost its force, and the safety of the nation, which depended on the union of the nobility, was destroyed.

A. D. 987. The monks had more than once experienced that Ethelred was not a friend to their order. He besieged the bishop of Rochester in the capital of his own diocese; and the prelate was obliged to purchase his safety with a considerable sum of money. But the opposition they met with from Ethelred, was only a prelude to their misfortunes; Dunstan now paid the debt of nature, and left them exposed to the malice of their enemies. A strong contest ensued with regard to a person qualified to fill the see of Dunstan. The monks were at last victorious, and Ethelgar, a monk of Glastonbury, was elected archbishop of Canterbury. He did not, however, long enjoy the archiepiscopal dignity; and on his death, the see was occupied by Siricius, originally a monk of the same seminary. But he was not equal to Dunstan either in abilities or affection for the monks.

Sixty years had elapsed since the kingdom had been desolated by the ravages of the Danes. The navy of Edgar had ruined their fleets, and confined their pyratral cruises to the shores and harbours of the continent. But the feeble administration of Ethelred, and the destruction of the English ships, which had been suffered to rot in their harbours, encouraged that northern people to renew their ravages. They did not, however, attempt a general invasion till by several previous trials they were assured of the weakness of the government. Having thus obtained sufficient knowledge of the disposition of the English, Guthmund and Justin, two Danish generals, landed with a powerful army at Ipswich in Suffolk. But neither the calamities of his country, nor the danger of losing his crown, could rouse Ethelred from the couch of indolence. Instead of taking the field in person, or endeavouring to excite the courage of his subjects, he listened to the timorous counsel of Siricius, archbishop of Canterbury, and procured a respite from the horrors of devastation by a method calculated rather to stimulate their avarice, and augment their confidence of success, than to procure a lasting peace to his subjects. He purchased the departure of the Danes, at the price of ten thousand pounds. This infamous treaty was attended with the consequences that must have been expected. The Danes employed the money they received from Ethelred in fitting out a more powerful fleet, not to ravage but to conquer the island.

A. D. 993. This formidable armament was commanded by Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olaus, king of Norway. They ravaged Durham and Yorkshire without opposition. At last the English army appeared, and the Danes would have paid dearly for their plunder; had not three of their leaders, all of Danish extraction, betrayed the cause they had undertaken to defend. They basely went over to the enemy, and left their troops to be cut to pieces by the swords of the barbarians. Flushed with success, and animated with avarice, the Danes advanced against London, but the citizens opposed the enemy with so much spirit and resolution, that the invaders, after losing a great number of men, were obliged to raise the siege, and make a precipitate retreat. This disappointment raised the fury of the Danes to the highest pitch; they laid great part of Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire waste, and committed the most horrid cruelties on the innocent inhabitants. In this distress, recourse was again had to negotiation, and the Danes agreed to quit the country on receiving sixteen thousand pounds. The treaty was concluded and the enemy returned to their own country. Olaus, who embraced christianity in England, and who is registered among the saints, religiously observed the conditions of the agreement. He never more attempted to interrupt the tranquillity of England.

A. D. 999. The interval of peace purchased by this infamous treaty, was of no long duration. New armies of barbarians under different leaders soon returned, and spread the horror of war and devastation over various parts of the country. The cowardly indolence of the king, and the treacherous behaviour of his subjects, increased the dreadful calamities, and threatened the island with inevitable destruction. In this alarming crisis, an unexpected event saved the kingdom. The Danes whom the famous Rollo a century before had settled in Normandy, and who had always supported their countrymen in their descents on the English coast, now stood in need of their assistance. Robert, king of France, had defeated the army of Richard II. duke of Normandy, and threatened to drive him out of his dominions. The Danes in England flew immediately to the assistance of Richard, and the English enjoyed a short respite from the miseries of war.

A. D. 1000. But Ethelred was too indolent to make a proper use of this interval of tranquillity; the Danes when they returned from Normandy, found the kingdom as defenceless as before. They again commenced their ravages, and, if possible, exceeded their former acts of barbarity. Ethelred had no recourse to his usual expedients, in order to purchase a peace for a people he wanted courage to defend. He agreed to pay the enemy twenty-four thousand pounds, provided they would immediately depart the kingdom. The money was raised by a tax levied on the people, under the denomination of Danegeld.

lutely necessary; and Edric, finding his perfidy detected, went over to the enemy.

Canute now ravaged the country without opposition. The distress of the people was augmented by insolence, and barbarity was added to destruction. The heart of Edmund was pierced by the miseries of his country, but treachery prevented his affording them any relief. In the midst of these dreadful scenes of adverse fortune, Ethelred paid the debt of nature, in the fiftieth year of his age, and the thirty-seventh of his reign.

Few of the virtues that add lustre to a crown fell to the share of Ethelred. His cruelty in massacring the Danes has stained his character with infamy. His indolence, at the beginning of his reign, involved his country in misfortunes; and his attachment to the traitor Edric completed its distress. The most consummate abilities would, indeed, have been hardly sufficient to save the nation at this dangerous crisis, when dissensions prevailed among the counsellors, and treachery among the generals. The timorous disposition of Ethelred was ill adapted to hold the reins of government in those times of danger and distraction. He wanted that fortitude which was necessary to support him amidst such complicated scenes of national distress; and that intrepidity which would have animated him to punish treachery, and retaliate on the invaders of his country all the miseries they had inflicted upon an innocent people.

Ethelred was not, however, wholly destitute of virtues. He enacted several excellent laws, by which the property and safety of the subject were secured, both from the oppressive power of the great, and the illegal innovations of the artful.

EDMUND II. surnamed IRONSIDE.

A. D. 1016. IF valour and intrepidity, blended with compassion, and directed by prudence, could have saved the nation from the yoke of slavery, Edmund would have accomplished the noble design. But the power of the enemy, and the treachery of pretended friends, rendered the task superior to human abilities. Canute, at the head of a victorious army, threatened the destruction of English liberty. Unanimity was absolutely necessary at this alarming crisis; but Edmund had reason to fear, that both his nobility and prelates were deeply tainted with perfidy. The soul of Edmund, however, was superior to fear: he nobly exerted all his abilities in the cause of his country; and having raised an army in Wessex, took the field against the invader.

London had always continued faithful to the family of Edgar, and repelled every attempt that had been made against it. Canute well knew the importance of that city; he considered it as the principal support of Edmund, and that both must stand or fall together. He therefore attempted to invest the city in the absence of Edmund; but he saw no hopes of success, unless he was master of the river both above and below the bridge, in order to prevent provisions from being carried into the city by boats from the country. To effect this design, he dug a deep canal on the Surry side, through which he turned the current of the river, and, by that artifice, drew his ships above the bridge. He was now master of the stream, both above and below the city, which he surrounded with his works. But the Londoners defended the place with such obstinacy, and made so many successful sallies, that Canute was obliged to raise the siege, after losing a considerable part of his army.

Edmund was advancing to the relief of his capital, when Canute abandoned the undertaking. At last the two armies met at Penne, in Somersetshire, and a bloody battle ensued. The victory was long doubtful, but at last declared in favour of Edmund; and Canute was obliged to retire to Winchester, to recruit his army.

The two kings now seemed determined to put an end to the war by a decisive battle. They met at Secorstan, on the borders of Gloucestershire. The battle was fought with the utmost intrepidity by both armies; and night put an end to the contest, before any advantage had been gained on either side. As soon as the morning appeared, the battle was renewed with the same fury as before. Edmund flew from rank to rank, was present in every danger, and marked his tracks with slaughter. Victory hovered over his standard, and was on the point of declaring in his favour, when the traitor Edric, by a stratagem, changed the fortune of the day. He cut off the head of one Osmor, whose countenance greatly resembled that of Edmund, fixed it upon the point of a spear, and shewing it in triumph, called out to the English, "Behold the head of your king! Edmund is no more!" The forces of Edmund were seized with consternation; and he was obliged to raise his helmet, before he could convince them of their mistake; but he could not, by all his efforts, regain the advantage he had lost. The victory was again doubtful, when night put an end to the scene of slaughter.

Edmund waited impatiently for the morning, not doubting but he should soon obtain a complete victory over the Danish forces: but the first blushes of the dawn convinced him that no enemy was near. Canute, dreading the consequence of a third engagement, had taken the advantage of the night to retreat from the field of battle, and was then at too great a distance for Edmund to fall upon his rear.

The infamous Edric now returned to Edmund's camp, and, with all the marks of sincere contrition, implored his pardon for his former conduct. The soul of Edmund was too susceptible of compassion; he believed the traitor's repentance to be real, and again admitted him into his favour. Success, for some time, attended the standards of Edmund; several parties of the Danes were defeated, and Canute was determined to risk his fortune on one decisive action. Edmund attacked the enemy with an irresistible fury; and the Danish army must have been cut to pieces, had not the traitor Edric once more defeated the efforts of Edmund. Instead of charging the Danish army, he fled from the field of battle, at the head of the wing under his command. The flight of so large a part of the army struck the English with a panic; nor were all the attempts of Edmund sufficient to rally the broken squadrons, and lead them once more against the enemy. A dreadful slaughter ensued, and Canute triumphed over the standards of Edmund.

But the courage of that prince was not to be depressed by misfortunes. He applied himself, with the utmost alacrity, to recruit his forces, and soon found himself at the head of an army sufficient to dispute the palm of victory with the enemy. Canute was astonished to see Edmund again approaching with the utmost intrepidity, and was alarmed for the consequences. He had purchased the last victory with the blood of many of his best officers, and even owed his success to treachery. He, however, led his forces against the English; but both armies seemed unwilling to engage. The two princes acted, on this occasion, with the utmost caution; they stood opposite to each other, but neither gave the signal to engage. During this dreadful interval of inaction, a captain in the English army advanced, and, in a florid speech, displayed the distress which this fatal war had brought upon the innocent inhabitants, in the most pathetic manner; and observed, that as the two kings were equal with regard to personal courage, it would be an act of humanity, by preventing the total depopulation of the island; for the leaders to put a final period to their quarrel by single combat; adding, that the victor should be acknowledged sovereign by both armies. This proposal obtained an universal approbation. A general shout ensued; the two leaders submitted to the proposed decision; and retired, with a small number of their friends, into the isle of Alney, an island in the Severn; their troops lining the opposite banks of the stream, and waiting impatiently the event of a combat, which was to decide the fate of the kingdom. Canute perceiving that he was overpowered by the great strength and remarkable activity of Edmund, proposed to make a division of the kingdom, and terminate their quarrel by an act of mutual friendship. The generous Edmund listened to the proposal; he was more desirous of healing the wounds of his bleeding country, than of being placed in the seat of power. The fury of the passions immediately subsided, and malevolence gave place to kindness. The two princes threw away their swords, and flew into the embraces of each other. Both armies caught the generous flame of reconciliation, and gave a general shout of undissembled joy. The treaty was concluded in the presence of the nobles and principal men of both nations; by which it was stipulated, that Edmund should retain all the country to the south of the Thames, together with the city of London, Wesssex, East-Anglia, and Essex; and the rest of the kingdom to be ceded to Canute.

We have followed Hovenden, and Ethelred, abbot of Rieval, in relating the circumstances which attended the reconciliation of Edmund and Canute; but think it necessary to add, that several of our ancient historians mention not the combat between the two kings; though they all agree, that a peace was concluded without a battle.

The English now flattered themselves that a final period was put to their distress; that discord would be succeeded by harmony; and the noisy horrors of war give place to the calm pleasures of domestic peace. But the malignant breath of treachery blasted all their hopes: the lovely plant of British liberty was cut down by the hand of a traitor. Ever restless, and ever uneasy; terrified at the turpitude of his own crimes, and dreading the effects of Edmund's resentment, Edric determined to prevent the stroke of justice, by committing an act that shocks humanity. He bribed two ruffians, acquainted with every vice, to assassinate his sovereign. The attempt succeeded, and Edmund fell a victim to perfidy.

The reign of that prince was too short; and even that small interval so crowded with events; that his virtues could not be sufficiently displayed to form an adequate idea of his character. It may, however, be said with justice, that his courage was invincible; his activity amazing; his generosity unbounded. He was intrepid in danger; patient in adversity; modest in success. He was a friend to the brave, a friend to the virtuous; a friend to his country. But as virtues become vices when carried to excess, so the magnanimous generosity of Edmund degenerated into weakness. By pardoning Edric, who had so often betrayed the interest of his country, he lost at once his kingdom and his life.

C A N U T E THE GREAT.

A. D. 1017. EDMUND left two sons, but they succeeded not to the throne of their father. Canute seized the sceptre of Edmund, but endeavoured to conceal his usurpation under the appearance of justice. He summoned a general assembly of the nobility and clergy, and produced witnesses, suborned for that purpose, to declare, that in the treaty between the two kings, it was stipulated, that in case of the death of either of the contractors, the other should succeed to his dominions, preferably to his own sons. The members were astonished at this new claim; but the dread of Canute's resentment stifled all opposition. The voice of truth was silenced by the frowns of power. The assembly swore allegiance to Canute, and he was crowned king of England.

But, though he had succeeded in his attempt upon the government, he was persuaded that the English would embrace the first favourable opportunity of placing one of the descendants of Edmund on the throne of his ancestors. He, therefore, sent the young princes to the court of Sweden, requesting that they might be assassinated. Shocked at the thought of committing so horrid a crime, and afraid of the resentment of Canute, the Swedish monarch sent the young princes secretly to Solomon, king of Hungary, who received them with the utmost kindness, and gave them an education suitable to their birth. Edmund, the eldest, died soon after; but his brother, Edward, married Agatha, daughter to the emperor Henry II.

The sons of Edmund were not the only persons whom Canute thought proper to remove for his own security. Several of the principal nobility, who were still attached to the race of their ancient kings, fell victims to his safety. The traitor Edric suffered the punishment due to his crimes. He had the assurance to reproach Canute with ingratitude; and complained, that the rewards he had received were inadequate to his services. Provoked at his insolence, and detesting his character, Canute immediately ordered him to be beheaded, and his body to be flung into the Thames. Thus perished Edric, whose crimes were a blemish to human nature, and have branded his memory with eternal infamy.

One obstacle still remained, and which required policy, rather than force, to remove it. Richard, duke of Normandy, who had given protection to Alfred and Edward, the two sons of Ethelred, was disposed to support the claim of his nephews. He demanded the crown of their brother Edmund. Canute was alarmed at the message of Richard. He well knew the English were strongly attached to their ancient race of kings, and that Richard was able to give them the most powerful assistance. Edmund, unsupported by any foreign power, had wrested the sceptre from his hands, had he not been betrayed by an infamous traitor. Richard was a warlike prince, beloved by his subjects; and favoured by the Danes in general. Canute saw the danger, and determined to prevent it. He sent a splendid embassy to Richard, demanding his sister Emma in marriage, and offering his own sister, Hestrietha, to the Norman prince. The proposals were accepted, the nuptials were celebrated, and the double marriage cemented their friendship.

A. D. 1018. The wars of Canute had exhausted his treasury, and his officers and partisans were still unrewarded. He, therefore, loaded the English, particularly the citizens of London, with imposts. Necessity, rather than tyranny, induced him to exercise a severity not agreeable to his disposition. The wisdom of his administration soon after obliterated the impressions of this rigorous treatment. He made no distinction between the English and the Danes. He confirmed the Saxon laws and institutions. He distributed justice impartially: no respect of persons, no favour was obtained by either party. Innocence was sure of protection; the guilty of punishment. Such measures soon conciliated the affections of the English. Canute was no longer considered as an usurper. The two nations became one people; and happiness and tranquillity succeeded a long series of troubles and distress.

A. D. 1019. A war having broke out between the Danes and Vandals, Canute found it necessary to visit his hereditary dominions, which were threatened with destruction. The Vandals had defeated the Danish army, and carried fire and sword into the heart of their country. The utmost expedition therefore was used by Canute in fitting out a fleet, and embarking a number of forces sufficient to stop the ravages of the enemy. A body of English troops, under the command of earl Godwin, one of the most powerful noblemen, was shipped for this expedition. The Vandals, not expecting Canute was landed in his dominions, took no care to guard the avenues to their camp, so that the Danish monarch marched unmolested to attack them; but before he could reach the enemy, night overtook him, and he was obliged to encamp. During the night earl Godwin, without communicating his design, threw himself, at the head of the English, upon the camp of the enemy, and obtained a complete victory. Charmed at this unexpected success, Canute loaded the English with favours, and gave earl Godwin his sister in marriage.

A. D. 1020. Canute on his return to England, removed every officer that had been guilty of oppression in his absence. Even Eric, duke of Northumberland, formerly one of the principal officers in the army, was banished the kingdom. But what still endeared him to the people was the sorrow he expressed for the multitudes that had fell victims to his ambition. He built a church at Ashdown, on the spot where he fought a bloody battle with Edmund; and founded chauntries in those places where any slaughter had been made of the English. Every act of supererogation was sure to gain the affections of the people. Canute was now esteemed for his piety and virtue.

A. D. 1028. Olave, king of Norway, had for some years laboured to restrain the ferocity of his subjects, and render their lives conformable to the precepts of religion. He would not suffer them to pursue their favourite profession of piracy and plunder. These restraints were odious to the Norwegians, and they determined to dethrone him. Canute took advantage of these divisions, landed in Norway at the head of a powerful army, and drove Olave from the throne. And Canute, by being master of three great kingdoms, became the most powerful sovereign in Europe. His ambition was now satisfied; but his own reflections on the fleeting nature of sublunary objects, soon convinced him of the vanity of human greatness. History has preserved a very remarkable instance of his reverence for the power of the supreme Being, and the limited authority of earthly monarchs. One day when his courtiers were carrying their flatteries to an unbounded height, Canute, who then kept his court at Southampton, led them to the sea side, and ordering a chair to be placed on the beach, near the surface of the tide, which was then flowing apace, seated himself, and with a majestic tone of voice thus addressed himself to the water: "Thou, O sea, art a part of my dominions, and the land whereon I sit is mine: my orders were never broke with impunity. I therefore charge thee not to encroach any farther on my land, nor presume to wet the feet of thy sovereign." But deaf to his voice and fearless of his power, the sea continued its usual course, and washed him with its billows. On which he rose from his seat, and turning to his courtiers, "Behold," said he, "the narrow limits of mortal power! the sceptred hand of human greatness exerts its force in vain. The sea rolls on in contempt of its authority: the storms of heaven make no distinction between the monarch and the slave. Learn then from this example to set a proper boundary to odious flattery: and remember that he only deserves unlimited praises, who holds in his hands the powers of nature, and whose voice both the winds and the sea obey." It is added, that Canute would never after wear his crown; but ordered it to be placed on the head of the crucifix in the cathedral of Winchester.

Canute now devoted his whole time to what was then considered as the noblest and most acceptable acts of piety; the founding churches and monasteries. He granted a charter to the celebrated monastery of St. Edmondsbury, by which all its lands and privileges were confirmed. He gave the profits of the port of Sandwich to Christ-church in Canterbury, and founded a monastery of Benedictine monks in Norfolk. But in order to establish his character for piety beyond even the whispers of suspicion, he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, and engaged all the princes through whose dominions he passed, to exempt the English pilgrims and merchants from all tolls and duties, which had before been exacted from them. He visited every shrine, and paid his devotions before every relic; but what rendered him a more welcome guest at the court of Rome; were the prodigious sums he lavished in that city: riches were more welcome to the pope than devotions.

Canute on his return was received by his subjects with the utmost demonstrations of joy. All the laws passed by the former kings of England, particularly those of Ethelred, were enforced; several new ones, adapted to the times, were added; and the most proper methods taken to render the people happy.

But while he was employed in cultivating the arts of peace, and endeavouring to disseminate the seeds of virtue in every part of his kingdom, his attention was diverted from these offices of humanity, to support the dignity of his crown. Duncan, grandson to Malcolm II. king of Scotland, being in possession of Cumberland, refused to do homage to Canute for that fief, pretending it was due only to such kings as were natives of England. Provoked at this insolent allegation of the Scottish prince, Canute marched at the head of a powerful army: but by the interposition of the prelates and nobility of both kingdoms a peace was concluded without a battle; Duncan agreeing to pay homage for that fief, to the kings of England.

A. D. 1035. This was the last military action of Canute; he spent the remainder of his life in acts of piety and devotion. Tranquillity was established in every part of his dominions, and he paid the debt of nature in the arms of peace.

Contradiction seems to have been a principal feature in the character of Canute. His youth was marked with blood and cruelty: his age with piety and devotion. He sacrificed every thing in the morning of his reign to ambition; in the evening to piety. The sceptre was at first the rod of tyranny; at last the index of mercy. No monarch ever raised popular odium so high, or allayed it so effectually. He was a great general, a consummate statesman, a wise legislator. He was perfectly acquainted with the temper of the human heart, and took care to turn the various dispositions of his subjects to his own advantage. When age had softened the passions of youth, and the precepts of religion had erased the impressions of a ferocious education, Canute became a most excellent prince; and the virtues he practised during the peaceable interval of his administration, gave him a much better claim to the title of Great, than all his victories. His laws are founded on the basis of justice and humanity; they leave hardly any grievance without redress. Though surrounded with flatterers, he was impregnable to all their attacks; in the midst of his victories he possessed humility.

The

The virtues he practised at the close of his reign, totally obliterated his vices at the beginning. He lived beloved, and died lamented.

Canute left two sons by his first wife, Alfwin, daughter of Elfhelm, earl of Northampton, named Sweyn and Harold: and by Emma, who survived him, a son, named Hardicanute; and a daughter, named Gunhilda. Sweyn was placed upon the throne of Norway before the death of his father; and Gunhilda was married to the emperor Henry III. That princess, some time after her marriage, was accused of adultery; and the only means of vindicating her conduct, was by single combat. The accuser was a person of gigantic size, and famous both for his strength and valour. For some time, no person could be found to undertake the vindication of Gunhilda's innocence. At length her page, who was a mere stripling when compared to his antagonist, entered the lists. The power of the champions was, indeed, unequal; but the youth having the good fortune to cut the sinews of one of the legs of his antagonist, he fell to the ground; and the page pursuing his advantage, cut off his head, and laid it at Gunhilda's feet. Her innocence being thus vindicated, the princess renounced the emperor's bed, notwithstanding his earnest entreaties of forgiveness; and became a nun in a monastery at Bruges, where she died.

H A R O L D I. surnamed H A R E F O O T.

A.D. 1036. ACCORDING to the treaty made by Canute with Richard, duke of Normandy, Hardicanute, Emma's son, should have enjoyed the English crown on the death of his father. But Canute thought proper to place Hardicanute on the throne of Denmark, and left the crown of England to Harold. This occasioned a great dissension in England; the people were divided into parties. The English declared for Hardicanute; the Danes for Harold. A civil war was thought inevitable; till the two brothers, in order to prevent the depopulation of the island, agreed to make a division of the kingdom. Accordingly, all the country on the north side of the Thames was allotted to Harold, and the rest of the kingdom to Hardicanute. But, as the latter was in Denmark, it was stipulated, that Emma, assisted by earl Godwin, should govern his part of the kingdom during his absence.

The ambition of Harold was, however, far from being satisfied with part of the kingdom; he aspired to the whole. Godwin was the only person capable of preventing his designs, and Harold took an effectual method to gain him over to his interest. Avarice was the ruling passion of that powerful nobleman, and Harold determined to gratify it. He, therefore, seized the treasures of his father Canute, deposited at Winchester, though they were the real property of Emma. Godwin could not withstand the offer of Harold; he abandoned the interest of Hardicanute, and embraced that of his rival. Harold was declared king of England, and Emma devoted her time to works of piety and devotion.

The great talents of that princess were well known to Godwin, who dreaded the consequences of a revolution. He insinuated to Harold, that his throne could not be established while the children of Emma survived, and were assisted by the interest and counsels of their mother. Harold saw the propriety of this remark, and formed a design for getting the two sons of Ethelred, Alfred and Edward, into his power. A letter was accordingly forged, in the name of Emma, inviting them into England. The princes complied with what they thought the request of their mother; and Godwin seized Alfred, after killing about six hundred of his attendants, and carried him to London. Harold, who possessed all the cruelties of the Danes, sent Alfred to the monastery of Ely, where his eyes were put out, and he soon after expired under the most excruciating tortures. A timely retreat secured the safety of Edward. Emma was ordered to depart the kingdom; and she accordingly retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, where she met with a kind reception, and Bruges was assigned for her residence.

A.D. 1038. Harold had now no competitor in the island for the crown of England; and, to prevent his brother, Hardicanute, from attempting any thing to his prejudice, he fitted out a powerful fleet to guard the coasts from every insult. The tax laid on the people, to support this naval armament, occasioned great uneasiness: the Welsh broke out into open rebellion, and laid a considerable part of the country waste. An English army, however, soon reduced the insurgents; and Harold, to prevent any future disturbances in those parts, passed a law, by which every Welshman who crossed Offa's dykes without permission, was condemned to lose his right hand.

A.D. 1040. The violence and cruelties of Harold had now procured him the hatred of his subjects; and would, probably, soon have deprived him of his crown. Hardicanute, his brother, was at Bruges with a powerful squadron, under pretence of paying a visit to his mother; but it was strongly suspected that he had other views. The loss of his English dominions had always sat heavy on his mind. But whatever was his real intention, an event happened which banished all the ideas of hostility. Harold paid the debt of nature on the eighteenth of May, and left the throne vacant for his brother, without a battle.

Harold had not the least pretensions to any of the good qualities of his father. He was headstrong, obstinate, brutal, and cruel. He was free from the superstition which prevailed in his time; he revered not the principles of piety. His vices have been handed down to us in odious colours; his virtues, if he possessed any, are buried in oblivion.

HARDICANUTE, or CANUTE II.

A.D. 1040. THE English had so severely felt the miseries of a civil war, that they made no opposition to Hardicanute's ascending the throne. But he soon gave so odious an instance of his violence and inhumanity, that he lost the affections of his subjects. He ordered the body of his brother Harold to be dug up, and thrown into the Thames. The body was found by some fishermen, and decently interred. Hardicanute was offended at this office of humanity, and again exercised against it the same indecent revenge.

This brutal and disgusting conduct excited the indignation of the people. The exaction of heavy imposts augmented the discontent. Powerful fleets were fitted out when no danger threatened the island: the neighbouring nations were all at peace with England. What increased the distress of the people, was a scarcity of corn. The season had been unfavourable to the fruits of the earth, and the nation was threatened with the dreadful consequences of a famine.

A.D. 1041. Alarmed at these apprehensions, and exasperated at the cruel perseverance of the sovereign, the inhabitants of Worcester flew to arms, and put two of the king's collectors to death. The enraged monarch, who never felt for the miseries of others, sent a body of troops to revenge the insult. His orders were obeyed with the brutality so conspicuous in the character of their master; the city was pillaged, and laid in ashes. The insurgents were too well acquainted with the cruel disposition of Hardicanute, to wait the approach of his messengers of destruction; they retired into an island in the Severn, and took proper precautions for their defence. The troops, after destroying the city, advanced to attack this resolute handful of men, who were determined to sell their lives as dear as possible. The assault was begun with great fury, but without success: it was often repeated, but always rendered abortive. Perceiving all their efforts were in vain, the troops abandoned the enterprize, and left them at liberty to return to their desolated city.

Fortunately for England, Hardicanute did not long wield the sceptre. His reign of cruelty was soon terminated. Two years put a period to his power. He died suddenly at Lambeth, while he was celebrating the nuptials of a Danish nobleman.

The principal features in the portrait of Hardicanute were indolence, gluttony, cruelty, and excess. His courage was problematical; and the grievous burdens he laid upon his subjects, sufficiently prove, that he acted rather as an enemy than a king. He had no claim to the glorious title of being the father of his country. His palace was one continued scene of gluttony and drunkenness; and it is strongly suspected, that he put a period to his life by eating immoderately. He always shewed the utmost filial duty to his mother, and fraternal affection to his brother Edward. These were his only virtues; his vices were innumerable.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.

A.D. 1042. THE Danish yoke had long been heavily felt by the English, and an opportunity now offered of shaking it off for ever. Sweyn, the only surviving son of Canute the Great, was in Norway, and in no condition of making a descent on England with any hopes of success. Edward, the son of Ethelred, was the only remaining branch of the Saxon kings, except the sons of Edmund, who were then at the court of Hungary, and almost forgotten by their countrymen. Godwin was alone capable of opposing with any chance of success, the elevation of Edward. The friendship of that powerful nobleman was, therefore, thought necessary, but it was feared it could not be easily obtained. He was universally considered as the murderer of young Alfred, and the principal cause of all the misfortunes that had attended Emma. It was, therefore, natural for him to imagine, that Edward would take the first opportunity of revenging all the miseries he had inflicted on the family of Ethelred. The advantages which it was hoped the nation would reap from the accession of Edward, however, stifled all private animosity. Godwin undertook to support the interest of that prince, who engaged to marry his daughter, and continue the earl and his sons in the posts they had, for some time, enjoyed.

The election of a king came on in an assembly of the nobles summoned for that purpose at Gillingham; where Godwin, in a long and eloquent speech, displayed the advantages of placing Edward on the throne of his ancestors, and the miseries that would, probably, overwhelm their country, if Sweyn were permitted to seize the sceptre of power. At the conclusion of his speech, he raised Edward in the midst of the assembly, and cried out, "Behold your king." No opposition was made to the attempt of Godwin; Edward was elected by the unanimous voice of the whole assembly.

A.D. 1043. The great scarcity that prevailed in England, rendered it prudent to defer the coronation of Edward; but as soon as that calamity was removed, he received the crown of his ancestors, with great solemnity, at Winchester. This ceremony was attended with some insult and virulence against the Danes; but the moderation with which Edward held the reins of government, reconciled them to his administration: they soon became blended with the English, and formed one people. No farther mention is made of any difference between them.

Edward began his reign with an act very incompatible with his character as a saint. He stripped his mother Emma of all the treasures she had amassed, and shut her up in a monastery. It is also said, that he accused her of a criminal intercourse with Alwin, bishop of Worcester, and other notorious crimes. No other method remained for Emma to vindicate her innocence, than by undergoing the fiery ordeal. She submitted to the decision, which was then considered as an infallible test of innocence, and was acquitted: she walked over nine red-hot ploughshares, unhurt. This story is, by many of our English historians, considered as a monkish fable, and, as such, exploded. It must, indeed, be granted, that neither the Saxon annals, Cadmer, nor William of Malmesbury, have mentioned this circumstance; which which seems too remarkable to have been omitted, had it really happened. But however that be, the disgrace of the queen-mother was not attended with any dangerous consequences.

A.D. 1045. The great power of the Godwin family now filled the nation with apprehensions. Sweyn, one of his sons, whose passions hurried him to the commission of many crimes, attempted the chastity of an abbess, and was banished the kingdom. But he was not idle in his retreat; he fitted out a fleet of ships, and committed several outrages on the English coasts. He afterwards murdered earl Bearn, who had kindly undertaken to procure his pardon from Edward. These enormous crimes seemed to render him an object of detestation, rather than of mercy; but the great power of his father, joined with the interest of several of the prelates and principal nobility, procured his pardon, and he returned again to England.

Edward's behaviour, on this occasion, gained him the applause of the whole kingdom; but he soon forfeited the esteem of his subjects by the attention he paid to foreigners. His education at the court of Normandy had formed strong attachments to the manners, customs, and inhabitants of that province. His court was filled with Normans, and the principal dignities of the church were conferred on these strangers. Their language, their customs, and their laws, became fashionable in England. Their interest was soon so great, that no favour was to be obtained from Edward, but by their intercession. Godwin perceived their influence, and was alarmed. He made loud remonstrances to the king, but in vain; Edward continued firm to his attachments. Finding no redress from the throne, he complained to the people, and declared openly, that the good of the nation was in danger of being sacrificed to some foreign interest. The people caught the infection; and Godwin perceiving he should be supported by his countrymen, determined to take the first favourable opportunity of making these foreign favourites feel the effects of his resentment.

A.D. 1048. He did not wait long; an event soon offered, which inflamed the minds of the English, and seemed to threaten the nation with the horrors of a civil war. Eustace, count of Boulogne, having paid a visit to the king, set out for Dover on his return to his own dominions. One of his servants, who was sent before his master, to provide lodgings in the town, behaving in a very insolent manner, a fray ensued, in which the Frenchman lost his life. Exasperated at the fate of his servant, Eustace and his attendants fell upon the inhabitants, and several of them were slain in the conflict: the house, where the quarrel happened, was broke open, and the master fell a sacrifice to the fury of Eustace. The town was now alarmed; a general tumult ensued, in which twenty of the inhabitants were killed, and nineteen of the Count's servants. Eustace himself found it difficult to make his retreat. He returned to Edward, attended by his followers who had escaped the fury of the townsmen, and made the most grievous complaints; but represented the circumstances in the most partial manner. Candour was sacrificed to passion, and truth to revenge. Edward, without examining carefully into the real causes of this insurrection, ordered Godwin to march immediately into the place, at the head of a body of troops, and lay the town under military execution.

Surprised at the peremptory orders of the king, and determined to support the liberties of his country, Godwin remonstrated with his Majesty: he justly observed, that by proceeding in so precipitate a manner, the consequences would be highly injurious to his character, and destroy at once the claim and liberty of the subject: that the meanest person in his dominions had a right to be heard in his own defence; and that to inflict punishment before the party is convicted, would be an infringement of every law, either human or divine.

Edward had been so long used to the language of flattery, that he was astonished at the boldness of Godwin. The free manner in which he delivered his remonstrances provoked Edward; he considered it as an insult on majesty. But Godwin was not to be intimidated by the frowns of power; he refused to obey the orders of his majesty; he chose rather to suffer the consequences of disobedience, than inflict punishment on the innocent, or sacrifice the liberties of his country at the shrine of foreign insolence.

Edward, either convinced of the injustice of his orders, or fearful of the resentment of his subjects, did not insist any farther on being obeyed; but determined to punish Godwin for his behaviour. An opportunity soon offered. The Welsh had taken advantage of the late disturbances, and made inroads into the English territories, of which Sweyn was governor. Edward summoned a meeting of the nobility at Gloucester, to enquire into the cause of these disorders. The Welsh appeared before Godwin and his son reached the assembly, and accused them as the aggressors. The first impressions determined Edward; he did not give himself the trouble of hearing both parties; his measures were determined by the representations of the first complaint. Nothing less than the destruction of Godwin and his whole family could satisfy the vengeance of Edward: they were accordingly cited before the council; and, on refusing to obey the summons, were banished the kingdom. Godwin himself retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders; and Harold to Ireland, where they found shelter from the frowns of incensed majesty. Edward was a stranger to the tender feelings of humanity: he was not satisfied with the banishment of Godwin and his sons; his amiable consort, the accomplished Edgitha, also felt the weight of his resentment. He stripped her of every thing valuable, and confined her in the monastery of Werewell; determined (says Malmesbury) that she alone should not enjoy peace and plenty, while her husband, and the rest of her family, were plunged into difficulties, and abandoned to distress.

A.D. 1050. The tax, known by the name of Danegeld, had long been odious to the English. The reasons which originally rendered it necessary had long since ceased, but the impost was still continued; the danger was over, but the people were still oppressed with the burden. Edward, persuaded he could not perform an action more acceptable to the English, abolished it. He went farther; he distributed all the surplus remaining in his treasury among the original owners. This act of kindness endeared him to his subjects; they became more strongly attached to his person.

About this time, William, duke of Normandy, paid a visit to Edward, and was received with the warmest marks of gratitude. He had protected and supported Edward in his exile, and merited a suitable return. The duke was highly satisfied with his reception, and returned to Normandy loaded with presents. This visit, though it then gave no alarm to the people, proved fatal, in its consequences, to the liberties of England. William pretended, that during his stay, Edward had constituted him heir to his dominions; and on this weak pretence, though wholly destitute of truth, he founded a claim that overthrew the constitution of this country.

A.D. 1052. Soon after the departure of William duke of Normandy, Emma paid the debt of nature; the cruel behaviour of a son put an end to a life which gave him being. Filial duty was not one of the virtues of Edward. The character of that prince has been treated with great rigour by most of our English historians, but without producing a single fact to prove she deserved it. The monks, indeed, who will not admit the character of Edward to be stained with a single vice, were under a necessity of blackening the memory of Emma; because, if she was innocent, Edward must have been guilty of the flagitious crime of ingratitude to a parent, and of bringing bringing down the grey hairs of his mother with sorrow to the grave. But surely there is no reason for historians of these times to follow their example; they have no cause to support; at the expence of truth. Justice should be impartially administered, and every real blemish impartially displayed, even though it should be found on the robe of a canonized monarch.

Godwin had now raised a powerful squadron; and being joined by his son Harold, with another fleet from Ireland, insulted the coasts of England, and entered the mouth of the Thames. Edward was greatly alarmed; the city of London was thrown into the utmost confusion; and the king marched, at the head of an army, to oppose the landing of the insurgents. Godwin saw the danger that might attend a battle, and was willing to avoid it. He sent a very submissive message to Edward, protesting, in the strongest manner, that he had no other intention than that of submitting his actions to a fair trial; nor wished any thing more than that of being restored to his honours and estates. The principal nobility, who had imputed the sole cause of these disorders to the king's predilection for foreigners, interceded with the king in favour of Godwin and his family. Convinced that it would be at once imprudent and ineffectual to oppose their powerful intercession, Edward agreed to pardon Godwin, and a convention was concluded, which proved fatal to the royal authority. All the foreigners, who had so long basked in the favour of royalty, were banished from the kingdom; and Edward finding his power insufficient to secure the hostages given by Godwin for his good behaviour, sent them to the court of Normandy.

A.D. 1053. Peace was now restored; domestic discord ceased; and the English, freed from the insolence of foreign favourites, enjoyed all the advantages resulting from tranquillity. But a cloud, that threatened to involve this scene of happiness, soon appeared. Godwin was struck with an apoplexy while he was sitting at the king's table, and died three days after. Thus fell the most powerful subject hitherto known in England. The monkish writers have attributed his death to a stroke of the divine vengeance, for the murder of Alfred; but the account they have given us is evidently calculated to render the memory of Godwin infamous. His behaviour to the Norman favourites filled them with implacable malevolence. But, as the more ancient writers mention nothing remarkable with regard to his death, it is sufficiently evident that the whole is founded on calumny, and dictated by malice. Stowe, from an ancient manuscript, says, that the death of Godwin occasioned a general mourning; the people bewailed him as a father and a support.

Fortunately for his country, his power did not terminate with his death. His eldest son, Harold, who far surpassed him in abilities, succeeded to all his authority, and proved an equal support to the English against the Norman interest. Harold, by his great affability and address, gained the friendship of Edward. The art of Godwin's successor was equal to his power; both the nobles and people were firmly attached to his interest.

A.D. 1054. Scotland had, for some time, been less fortunate than England: the torch of civil discord had been lighted by the hand of ambition, and the whole kingdom was involved in horror and confusion. Macbeth, the celebrated usurper, had driven Malcolm from his dominions, and the unfortunate prince applied to Edward for support against the tyrant of his country. The English monarch considered it as a duty incumbent on kings to assist royalty in distress. Ten thousand men, under the command of Siward, earl of Northumberland, were sent to support the Scottish monarch, and drive the usurper from the throne. Siward, one of the most celebrated generals and intrepid soldiers of the age, immediately joined his forces with those under the command of Macduff, the Scottish commander, and marched against the rebels. A desperate engagement ensued, wherein Macbeth was totally defeated, obliged to fly to the mountains for shelter, and Malcolm placed on the throne of his ancestors. Siward, soon after, paid the debt of nature; and Tofti, one of Harold's brothers, succeeded him in the government of the northern provinces. Tofti inherited all the boisterous intrepidity of his father: he was at once bold and resolute, afraid of no danger, awed by no character: nothing stopped his course when impelled by ambition; and his zeal for the interest of his friends carried him far beyond the bounds of discretion.

A.D. 1056. The Welsh had made frequent incursions into the English territories, and committed many excesses. Alfgar, governor of East-Anglia, held a treasonable correspondence with these insurgents; and being found guilty of the crime, was declared an out-law, and banished the kingdom. He retired immediately to Ireland, where he raised a body of forces, joined a fleet of pirates, and landed in Wales. He was assisted by Griffith, prince of North-Wales, and soon after defeated a body of Edward's forces. The victors now committed very dreadful ravages in Herefordshire: they entered the capital of that county, massacred the inhabitants, killed seven canons who guarded the door of the cathedral, burnt the monastery of St. Ethelbert, and laid the city in ashes.

Exasperated at these inhuman proceedings, Edward sent Harold, at the head of a body of forces, to chastise the insurgents. The abilities of the English general struck the invaders with terror; they fled into South-Wales, and applied, in the most submissive manner, to Edward, for peace. Their request was granted; the tranquillity of the country was restored, and Alfgar was restored to his estate and government.

Edward having no children of his own, because he had refused all commerce with his wife, either on account of his natural inability, or pretended vow of chastity, was desirous of settling the succession to the crown, in order, if possible, to prevent the horrors of a civil war. He had recalled his nephew, the son of Edmund Ironside, from the court of Hungary, but he died soon after his arrival; and Edgar Atheling, the son of that prince, was too young to hold the reins of government. Disappointed in his design of placing a descendant from the ancient race of kings on the English throne, Edward turned his eyes towards his kinsman, William duke of Normandy, who had already sufficiently established his reputation for prudence and intrepidity. Secrecy was absolutely necessary to procure success, and it was accordingly observed with the greatest caution. William received the intelligence with pleasure, and eagerly embraced the flattering hopes of adorning his brow with the English diadem.

A.D. 1058. It has been already mentioned, that Edward had sent the hostages delivered by Godwin to the court of Normandy. Among these hostages were Ulnoth, the brother, and Hacane, the nephew of Harold. They still continued in confinement, though the death of Godwin had, long since, released them from their obligations. Harold, commiserating the condition of these exiles, obtained an order for their being released, and embarked for Normandy; but a violent storm overtook him in his passage, and drove him on the French coast, in the government of the count of Ponthieu, who detained him prisoner at his court, and demanded a very exorbitant sum for his ransom. Harold, who beheld with contempt the ungenerous action of this petty prince, applied to duke William, who immediately ordered the count to set the English nobleman at liberty. Harold repaired directly to William's court; and, by his great affability and polite address, soon insinuated himself into the friendship of the Norman. William was no stranger to the great power of Harold,

Harold, and considered the acquisition of his interest as a step of the greatest importance in his design upon the crown of England. He accordingly disclosed the secret correspondence of Edward; and to attach him more firmly to his interest offered him his daughter in marriage. Harold, though astonished at the discovery, and exasperated at the behaviour of the English monarch, prudently concealed his resentment. He knew he was now in the duke's power, and determined to temporise. He accordingly promised William all the assistance in his power. Pleased with the acquisition of so great an ally, William loaded him with favours; but in order to render his engagements more solemn, he exacted from him an oath to observe the conditions of the agreement: and desirous of rendering the oath still more sacred, William, in conformity to the idle superstition of the times, had concealed under the altar several relics; these, after the ceremony, he shewed to the English nobleman, imagining that by this artifice the oath was become inviolable.

But the ambition of Harold was much greater than his superstition. He looked with contempt on the stratagem of William, and laughed at the obligation of an oath extorted from him. He returned to England with the hostages, and determined to oppose the duke with all his power.

A. D. 1063. The Welsh, though they had been so often chastised by the English, and so often obliged to sue for peace, continued their destructive inroads; Griffith was still at the head of a band of plunderers, and still carried fire and sword into the English territories. Exasperated at this perfidious conduct, Edward sent Harold, at the head of a body of horse, to surprize the invader; but Griffith made his escape. He was obliged, however, to leave most of his ships behind him, which Harold immediately destroyed, and returned to England. Some time after the Welsh, exasperated at the conduct of Griffith, put him to death, and sent his head, and the stern of his ship, to Harold, who transmitted them to the king.

Tofti had assisted his brother in reducing the Welsh to obedience, and always behaved with the greatest intrepidity; he was a stranger to fear. But his behaviour as a governor, was one continued series of oppression. He loaded the people with excessive taxes, and put every person to death that dared to oppose him. Unable to support themselves under such complicated distress, the people flew to arms, drove Tofti from his capital, and elected Morcar, the son of their late governor, to fill the seat of Tofti. Alarmed at these insurrections, Edward dispatched Harold at the head of an army to enquire into the cause of this revolt, and, if necessary, to reduce the insurgents to reason. Harold met the Northumbrians, who were now greatly reinforced, at Northampton, and endeavoured to procure a reconciliation between them and his brother; but this the insurgents absolutely refused. They told Harold that they were a free people, and would not be enslaved; that they were willing to pay obedience to a just and humane ruler, but would defend their liberties against every species of tyranny, or perish in the noble attempt. Harold, who admired their resolution, examined into the cause of their complaints against Tofti; and finding they were well grounded, gave a signal proof his love of justice; he no longer supported the interest of his brother, but procured a confirmation of their election of Morcar. Tofti, finding himself abandoned by Harold, who alone had power to support him, left the kingdom, and retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders. This noble example of equity, greatly increased the popularity of Harold, who soon after married Alghitha, sister to Alfgar, cementing by that act of prudence, the friendship that had for some time subsisted between him and that nobleman.

A. D. 1065. Edward now stooped under the weight of age and infirmities. He had many years since vowed to undertake a pilgrimage to Rome; but finding it impossible to perform it, obtained the pope's dispensation, on condition of rebuilding the abbey of Westminster, which the Danes had laid in ruins. This work engaged his whole attention, and on its being finished, summoned a general council of the nation to confirm the charter he had granted to that edifice. He exempted it from all episcopal jurisdiction, settled large revenues on it, and granted it the privileges of a sanctuary. He attended with great devotion the dedication of that religious structure, and seemed to be re-animated on that solemn occasion. But this was the last action of Edward's reign. He was seized with a violent fever, which put an end to his life on the fifth of January, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign; and his body, pursuant to his own request, was buried in the abbey he had just consecrated. He died without naming his successor.

The monks, who tasted sufficiently the bounties of Edward, extolled his virtues to the skies; they have even exalted his faults into acts of piety. His continence, from whatever cause it proceeded, occasioned his being ranked among the saints: an action by which he forged new chains for his country, and drenched the ground with the blood of his subjects, was considered as the most exalted act of piety. A very superficial attention to the actions of his reign will, however, be sufficient to convince every unprejudiced person that he was far from deserving the character given him by the monks. And that he was unprofitable and cruel; faithless as a friend, and inexorable as an enemy. The most commendable circumstance in his government was his attention to the administration of justice. As a legislator, he deserves the highest applause. His laws were long the objects of the people's affection. They were dictated by mercy, and written with the pen of equity. Had his conduct in general been equal to his dispensation of justice, his memory would have been handed down with applause to the latest posterity.

H A R O L D II.

A. D. 1066. HAROLD had so effectually gained the affections of the English, that he was immediately declared the successor of Edward; he stepped into the vacant throne without opposition. Edgar Atheling, the undoubted heir to the crown was forgotten; and the claim of the duke of Normandy, who had indeed no better title than the intentions of Edward in his favour, was not even mentioned. But though he had no competitor to fear at home, he well knew that William the Norman would exert all his power to wrest the sceptre from his hand, and that several of the European powers would lend him assistance. Nor was William the only enemy Harold had to fear; his brother Tofti vowed revenge for the assistance he had given the Northumbrians. He applied to Baldwin, earl of Flanders, and William, duke of Normandy for assistance. They both promised to assist him; and Baldwin immediately fitted out a strong squadron, which enabled Tofti to commence hostilities against his brother, by insulting the coasts of England. But he was, soon after, defeated, and obliged to fly to Scotland, with the scattered remains of his fleet, for protection.

This attempt of Tofti did not prevent Harold from pursuing every prudent measure for procuring the affections of his people. He eased them of several taxes; he listened to their complaints, and dispensed justice with an impartial hand: he became the patron of the clergy, and a liberal friend to churches and monasteries. He knew that Edgar Atheling was beloved by the people, as the only remaining heir of their ancient kings: he, therefore, took that prince under his protection, gave him a liberal education, loaded him with favours, and favoured all those who were more immediately attached to his person and fortune. By these prudent measures he conciliated the affections of the English; the people considered him as their father, and the voice of faction and discontent was no longer heard.

While Harold was thus nobly employed in settling the domestic tranquillity, William the Norman exerted all his power in collecting an army, and fitting out a fleet to seize the crown, which the people had unanimously placed on the head of Harold. He could plead neither the right of election, nor that of inheritance; not even a party in England was formed in his favour. But impelled at once by ambition and revenge, he determined to pursue the measures he had formed, and place on conquest the right he could not support by any legal pretension. He sent ambassadors to Harold, upbraiding him with his breach of faith, and summoning him to resign the possession of the crown. Harold was not to be intimidated by threats; he was a stranger to fear. He returned a very spirited answer, and William was convinced that he had nothing to expect from negotiation. An invasion of England was, therefore, resolved on: nothing less than the conquest of the whole kingdom was to be effected. Many circumstances concurred to favour an enterprise, which, otherwise, must have appeared chimerical. William was celebrated for his valour; he had triumphed over the joint efforts of France, and all its vassals. The Normans themselves were a brave and warlike people: all the warriors of Europe were desirous of serving under his standards, and of sharing in the spoil of a rich and flourishing people. War was the sole employment of every chieftain, then almost independent of the power of his sovereign. The fame of his intended expedition was soon spread over Europe, and multitudes flocked to his standards. The emperor declared loudly in his favour: the imperial council issued a proclamation, permitting all the vassals of the empire to enter into his service. The count of Anjou sent him a considerable body of forces: the count of Ponthau followed his example. Eustace, count of Boulogne, and the viscount of Thouars, in Poitou, joined him in person, at the head of their vassals. The count of Bretagne sent him a body of five thousand men, under the command of his eldest son. But what tended still more to render the duke's expedition successful, was the pope's declaration in his favour. He sent him a consecrated banner; and published a bull, declaring the justice of William's cause, and animating all the Christian powers to assist him in his attempt on the English throne. Harold was declared a perjured usurper, and every person excommunicated who dared to oppose the armies of Normandy. But still the great support of war was wanted. The treasures of William were far from being sufficient, and the states of Normandy absolutely refused to grant the prodigious sums he required. The wealth of individuals, however, supplied what the states had refused; and William was soon enabled to collect a fleet of three thousand sail, and an army of forty thousand men; a force which he imagined sufficient to produce a fatal revolution in the dominions of Harold.

The state of England, at that time, increased his hopes of success. There were few places of strength in the kingdom; London and Dover only were capable of sustaining a siege. A peace of fifty years had softened the dispositions of the English, and rendered them incapable of sustaining the fatigues of war. They were enervated by a long slumber on the bed of indolence; their manly discipline, and the love of their country, were exchanged for effeminate luxury. Many of the nobility were of Danish or Norman extraction, and were, therefore, inclined to favour William rather than Harold.

William did not, however, think all these advantages sufficient to render his expedition successful. He had engaged Harfager, king of Norway, in conjunction with Tofti, to invade the northern parts of England, in order to make a powerful diversion in his favour. They accordingly landed at the mouth of the Humber, and spread over the whole kingdom. Harold advanced, at the head of an army, against the invaders, and totally defeated them: both Harfager and Tofti fell in the action. But this defeat, though glorious to Harold, was attended with fatal consequences; he lost many of his bravest officers and soldiers in the action, and disgusted the rest, by refusing to distribute among them the Danish spoils, which he reserved to supply the exigencies of the state. A false report tended also to facilitate the enterprise of William. Harold received intelligence, that the duke of Normandy, discouraged by contrary winds, had abandoned his enterprise: the English fleet, collected to oppose the landing of the Normans, was, therefore, dismissed the service.

At length the Norman armament appeared on the coast of England; and Harold having no fleet capable of engaging so formidable a squadron, William landed his forces, without opposition, at Pevensey, in Suffex. The duke himself, in leaping on shore, fell down, and cried out, "Thus I take possession of the country." The least unexpected accident is sufficient to strike superstitious minds either with terror or with joy.

The landing of the Normans spread a general alarm through the kingdom. Forces were raised, to join the victorious army of Harold, in every county; and had that prince listened to the advice of his brother Gyrth, the expedition of the Norman had been rendered abortive. He represented, that to venture the crown upon one decisive engagement, was highly imprudent, and contrary to all the rules both of policy and war. He very justly observed, that a general battle was the most favourable event the Normans could hope for in their present situation, because despair would augment their courage; they must either conquer or perish. But, by deferring a general engagement, the Norman army would soon be reduced to the greatest extremity, especially if they were perpetually harassed by flying squadrons, and their foraging parties cut off. He added, that by intrusting the army to his care, the enemy might be conquered without a battle; but if an engagement should ensue, and his forces be defeated by the Normans, powerful resources were at hand, and the enemy would be ruined even by a victory. The English nobles approved of this advice, and his mother joined her entreaties to enforce the arguments of her son. But Harold was inflexible; he determined to give the enemy battle, and risk his crown on the fortune of a single day.

This resolution being taken, Harold marched against the enemy, notwithstanding he was deserted by many of his veterans. He encamped on a hill at some distance from the Normans; and the next morning, mounting his horse, in company with his brother Gyrth, advanced to reconnoitre the strength and position of the invaders. This view convinced Harold, that he had been too precipitate in his measures; and, at his return, proposed retreating to London, in order to augment his army. Gyrth opposed the measure with some warmth: he justly observed, that he had now proceeded too far to deeline a battle; that his honour was engaged; and that to retire a single step, would be construed into cowardice, considered as a flight, and be attended with a fatal loss of his reputation: that he should have listened to the advice of his nobles before he had advanced against the enemy; at present, he must either conquer or perish.

Convinced, by the reasons of his brother, that there was now a necessity for giving battle to the enemy, Harold applied himself to make the necessary preparations for the decisive event. While he was thus employed, some monks arrived from the Norman camp; and being introduced to Harold, declared, that William, to prevent the effusion of human blood, sent him the following offers; either to resign the kingdom to him, or hold it of him in fealty; to submit their cause to the arbitration of the pope, or to fight him in single combat. Harold replied, that the God of battles would soon be the arbiter of their differences.

Negotiations were now at an end, and the hour was approaching which was to put a final period to the dispute between these two powerful armies. The night preceding the battle was spent in a very different manner by the contending parties. The Normans passed it in prayer; the English in riot. The dawn put a period to their exercises, and both armies prepared for battle.

The English were greatly inferior to the Normans in number; and Harold, to compensate for this disadvantage, drew up his men in one column, upon the declivity of a hill, having a large ditch, and a line of hurdles, in their front. The Normans were drawn up in three lines, and advanced to the charge, carrying the pope's consecrated standard at their head, with great alacrity. The attack was made with the utmost fury; but the English stood firm, and obliged the assailants to retire. The Normans returned to the charge with redoubled fury, and were again driven back by the English. The battle continued the whole day, and victory, more than once, seemed to declare in favour of Harold. The abilities of the two commanders, and the valour of their troops, were equal. Liberty inspired the English; glory, blended with despair, the Normans. The former knew, that every thing they held dear depended upon their valour; the latter, that a retreat was impossible. William flew from rank to rank, from squadron to squadron, animating by his words, and encouraging by his example. Harold, with equal spirit, with equal valour, and with superior success, opposed him. Death marched in his rear: the Normans were astonished at the power of his arm. William perceived his danger, and had recourse to artifice. He ordered his troops to make a hasty retreat. The stratagem succeeded. The courage of the English proved their destruction: they pursued the Normans, whom they considered as a flying enemy. Their phalanx, which had been hitherto impenetrable to all the attacks of the invaders, was broken. The duke perceived it; and facing about, repulsed the pursuers with great slaughter. The English, however, regained the advantageous ground they had quitted, and again bid defiance to the attacks of the enemy. At last Harold, and his two brothers, were slain at the head of their forces; and the soldiers, having lost their leaders, fled from the field of battle. Above sixty thousand of the English fell in this dreadful engagement; and the Norman purchased the victory with the loss of fifteen thousand of his best troops.

The standard of English liberty fell with Harold, a prince who merited a better fate. He was humane, generous, affable, and intrepid: he loved his subjects, he loved his friends, he loved his country: he was a champion for freedom, and fell in its defence: he wished not to survive the constitution of England. The Norman writers have laboured to blacken his memory, in order to render that of the conqueror more splendid; a circumstance that too often attends a change of fortune. Had the Norman lost the battle of Hastings, we had never heard of Harold's vices, nor William's virtues; the former would have been extolled to the skies, and the latter painted in his true colours. He would have been represented as a lawless usurper, who came to ravage the country of an innocent people; and wrest the sceptre from the hand of a sovereign, whose principal care was the happiness of his subjects. Time has destroyed the flimsy veil which the hand of partiality has thrown over the characters of these two princes, and placed their virtues and vices in a genuine point of light. A comparison is unnecessary; Harold fell in defence of that liberty which William destroyed.

Harold was the last of the Anglo-Saxon kings. The throne was filled by a stranger; and new laws, new customs, and even a new constitution, were introduced, instead of those observed by the Saxons. It will, therefore, be necessary to give the reader some account of the government, manners, and learning of that people. Liberty constituted one of the principal features in the character of the Saxons: they had no idea of a despotic power: they considered a king only as a more distinguished citizen, bound by the same laws, and subject to the same customs as his subjects. His murder was compensated by a fine, as well as that of the lowest of the people; the only pre-eminence he enjoyed was, that the fine was larger. They had no established rule with regard to the right of succession to the crown; the children, indeed, often succeeded their father in the seat of power; but a small circumstance was sufficient to set it aside. Present emergencies were more attended to than general principles: they thought not on future contingencies; the consequences that might attend this breach in the succession were not regarded. All affairs of moment, ecclesiastical or civil, were proposed in the general assembly of the nation, called Wittenagemot; and without the consent of that body, no laws were binding upon the subject. It is not easy, perhaps impossible, to determine with precision, who the members were that formed this national council. The bishops, abbots, and aldermen, or governors of provinces, called earls after the Danish conquest, are known to have formed one part; but whether the representatives of boroughs, or the more wealthy citizens, composed the other, is not determined.

The people were divided into three orders; nobles or thanes; freeholders, or freemen; and slaves, or villeins. The nobles chiefly resided on their estates: cities were then little frequented; attendance at court was esteemed a species of oppression. Their houses were open to strangers; they vied with each other in acts of hospitality. The business of the freemen principally consisted in cultivating their estates, the industry of the people being chiefly confined to agriculture. The villeins were employed in domestic occupations, or in cultivating their lord's demesnes.

Death was never inflicted by the Anglo-Saxon laws; crimes of every species were compensated with pecuniary fines. A price was fixed on the head of each person, according to his rank; even that of the king was not excepted. The price of wounds, and the loss of members, was settled; and was always proportioned to the size and danger of the former, and the use of the latter.

Various methods of trial subsisted under the Anglo-Saxon government; but that by juries generally prevailed. But where the crime could not be proved by witnesses, recourse was had to the most ridiculous methods, equally calculated to punish the innocent or the guilty. Single combat, the judgment of the cross, and the trial by fire or water, called the ordeal, were the tests introduced by a superstitious people, who were persuaded that heaven would openly declare in behalf of the innocent, and pour destruction on the head of the guilty. The celebrated celebrated Montesquieu very justly observes, that our ancestors rested the honour, the fortune, and the lives of citizens, on circumstances which depend less on reason than chance; and incessantly made use of proofs incapable of convicting, and which had no manner of connection either with innocence or with guilt. The cultivation of reason has destroyed these preposterous methods of trial; and relieved society from a series of complicated distresses.

The force of the island consisted of the militia. Every freeman was under an indispensable necessity of arming in defence of the state: he marched to battle under the standard of his lord, and was not to leave the army till the time of his service was expired. The whole nation were soldiers: every citizen fought in defence of his own property, and that of the whole society.

Learning was at a very low ebb under the Anglo-Saxon government. The arts and sciences cultivated by the Greeks and Romans were buried under the ruins of the empire. An impenetrable cloud of Gothic ignorance had stifled the rays of wisdom; the avenues to knowledge were hardly known. Alfred, indeed, exerted himself nobly in defence of literature; during his reign, the glimmerings of science appeared. He founded the university of Oxford, and endeavoured to allure the muses to the banks of the Isis; but he died too soon. His successor, Edward the Elder, followed his example, and founded the university of Cambridge. But their labours were not sufficient to complete the noble design. The ravages of the Danes destroyed the lovely branch which the generous Alfred and his son had planted, and spread over the whole kingdom a blacker cloud of ignorance than before. A few persons of learning, indeed, flourished during these uncultivated ages. After Menevensis deserves to be mentioned here: he was one of the most learned men of his time, and bishop of Sherborne in the reign of Alfred, whom he greatly assisted in his studies. He wrote several books, but one only has reached our times: it is intitled, "Annales Rerum Gestarum Ælfredi Magni." Three editions of this work have been published; one by archbishop Parker, another by Camden, and another by Wise. St. Dunstan is said to have been a good musician, painter and graver; but he has no title to be considered as a learned prelate. We wish, for the honour of our country, that we could have enlarged the catalogue of learned persons that flourished in these ages of military ferocity; but among the few that cultivated the muses, the greater part of them are forgotten: their works, which, doubtless, long floated on the current of time, are now sunk in the gulph of oblivion.

From the Norman conquest, to the restoration of the Saxon line, under Henry II.

WILLIAM I. surnamed THE CONQUEROR.

A.D. 1066. THOUGH William had gained the battle of Hastings, he was far from thinking he had conquered the spirit of English independence. He knew the nobles were brave, ambitious, and enemies even to the shadow of slavery; that they had powerful resources; that they were totally devoted to the race of the Anglo-Saxon kings; and had reason to believe that Edgar Atheling, the undoubted heir to the English crown, was then in the capital; perhaps already placed on the throne of his ancestors. The utmost caution was, therefore, necessary to secure the advantage he had gained. The English had, indeed, lost much of their ferocious spirit of liberty by the conquests of the Danes; and the reign of Canute had rendered them familiar with the government of strangers. The peaceable reign of Edward had greatly contributed to make them in love with the arts of peace, and to prefer domestic tranquillity to the boisterous alarms of war. But still they were powerful; and there was the highest reason to believe, that the loss of their friends, and the dangers of their country, would rouse them to vengeance. A single defeat would be fatal to the Norman army. William, therefore, determined to make himself master of some place of strength; that if the English should unite in opposing his designs, he might wait in safety for reinforcements from Normandy. Dover was the only place that offered him a secure retreat; and William accordingly led his victorious troops before that fortress, which, by the joint efforts of art and nature, was rendered almost impregnable. The castle was full of soldiers, who had fled thither after the defeat at Hastings; but so great was their consternation, that they delivered up the fortress to the Norman upon terms of capitulation.

The death of Harold, and the total defeat of the English army, had thrown the capital into the utmost confusion: anarchy presided in the councils of the nobles. Edgar Atheling, though beloved by the people, wanted spirit and abilities to hold the helm of government in so tempestuous a season. The archbishop of Canterbury, indeed, placed him on the throne, and nobly exerted all his abilities to restore order and subordination among a terrified and divided people. But his attempts were in vain: every salutary scheme was opposed; and every measure, which tended to promote unanimity, and prevent the crown from being placed on the head of a foreigner, was rendered abortive. They acted like people who courted the yoke of slavery.

William was informed of these dissensions, and determined to turn them to his own advantage. He left a strong garrison in Dover; and dividing his army into three bodies, marched directly towards London. The only opposition he met with on his march, was from Fretheric, abbot of St. Albans. He caused a considerable number of trees to be felled, and placed in the roads, to impede the progress of the Norman. William ordered the abbot to appear before him; promising, that if he complied, no harm should happen to his person. The abbot obeyed; and being asked why he had endeavoured to stop the passage of his army, nobly replied, "I have done no more than my duty; and had others of my rank equally exerted their abilities, you had never penetrated so far into this country, nor summoned me to give an account of my conduct." Struck with the noble boldness of the answer, William dismissed the abbot without passing the least censure on his conduct.

In proportion as William advanced towards the capital, capital, the confusion among the English increased. No plan was formed for opposing the march of the Conqueror; no general was chosen to lead the troops against the enemy: The clergy, instead of employing their authority to heal the divisions, and inspire the people with courage and unanimity, laboured to increase the disorder. Most of the dignified ecclesiastics were Normans, and declared in favour of William; they justified an enterprize which was consecrated by papal authority. The friends to the constitution of England perceived it was now too late to support the falling state of their country; that opposition would only tend to exasperate the Conqueror, and forge heavier chains for a brave and warlike people. They determined therefore to submit to William, and sheath the sword of destruction, which threatened the ruin of their bleeding country. Accordingly the primate, the nobility, and even Edgar Atheling himself, repaired to the Norman camp, and entreated William to accept a crown, which his virtues and abilities had rendered him worthy of enjoying. They were received with the greatest politeness. It was the interest of William to endear himself to the nation, and acquire, by acts of humanity and kindness, the love and esteem of the people.

The ceremony of the coronation was performed in Westminster-abbey on Christmas-day. But during the solemnity, a tumult ensued which threatened the place with destruction. The abbey was surrounded with a body of Norman soldiers, who hearing a confused noise occasioned by the acclamations of the people, when the crown was placed on William's head, imagined it was the voice of tumult and disorder, and that the life of their duke was in danger. Fired at what they considered as a perfidious stratagem of the English, without giving themselves the least time for examination, they set fire to the adjacent houses, and assailed the populace with the utmost fury. The alarm spread with amazing rapidity, despair was visible in every countenance; the Norman himself fled trembling to the altar, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the tumult was at last appeased.

A. D. 1067. The victory at Hastings had sufficiently established the valour of William; but it was necessary that he should also establish the character of a wise and humane governor. The first acts of his administration were well calculated for that purpose. He seemed desirous of engaging the affections of his new subjects, by listening to their complaints, and removing every enormity, and correcting every act of oppression. The impartial execution of justice practised in Normandy, he introduced into England. The severe discipline of his army was softened by presents and affability. The treasure of Harold, which fell into his hands, was greatly increased by bounties and presents from the rich and the powerful. This enabled him to give rewards to his followers, distribute charities to the monasteries, to send presents to the churches of France, Aquitain, and Burgundy, where masses had been said for the success of his expedition, and to remit large sums to the pope, with costly presents to the church of St. Peter at Rome. He also erected a church and monastery on the field where Harold was slain. The church was dedicated to St. Martin, and the abbey, which was filled with Benedictine monks, and exempted from episcopal jurisdiction, was called Battle-abbey. He granted the city of London a new charter, by which all the privileges and immunities that city enjoyed in the reign of Edward the confessor, were confirmed. He affected to treat the English nobility with the utmost kindness, and not only caressed Edgar Atheling in a very particular manner, but granted him large estates, and confirmed to him the title of earl of Oxford, which had been conferred on him by Edward the confessor. These acts of kindness produced the most pleasing effects on the generous minds of the English; they flattered themselves with a long series of domestic tranquillity under a wise and impartial administration. But the subsequent actions of William convinced them that they formed their opinions too soon. He seized on all the estates of those who had joined Harold against him, and gave them to his Norman officers; erected fortresses in various parts of the kingdom, and filled them with foreign troops. He disarmed the people, and broke the militia. These measures gave the English great uneasiness: they now perceived that William acted rather as a conqueror than a king; and wished that power, rather than the affections of his subjects, might be the support of his crown.

After taking every prudent precaution to secure his new kingdom, he passed over into Normandy, carrying with him the principal of the English nobility, under pretence of enjoying the pleasure of their conversation, and of shewing them to the world as the greatest ornaments of his court. But this was too gross to impose on the understanding of the most credulous. It was sufficiently evident they were carried abroad as hostages to secure his conquest, add a lustre to his power and adorn his triumph. Their magnificence did him honour. The foreign princes were astonished. Such a profusion of ornaments was before unknown in Normandy. William kept his Easter in the abbey of Fecamp, where he was visited by Rodolph, uncle to the king of France, and a great number of the principal persons in Normandy and the adjacent provinces. But while he was indulging himself in joy and festivity, all the precautions he had taken to secure the tranquillity of England were frustrated. The insolence of the Normans could be restrained by no authority, but that of William. Proud from the victory they had obtained, greedy of plunder, and looking with contempt on a people who had so easily resigned their liberties, they were guilty of every excess. They plundered the houses of the English, violated the chastity of their wives and daughters, and practised such enormous cruelties, that nothing but savage brutality could invent. Revenge roused the spirit of the English. They perceived their dreadful situation, and despair urged them to retaliate on the invaders of their country all the miseries they had suffered from the hand of wanton despotism. They were not yet totally insensible to the charms of liberty, and determined either to drive their tyrannical masters out of the kingdom or perish in the attempt. But they were destitute of leaders, and could form no regular plan for executing their design. The inhabitants of Kent, who severely felt the rod of power, applied to Eustace, count of Boulogne, for assistance. He listened to their complaints, and promised them relief. The castle of Dover was considered as the most proper place for a retreat if the enemy should prove too powerful; and they agreed to begin their operations against the enemy, with seizing that important fortress. The plan was conducted with the utmost secrecy, and Montfort the governor being absent with part of the garrison, there was great reason to hope that the attempt would be crowned with success. The night appointed for the execution of this project arrived, and the Kentishmen repaired in small parties to the place of rendezvous. About midnight Eustace landed his forces, and led the combined troops immediately to the attack. The strength of the castle saved the Normans from the resentment of the English. They assailed the gate with the utmost fury; but they spent their force in vain. The garrison was now alarmed; they sallied out upon the English, and put them to flight. Many were precipitately thrown headlong from the rocks, and the count's son taken prisoner. Eustace himself, at the head of a few followers, escaped to his ships.

This miscarriage was far from intimidating the English; they broke out into open rebellion in various parts of the kingdom. They even formed a scheme for massacring all the Normans. They never considered that it was almost impossible to conceal this dreadful contrivance. Some among the number of perpetrators would certainly reveal the secret. This actually happened; William received private intelligence of the design; he hastened to England, and broke all their measures. The conspirators had proceeded too far to retreat; they marched into the north, fortified the city of Durham, and set at defiance the whole Norman power. Had the English shewn the same spirit immediately after the battle of Hastings, William had never seized the English sceptre; but it was now too late. The people, in general, were without arms, and the Normans in possession of the principal fortresses of the kingdom. Their attempts to regain their liberty had, therefore, now no other effect than to rivet more effectually the chains of slavery, and add a large increase to their weight. William immediately revived the tribute of Danegeld, in order to punish the English for their rebellions. This tax, which Edward the Confessor had abrogated, always gave the greatest uneasiness to the people. William knew that this impost would render him odious, but was determined to proceed: he no longer courted the favour of the English. Aldred, archbishop of York, who had hitherto strenuously supported all the measures of William, was alarmed at this exertion of arbitrary power, and laboured assiduously to render it abortive. He had recourse to persuasions and remonstrances; but finding all his attempts were vain, he not only abandoned the interest of William, but anathematized him, and all his family. This, however, had no effect upon William's conduct; he defied the ecclesiastical as well as the temporal power, and levied the tax with the utmost rigour.

A.D. 1068. William was not, however, satisfied with impoverishing the English by taxes and extortions; he determined to confiscate the estates of all those who had in the least assisted Harold. It was in vain to urge, that when William first landed in England, Harold was in actual possession of the crown; that the whole nation had sworn fealty to him; and, consequently, that he had a right to their services; that their subsequent submission had been accepted by William; and that he had himself promised to protect them in their rights and privileges. These reasons were unanswerable; but they were urged without effect: William acted not on the principles of justice.

The nobles now felt the difference between the government of a king and the despotism of a tyrant, and determined not to submit tamely to such oppressions: passive obedience and non-resistance were doctrines reserved for after times; they were not known under the Anglo-Saxon government. The nobles joined the populace, and broke out into open rebellion. This insurrection threatened the destruction of the Norman government: the most considerable persons in the kingdom were among the insurgents; and unanimity only was wanting to render their designs successful. The kings of Denmark and Scotland promised them assistance. William was alarmed at the storm that threatened to overwhelm him: he marched immediately against the insurgents, before they were joined by the forces they expected. The great activity of the conqueror rendered the whole design abortive. The nobles submitted, and were received into favour. William thought proper, for a time, to lay aside his arbitrary scheme of oppression. Edgar Atheling, whom the cries and intreaties of the people had roused to action, fled into Scotland, with his mother, and two sisters, and were received by Malcolm with the utmost kindness. Formerly an exile himself, he had learned compassion in the school of adversity. William demanded the fugitives; and Malcolm, with a noble magnanimity which does honour to his memory, treated the message with contempt. A war between the two nations was the consequence; and the northern parts of the kingdom became again obnoxious to the sword of desolation.

The court of Malcolm was soon crowded with English nobles; and the Northumbrians, sure of being powerfully assisted, committed the most dreadful ravages on the territories of the Normans; many of whom chose to abandon their estates, and retire into their own country, rather than be perpetually harassed by the attempts of an exasperated people. Nor were the Scots the only people that threatened to attack the English monarch; the Danes and the Irish had joined in the confederacy; and it was agreed to make the attack at the same time in different parts of the kingdom. Had this plan been executed with vigour, it would have shaken the foundations of William's power; but it was rendered abortive by the dissensions that prevailed in their councils. The Danes, however, landed at the mouth of the Humber; and William thought it most advisable to purchase their absence by a large sum of money.

A.D. 1070. The English insurgents, when deserted by their foreign allies, were unable to support themselves against the Norman army: they were obliged to submit to superior force; and the Conqueror had now an opportunity of introducing into England the innovations he thought necessary to support that despotic power by which he was determined to govern the kingdom. He had now the plea of rebellion to offer as a reason for his conduct; and he failed not to use it. He confiscated the estates of the nobles, and gave them to the Normans and other foreigners who had assisted him in the conquest of this unhappy country. For an Englishman to be possessed either of riches or power, was considered as a sufficient crime to render him obnoxious to punishment. The innocent and the guilty suffered equally under the rod of oppression. The most ancient and opulent families were reduced to indigence; they pined for want on the very estates which had descended to them through a long line of illustrious ancestors.

The feudal polity, which had been long introduced into France and Normandy, was considered by William as the best, perhaps the only method of rendering the servitude, to which he had reduced his subjects, perpetual; by destroying the very idea of liberty, and rivetting the chains of slavery on a generous, though conquered people. He accordingly divided the kingdom into seven hundred baronies, which he bestowed upon his particular friends. No Englishman was suffered to enjoy that honour. These baronies were subdivided into sixty thousand, two hundred and fifteen knights fees; which were distributed among their retainers, and a few of the Englishmen who had been fortunate enough to gain the favour of the Conqueror.

Nor were the clergy excepted from these arbitrary proceedings: they were obliged to furnish a certain number of soldiers; and in case of refusal, to suffer the same punishment. The temporalities of the ecclesiastics enjoyed no greater favour than the estates of the laity. The pope remonstrated against these proceedings, but without effect. William no longer wanted his assistance, and was not to be intimidated by the thunder of the Vatican. Alexander II. who then filled the papal chair, perceived it would be in vain to contend against the power of William, and determined to accomplish by policy what he could not effect by force: he flattered himself with being able to extend his supremacy over the English dominions; but this, he knew, must be effected by an artful conduct. William was too violent to be openly opposed. Ermevroy, bishop of Sion, appeared well qualified for carrying on this difficult and delicate negotiation; and accordingly Alexander sent him into England with the character of legate. Several of the English clergy were become obnoxious to William: the arrival of the legate, therefore, was agreeable to the Conqueror, who now determined to punish them under the sacred mask of religion. Ermevroy, instructed to gain the favour of the English monarch, summoned a general council council of the clergy; where Strigand, archbishop of Canterbury; Agelmar, bishop of Helmham; Elgeric, bishop of Durham, and several other prelates, were deposed: one English bishop only was suffered to keep his see; all the rest fell victims to the resentment or policy of the Norman. Nor was this sufficient to satisfy his ambitious intentions: he prevailed upon Ermeftroy to change the tenure of the church lands; and instead of holding them free of all secular dependence, to hold them in military tenure, or by knight's service.

Thus William, by the assistance of the pope's legate, sufficiently humbled the English clergy, and filled their posts with foreigners. It must, indeed, be remembered to his honour, that he preferred none but persons remarkable for their genius and learning. The celebrated Lanfranc, an Italian monk, was placed in the see of Canterbury; Thomas, one of the canons of Bayeux, was created archbishop of York; and the sees of Winchester, Helmham, and Selsey, were filled by three of his own chaplains.

Ermeftroy now imagined that very considerable concessions would be made to his holiness, but he was mistaken: William was jealous of his power, and determined to keep the church, as well as his lay subjects, in subjection: he required, that all the ecclesiastical canons voted in any synod, and even the bulls sent from Rome, should receive his sanction before they were of any force in his kingdom. He had seen so many abuses of spiritual power, that he was determined to prevent their repetition in his kingdom; and passed a law in the national assembly, that none of his ministers or barons should be excommunicated without his consent. By these prudent measures, he flattered himself with having effectually clipped the wings of ecclesiastical ambition, and prevented the Roman pontiff from raising commotions in his kingdom. But he was mistaken; Lanfranc effected, by his assiduous labour, what the pope himself had attempted in vain: he laid the foundation of that alarming authority which the Roman church afterwards exercised over this kingdom.

The English now severely felt the chains of slavery which had, for some time, been forging for them. Some were intimidated into passive obedience, while others formed the noble resolution of supporting their independency, or perishing with the liberties of their country. Many of the latter retired to the isle of Ely, and set at defiance all the power of the Norman. Among these was the brave Hereward de Wake, son to the late Leofric, lord of Brunne, reputed the greatest warrior of his age. He was chosen captain of this resolute band, and bravely exerted the great talents he possessed. William was alarmed at this opposition, and marched immediately a large body of troops to chastise the insurgents. But it was no easy task to drive them from their retreat. He attacked the island several times in vain, and was at last obliged to convert the siege into a blockade. Malcolm, king of Scotland, took the advantage of William's being employed in this difficult attempt, and made an irruption into the northern provinces. William was therefore obliged to have recourse to stratagem, and effected by art what he found exceeded his abilities to perform by force: he attacked the possessions of the monks of Ely, and laid them under military execution. Alarmed for their estates, the religious offered to betray the island, and pay him a thousand marks, provided he would restore to the convent the lands he had seized. William readily embraced the offer; and the abbot, faithful in his treachery, opened a passage to the royal army. Finding himself betrayed, and disdain- ing submission, the gallant Hereward cut himself a passage through the Norman forces, and made his escape; the rest were obliged to surrender at discretion.

The Scots still continued their ravages; and William having reduced the insurgents, advanced, at the head of his forces, to give them battle. The two armies met at Nithisdale, where the Scottish forces had intrenched themselves in a very advantageous situation. William thought it imprudent to attack the enemy till his forces had recovered themselves from the fatigue of a long and painful march. He therefore encamped near Malcolm's army, without making any attempt to begin hostilities. Several days passed, without either army's making the least motion to disturb the other. Equally valiant, and equally expert in military knowledge, the two kings were fearful of the consequences of a battle. Their armies were nearly equal, and it was very doubtful to whom fortune would give the palm of victory. The Scot knew, that if his army was defeated, Scotland would be left open to the ravages of an enraged enemy. The Norman, already surrounded by enemies, his crown, perhaps his life, depended upon the issue of this single action. Consequences like these wholly engaged the attentions of the contending monarchs; both were unwilling to venture the important stroke, and both armies continued inactive. At last a negotiation for a peace was opened by the prelates that attended the two princes. No opposition was made to the treaty, which accordingly soon took place between them. By one of the articles, Edgar Atheling was to return to England, and renounce all his right to the crown, on receiving a sufficient maintenance from the Conqueror.

A.D. 1073. It was now natural to expect, that William would have enjoyed some respite from the toils of war: he had reduced the English to subjection, and concluded a peace with the Scottish monarch. But the alarms of invasion were not yet over: Philip of France was jealous of William's prosperity, and attacked the patrimonial dominions of the Norman. Godfrey de Mayenne joined the invading army, and drove the Normans entirely out of that country. Alarmed at this unexpected attack, William passed over to the continent, at the head of an English army. He immediately attacked the invaders, recovered the territories they had taken, and obliged Philip to conclude a safe and honourable peace. By this noble exertion of their innate bravery and resolution, the English recovered the confidence of William, who soon after restored some of the laws of Edward the Confessor; a circumstance which greatly contributed to render his government less odious to the people.

A.D. 1074. While William continued in Normandy, he received advice, that fresh troubles were excited in England by persons whom he never suspected of disaffection. His Norman subjects were seized with the spirit of rebellion. Several of the chiefs who had engaged with him in the conquest of England, enriched by the wealth he had bestowed upon them, disdained to submit to his imperious dominion. Roger, the youngest son of William Fitz Osborne, earl of Hereford, had applied to William for licence to marry his sister to Ralph de Guar, earl of the East-Angles; and received a peremptory denial a little before the king passed over into Normandy. Enraged at this refusal, especially as there was no necessity for applying to William, the young lady not being an heiress, it was resolved to solemnize the marriage without waiting for the king's return, or making any farther application for his consent. The ceremony was accordingly performed with great magnificence. The imperious behaviour of William naturally became the subject of conversation, and the most bitter reflections were made on his tyrannical government: they expressed their contempt for him as a bastard, and determined to submit no longer to his arbitrary administration. They accused him of using every species of tyranny over the English, who were unjustly subjected to the arbitrary nod of an usurper. Earl Waltheof, one of the greatest warriors of the age, was the only Englishman who retained any power. He had lately married married Judith, the king's niece, and was created earl of Northumberland for his valour. This brave soldier was one of the guests, and joined with the rest in the conspiracy to dethrone William; but fearful of their own power, they agreed to solicit the assistance of Sweyn, king of Denmark, a sworn enemy to the imperious Norman.

Calm reflection soon convinced Waltheof, that the conspiracy was at once idle and unjust. Remorse succeeded, and he informed Lanfranc of the whole design. The prelate persuaded him to cross the seas immediately, and reveal all he knew to William. Waltheof followed the advice of the archbishop; but unfortunately for him, he had also revealed the secret to his wife, who sent an express to the Conqueror, and used all her art to incense him against her husband. Waltheof, however, met with a gracious reception, and flattered himself that he had nothing to fear. The conspirators were alarmed at the disappearance of Waltheof; and some steps taken by the regency convinced them that the secret was betrayed. They immediately flew to arms, without waiting the arrival of the Danes, on whose assistance they placed their chief confidence. But their efforts were in vain; they were every where disappointed; so that when William landed in England, he found the conspiracy intirely suppressed. The brave Waltheof, notwithstanding the atonement he had made for his crime, was committed to prison. Lanfranc exerted all his interest to save him, but in vain: the Norman was inflexible; Waltheof was tried, and executed. Thus fell the last Englishman who enjoyed any considerable degree of power or interest in the nation. His infamous wife did not long enjoy her inhuman triumph over her husband; she was universally despised, and suffered that disgrace and contempt her perfidy so justly merited.

A.D. 1075. Though Alexander had met with such bad success in his attempt to extend the papal supremacy over England, his successor, Gregory VII. was not in the least intimidated. The unbounded ambition and superlative insolence of this pontiff had already set half Europe in a flame. He was disposed to employ the most sanguinary measures to establish the projects he had formed for carrying the papal grandeur to an unbounded height. He was the principal agent in those dreadful contests which had so long subsisted between the courts of Germany and Rome. Persuaded that St. Peter's successor had a right to dispose of crowns, he undertook to excommunicate and depose Henry IV. and to instigate his subjects to take up arms against their lawful sovereign. Spain, Portugal, and Poland, felt the weight of his ambition; even the plains of Asia were not exempted from his tyranny; the thunder of the Vatican was heard beyond the Bosphorus. Success had increased the violence of his ambition; he was determined to extend the despotism of Rome over the islands, as well as the continent of Europe. He dispatched a nuncio to William, insisting on his doing homage to him for his kingdom, as a fief of the Roman see; and demanding the payment of Peter's pence, which the pious liberality of the Saxon princes had constantly sent to Rome; but without ever intending to render the custom binding on their successors, or considering it as a badge of submission to the holy see. William, however, was not to be terrified by the unreasonable demands of an insolent ecclesiastic: he told him, that the money should be remitted as soon as it could be collected; but resolutely refused to pay him homage. "Fealty, said he, I never have, nor ever will pay." And, to convince the pope that he was in earnest, and despised his power, he would not suffer the English bishops to attend a general council which the pontiff had summoned to meet at Rome.

A.D. 1077. Ambition is often sufficient to break the sacred ties of nature. The family of William now became to him a source of misfortunes. That prince had promised before the peers of France, that as soon as he was settled on the English throne, Robert, his eldest son, should be left in possession of Normandy. Philip, king of France, desirous of creating dissensions in the family of William, instigated Robert to demand the possession of his patrimony. Fired with what he considered as an injury, Robert laid his claim before his father, and urged the completion of it with some warmth. William was highly offended; and told him, that he never would part with any of his dominions, and that death only could put him in possession of Normandy. The refractory spirit of Robert was exasperated at this peremptory denial: he formed cabals against his father; and at last carried his imprudence so far, as to break out into open rebellion.

William saw with grief the undutiful behaviour of his son, and determined to chastise his insolence. He transported an army, chiefly composed of English, into Normandy, and advanced against the insurgents. Robert soon perceived he was in no condition to face his father's army, and retreated to Gerberoy, a strong fortress in the Beauvoisis. William followed him, and invested the castle. Several skirmishes happened between small parties of the two armies, but with very little advantage to either. At last Robert, disdaining to be thus ingloriously shut up within the walls of a castle, drew out his forces, and gave his father battle. The contest was very sharp, and, for some time, continued equal. At last an arrow, from an unknown hand, struck William's horse, which immediately fell, and the king was thrown, almost breathless, to the ground, where he was in the utmost danger of being trod to pieces. In this deplorable situation, he called for help; and Robert hearing the well known voice of his father, was struck with horror: all the sentiments of duty and filial reverence were awakened in his breast; he raised him from the ground with the utmost tenderness, threw himself at his feet, implored his pardon, and offered to purchase his forgiveness by any atonement. But William was too deeply affected with the affront he had received, to pardon his son: he renounced not immediately his resentment: he, however, drew off his army, and returned to Rouen. Robert dismissed his forces, and followed his father. The queen interposed in behalf of her son; and her influence, added to the submission of Robert, produced, at length, a reconciliation. Robert was again received into the favour of his father; but William did not think it prudent to leave him in Normandy, lest the same instigations should again produce the same alarming events. He carried his son into England, and sent him, at the head of an army, to repel the inroads of the Scots, who, taking the advantage of William's absence, had invaded the northern parts of England.

A.D. 1079. William now rested from the toils of war. The English were effectually subdued, and the greater part of all the estates in the kingdom possessed by Normans; so that, according to the emphatical expression of William of Malmesbury, "England was become an habitation and dominion of strangers." This interval of tranquillity enabled William to finish a survey of the kingdom, begun by Edward the Confessor. In this survey an account was taken of all the lands in England, their extent in each district, their value, their quality, and the number of the tenants, cottagers, freemen, sokemen, villeins, and slaves; black cattle, sheep, hogs, cattle for draught, and other animals, with the names of those to whom they belonged; and the number of mills and fisheries. This work was six years in compiling; and was at first called, The Roll of Winchester, because originally kept in that cathedral; but it was afterwards named Domboc, or Domesday-book, because there was no appeal from its authority; its evidence was decisive. It is still preserved in the exchequer, and committed to the care of the chamberlain.

WILLIAM the CONQUEROR Seizing his BROTHER ODO Bishop of Bayeaux & Earl of Kent.

A. D. 1082. Odo, bishop of Bayeux, the king's uterine brother, lately created earl of Kent, and appointed chief justiciary of the kingdom, had amassed immense sums of money by the most illegal and oppressive methods. He was by nature turbulent and ambitious, and deeply tinctured with the folly of the times, in placing confidence in the idle predictions of astrologers. One of those itinerant fortune-tellers, among other ridiculous assertions, foretold that Gregory, who then filled the papal chair, should be succeeded by a prelate whose name was Odo. Animated with the hopes of obtaining that seat of envied greatness, Odo, who placed the most implicit faith in what was then called the language of the stars, determined to employ the vast treasures he had collected by the rapacious hand of injustice, in procuring the chair of St. Peter. He purchased a palace at Rome, furnished it in the most superb manner, and employed a great number of agents to engage the voices of the cardinals in his favour. He, however, kept his design a profound secret, and proposed to withdraw privately out of the kingdom, and take up his residence at Rome, till the death of Gregory should open a way to the succession. But his intentions could not be concealed: one of his pretended friends informed William of the chimerical projects formed by his brother. The loss of such enormous sums, and the consequences that might attend his endeavours to obtain the papacy, determined William not to suffer him to leave the kingdom. He accordingly ordered him to be arrested; but his officers being intimidated at the immunities enjoyed by the clergy, hesitated to execute his orders: they feared the ecclesiastical more than the civil power. William perceived their scruples; and seized the bishop with his own hand. It was in vain that Odo pleaded his exemption from temporal jurisdiction; William answered, that he arrested him not as bishop of Bayeux, but as earl of Kent. Gregory had recourse alternately to persuasions and menaces to obtain the release of Odo, but in vain. William set all the thunders of the vatican at defiance, and kept the ambitious prelate closely confined in one of the castles of Normandy.

William's favourite amusement was hunting; and his extreme passion for that rural diversion induced him to execute a design which has justly loaded his memory with reproach. He laid waste a large extent of country in Hampshire, in order to form a capacious forest. The spot devoted to destruction was remarkable for its fertility, and adorned with all the beauties of nature; it was full of churches, monasteries, villages and farms. The inhabitants had never injured him; never joined in any rebellion against his government. But the voice of innocence and justice pleaded in vain. William drove the inhabitants from their dwellings, and the religious from their retreats. He demolished the structures, ecclesiastical and civil, seized the property of the inhabitants, without making the sufferers the least compensation for their losses. Nor was he satisfied with this inhuman stretch of tyrannical power. He enacted the most severe laws relative to the forests, by which those who dared to kill a deer, a boar, or even a hare, were condemned to lose their eyes. And it should be remembered, that at this very time the killing a man might be compensated by paying a very moderate fine. Humanity is not in the catalogue of a tyrant's virtues.

It was useless to complain. Every oppression was laid upon the English. He not only robbed them of their wealth and estates, but even formed a project for depriving them of their language. He ordered the French to be taught in the schools throughout the kingdom. It was spoken at court, and therefore studied by the polite part of the inhabitants. It was used in the courts of justice, and all the public acts, and private contracts, were written in that language.

A. D. 1087. The French barons having made incursions into the territories of Normandy, William crossed the sea in order to put an end to their depredations. This attempt to disturb the tranquillity of William's hereditary dominions, occasioned a misunderstanding between him and Philip I. During his stay in Normandy, William was taken ill, and for some time confined to his bed. He was always corpulent, and this misfortune increasing with his years, he was now become very unwieldy. Philip turned this natural infirmity into ridicule, and expressed his surprize, that his brother of England should be so long in being delivered of his big belly. This pleasantry being reported to William, he resented it in the highest degree; and declared, that he would celebrate his recovery at Notredam with ten thousand lances instead of lights; alluding to the practice of women, who then offered wax-tapers at the altar after their recovery from child-birth.

His health was no sooner restored, than he entered France at the head of a powerful army, and committed the most inhuman ravages that fury, blended with malice, could invent. Towns and villages, churches and chapels, palaces and huts, were alike destroyed: a smoking desert closed the rear of his army. The city of Mantes was one of those unfortunate places that fell into his hands, and felt the dreadful effects of his unbounded rage; He laid it in ashes, and beheld with satisfaction this horrid sacrifice to his revenge. But his triumph was of no long continuance; his horse, terrified by the smoking ruins, suddenly started aside, and bruised his belly against the pommel of the saddle. A rupture attended by a fever was the consequence. He was carried to Rouen; and sensible that his end was approaching, he was struck with remorse for the many violences and cruelties he had committed to satisfy the cravings of an unbounded ambition. He lavished donations on churches and monasteries, and practised all the external acts of religion, which in that bigotted age, were considered as the highest, and most powerful acts of religion. He gave Normandy and Maine to Robert his eldest son, and named William his second son, as his successor to the crown of England. Henry, his youngest son, he left only the portion of his mother Matilda; but foretold, that he should one day succeed to the undivided inheritance of his father, and surpass his brothers in power, in prudence and in riches. He paid the debt of nature on the ninth of September, in the sixty-first year of his age.

The attendants of William no sooner perceived that the stroke of death was over, and had heard the groan of expiration, than they immediately deserted the lifeless body to plunder his coffers and seize on his valuable effects. They even stripped his corpse of the rich mantle with which it was covered, and left the remains of this mighty conqueror, whose nod had decided the fate of thousands, naked and exposed. A country gentleman beheld this scene of rapacity, and was touched with compassion. He caused the body to be embalmed at his own expence, and made the necessary preparations for interring it in the church of St. Stephen in Caen, pursuant to William's own request. The procession was awfully solemn, and an elegant funeral oration was pronounced by Gilbert, bishop of Evreux, who, with six other prelates, attended this mournful ceremony. But just as they were going to deposit the body in the earth, one Anselm Fitz-Arthur, a Norman gentleman, pressed forward through the croud, and with an audible voice, forbade the prelates to inter the body. "That spot," said he, "was once the floor of my father's house, which was unjustly seized by William, who I now summon before the tribunal of the Most High, to answer for that flagrant act of tyrannical oppression." The people trembled, and the bishops were struck with terror at the solemnity of this invocation. At last it was agreed to give thirty sols for leave to bury the royal body, and Henry promised, if his claim should appear to be well founded, to make him a reasonable satisfaction for his estate.

Thus died William the mighty conqueror of England:

England; a prince liberally endowed by nature with all the talents necessary for placing him on the pinnacle of human greatness. His genius was piercing, and improved by a noble education: He was intrepid in danger, and fruitful in resources; a great general, and a valiant soldier. He was formed to shine both in the council and the field. He was an excellent judge of men, and employed none but those of the greatest capacity either in church or state. But his ambition carried him beyond the bounds of humanity: He availed himself of the right of conquest, the only title by which he had acquired a great kingdom, to trample upon the laws of justice, and erect the throne of despotism upon the ruins of the constitution of a free people. Avarice and oppression were two of the principal features in his character; he sacrificed to the former every principle of justice, and to the latter every dictate of humanity. He extended the iron rod of tyranny over a people his as if he had conquered; he felt not for the miseries of innocence in distress. William was not, however, wholly destitute of virtues. The noble stand he made against the insolent demands of the Roman pontiff, deserves the highest applause: he exposed his subjects to no tyranny but his own. In private life he was a tender husband, an indulgent parent, and, where political interest did not interpose, a generous master. He introduced the regulation of the curfew into England, by which all the inhabitants were obliged to extinguish their fires, and put out their lights, at the sound of a bell, which was tolled about eight o'clock in the evening. This has been unjustly represented by several historians as the badge of English servitude: for it is known that William had established the same custom in Normandy before he landed in England; and it appears that it also prevailed in Scotland.

WILLIAM II. surnamed RUFUS.

A. D. 1086. THOUGH the Conqueror was desirous of placing his second son, Rufus, on the English throne, he was aware of the difficulties that would, probably, attend his accession. The right of primogeniture was, undoubtedly, vested in his brother Robert. It was also natural to imagine, that the English were not yet sufficiently reconciled to the Norman government, to admit a descendant from the Conqueror to take possession of the throne without one struggle for their liberty; and that the Norman barons would oppose any division in the dominions of their late master: it was for their interest that the same person should sway the sceptres of England and Normandy. Rufus was no stranger to these difficulties; and knowing that his right of succession was founded on a letter the late king had written to Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, he hastened to England, before any intelligence of the death of his father reached that kingdom, in order, if possible, to secure the possession of a throne which, of right, belonged to his brother.

Lanfranc had been entrusted with the care of William's education, and looked upon him with the affection of a father: but he refused to exert his interest in his favour, unless he would promise, in the most solemn manner, "To govern with equity and moderation, maintain the liberties of the people, and behave like a dutiful and obedient son to the church." Rufus readily consented; and the prelate applied himself assiduously to remove every difficulty, and procure for his princely pupil the sceptre of England. He well knew that the government of the Conqueror was obnoxious to the inhabitants; and that all his endeavours would, therefore, prove abortive, unless some method could be devised to remove the prejudice of the people. A change of measures was universally desired, and it was therefore necessary to promise, that their wish should be granted. A report was accordingly propagated, that William had contracted a natural affection for the English; that he had seen with grief their oppressions, and earnestly wished to alleviate all their misfortunes: that he considered the forest laws as shamefully oppressive, and fit only for a nation of the most abject slaves: that he thought the English and Normans equally his subjects, and intended to make no difference between them: and that he intended to restore the nation to its former liberty, and govern intirely by the laws of Edward the Confessor. These reports excited a joy in the breast, of the English more easily imagined than expressed. They looked upon Rufus as a person sent by Providence to remove their complicated distress, and once more restore that happiness and domestic tranquillity which the iron rod of tyranny had destroyed. They wished to see Rufus placed in the seat of power.

But the task was still more difficult to gain the Norman barons over to the party of Rufus: they could not behold the disjunction of England and Normandy without regret: they were possessed of large estates in both, and desirous of avoiding the inconvenience of being subject to two masters. They foresaw, that if a war should break out between England and Normandy, an event highly probable, they must sacrifice the estates they possessed in one province to the preservation of those in the other. These considerations induced them to favour the pretensions of Robert. The temper of William also rendered them averse to his government. Cruel, insolent, and rapacious, he had inspired them with detestation instead of love. Recourse was, however, had to the art of persuasion. They were taught to believe, that if Robert obtained possession of the throne, there would be no hopes of their keeping possession of their English estates: his Norman friends would be gratified with the possessions they themselves had formerly wrested from the natives of the country: that their interests were therefore closely connected with those of Rufus, to whom their great benefactor, with his dying breath, had bequeathed the crown of England.

These lenient and persuasive arts would, however, have failed of the desired effect, had not the inactivity of Robert given them a force much greater than their own. Rufus owed the English crown to the indolence of his brother. Robert was so sure of the affections of the people, that the ambitious designs of his brother gave him no uneasiness; and when his friends advised him not to trust his interest wholly to precarious hope, probably founded on deception, but to cross over immediately into England, and conciliate, by his presence, the affections of that generous people; he answered, with a haughtiness which nothing but the most superlative vanity could inspire, "That precipitation was unnecessary; the sceptre was his undoubted right; the English were his inseparable friends, and would never presume to appoint a successor to the throne in his absence." He was, however, for once, mistaken, and became the dupe of his own vanity. Lanfranc's unwearied application in favour of Rufus, prevailed over the interest of an absent prince; and William was crowned by that prelate on the seventh of September.

Engraved for Sydney's History of England.

William knew the popularity of Robert, and that the Norman barons would not fail to join his standards, should he land in England at the head of a powerful army. He therefore justly considered the English as his only support, and determined to court their affections by the most lenient and conciliating measures. He practised not these assuasive arts in vain. Flattered by the particular attention of their sovereign, the English paid him unbounded obedience. They considered him as their friend, their protector, their father, and determined to support his government against the attempts of every enemy. Their natural honesty and openness of temper always rendered them the dupes of ambitious or designing men. The time-serving measures of Rufus both gained and secured him the English crown.

Odo, bishop of Bayeux, the chief minister and favourite of Robert, jealous of the authority of Lanfranc, whose great abilities and high station he envied, passed over into England, under pretence of soliciting the restitution of an estate he formerly possessed as earl of Kent, and which had been confiscated by the Conqueror. He was received with great affection, and reinstated in his former possessions. But the recovery of an estate was not the principal design of Odo's visit: he intended to wrest the sceptre from the hand of Rufus, and give it to Robert, as the undoubted heir of the Conqueror. He accordingly applied to several of the principal barons, and found them ready to support the pretensions of his patron, provided they could be assured of a sufficient force from Normandy to second their attempt. Robert promised them all the assistance in his power, and that he would land, at the head of a powerful army, as soon as his presence became necessary.

Animated by these encouragements, the partisans of Robert broke out into open rebellion. Several parts of the kingdom were at once thrown into the utmost confusion, and many of the counties again laid waste by the sword of desolation; William was alarmed; but that remarkable presence of mind which never forsook him, supported him amidst the rebellion of the Norman barons. He shewed not the least signs of uneasiness; his passions precipitated him not into violent measures: he followed the advice of Lanfranc, and laboured to stifle the rebellion by the gentle methods of reason and conciliation. He chose rather to convince the insurgents of the folly of supporting a cause pregnant with destruction, than to force them to submission by blood and slaughter. The success of these prudent measures was soon apparent; the chief of the conspirators abandoned the cause of Robert, and became the firm friends and adherents of Rufus. The prudent counsels of Lanfranc triumphed over the violent instigations of the bishop of Bayeux: Odo himself escaped to Normandy; but his large possessions were seized by Rufus, who distributed them among those who had served him faithfully in this alarming crisis of danger. Robert lost all his interest in England; and Rufus was firmly established on the throne he had usurped from his brother.

A.D. 1088. Prosperity is, perhaps, the surest touchstone of virtue. While William was surrounded with enemies, and felt the crown totter on his brow, he distinguished the English by every mark of favour. But he no sooner saw all his enemies at his feet, and himself firmly fixed in the seat of power, than he forgot all his promises, and treated them with the cruelties of a conqueror. He increased, instead of mitigating the severity of the forest laws. The complaints of the English were urged in vain; he was deaf to their petitions, and beheld their miseries without redress. Lanfranc saw these measures with grief and astonishment: he remonstrated against the despotic administration of his sovereign in the most forcible manner; he urged his own solemn promises when a candidate for the crown; he urged the noble and generous behaviour of the English; but his efforts were in vain: Rufus, indeed, proceeded with more caution; the great character of the archbishop, and his prodigious interest with the people, kept the king within the bounds of decency. But this check was soon removed: Lanfranc, who had kept the passions of Rufus under some restraint, paid the debt of nature, and allowed his tyranny a full career. The death of that worthy prelate was justly regretted by all the virtuous part of the nation, Normans and English. He made no distinction between the two nations; every good man was sure of his favour and protection. He gained the love of all parties; and was justly considered as a faithful and vigilant pastor, and an able and upright statesman.

The whole nation now felt all the weight of arbitrary power; the English were at once insulted and oppressed: even the privileges of the church, so sacred in those early times, proved a feeble rampart against his usurpations. Mitres and croiers were put up to sale; and the highest bidder was sure to be the purchaser. Nor were these illegal methods sufficient to satisfy his avarice; the appointing of successors to vacant benefices was delayed by this all-grasping monarch, that he might seize their revenues. The alarm occasioned by his tyrannical administration was universal; but the terror of his authority stifled the voice of complaint; even the murmurs of the ecclesiastics were in vain; their distress produced no tumult or commotion.

A.D. 1090. The indolence of Robert, which had lost him the English crown, threatened also to deprive him of his Norman dominions. Robert was valiant; and at the head of an army prudent and intrepid; but he was a stranger to policy; he had no talents for holding the reins of government. The restless and independent spirit of his vassals was greatly increased by his loose and negligent administration. The sword of civil discord was drawn, and Normandy felt all the horrors of an intestine war. Robert had mortgaged the Contentin to his brother Henry for three thousand pounds. Perhaps a less degree of natural affection never subsisted than between the three sons of William the Conqueror; Henry, fearful of losing the dominions he had obtained, applied to William for assistance; and advised him to attack the Norman dominions of his brother, where he could not fail of the greatest success. Rufus, whose avaricious soul was never satisfied, passed over to Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. Robert was in no condition to oppose his brother; he beheld with astonishment his towns successively taken, and even the capital itself on the point of falling into the hands of the invader, by the treachery of the governor. He applied in vain to the king of France for assistance; that monarch was attached to the interest of William. Henry now saw his error, and trembled for his own dominions. He deserted the party of Rufus, and joined Robert with an excellent body of forces. The two brothers arrived just soon enough to save the capital; and Robert, exasperated at the perfidy of the governor, caused him to be thrown headlong from the battlements of the castle.

A.D. 1091. William having thus miscarried in his attempt upon Rouen, laid aside his design of making himself master of Normandy, and returned to England. Perhaps he did not think it prudent to engage the combined army of his two brothers: a defeat might have been attended with the loss of his crown. His tyranny had rendered the English ripe for a revolt, and they would gladly have joined the victorious army to hurl him from the throne. A peace was, soon after, concluded between Robert and William; by which it was stipulated, that on the death of either, without issue, the survivor should succeed to his dominions. The interests of Henry were totally forgotten; his name was not mentioned in the treaty.

Alarmed and exasperated at this contemptuous treatment, Henry resolved to revenge the insult upon Robert, and accordingly made himself master of Mount Michael. This insult roused the indolence of Robert: he informed his brother William of this act of hostility, and it was agreed to march a powerful army against Henry, in order to chastise him for disturbing the peace of his brother's dominions. They began with taking possession of the Constantin, and then advanced to the siege of Mount Michael, where Henry had shut himself up, and determined to defend the fortress to the last extremity. The place was strongly fortified both by art and nature: it was situated on a rock, one side of which was washed by the sea, and wholly surrounded by the tide at high water. Instead, therefore, of attempting to reduce it by storm, the two brothers prudently turned the siege into a blockade, and determined to continue before the place till famine should force the besieged to surrender.

While the army lay thus inactive, William used frequently to ride round the camp, to see that a proper discipline was observed among the soldiers. One day, as he was employed in this exercise, he observed two men advancing full speed from the castle. William, who was a total stranger to fear, instead of retreating, advanced to meet them, not doubting but he should be able to take one, if not both of them, prisoners. They met with equal fury; but the lance of one of the soldiers piercing the chest of William's horse, he fell, and the king was thrown violently to the ground. The soldier leaped from his saddle, and raised his hand to dispatch his fallen adversary with his sword, when William exclaimed, "Hold, fellow! I am the king of England!" Struck with veneration, the assailant sheathed his sword, raised him from the ground with the highest expressions of respect, and received a noble reward. This is, perhaps, the only commendable action in his whole reign. Henry was, however, soon after, obliged to surrender the castle to his brother Robert; and being deprived of all his possessions, wandered from one place to another, with few attendants, and often in the greatest poverty and distress.

A.D. 1094. William still entertained the dangerous ambition of making himself master of Normandy. He had, indeed, concluded a peace with Robert, who had ceded to him several towns; but treaties were feeble bars to the ambition of William. He made a second invasion of Normandy, and soon made himself master of several important places. But the king of France, alarmed at his progress, marched, at the head of a powerful army, to the assistance of Robert. The scene was now totally changed: the towns and castles which Rufus had taken were successively recovered, and William reduced to the necessity of acting on the defensive. He immediately dispatched an express to England for a large reinforcement of troops; and threw up strong intrenchments round his camp, to render abortive any design Robert might form against his army.

The levies were immediately raised in England; and a general muster was appointed at Hastings, where the number was found to amount to twenty thousand men. It was an established custom for the barons or knights, under whom soldiers were raised for foreign service, to furnish each man with ten shillings towards defraying the expenses of the campaign. William wanted money more than men; and therefore, when the soldiers were drawn up on the sands, the treasurer told them, that they might be dismissed from the service, on paying to him, for the king's use, the bounty-money they had received. The offer was readily embraced; they paid the money to the treasurer, and were immediately discharged. This money enabled William to put an end to the campaign with honour. He corrupted many of Robert's vassals, and detached the king of France from his interest. But an incursion of the Welsh obliged him to return to his own dominions sooner than he intended, and saved Robert the mortification of seeing his towns taken from him, without being able to give the invader battle.

The Welsh had been exasperated by the tyranny of the Norman barons whose estates lay on the borders of their country; and, to revenge the injuries they had received, poured like a deluge into the English territories. Their routes were marked with destruction; neither age nor sex were spared. They laid in ashes all the towns, villages, and farms, they met with; and rendered the counties of Salop, Chester and Hereford, a smoking desert. Exasperated at their cruelties, William advanced against them at the head of a numerous army. But the Welsh, not thinking themselves able to meet him in the open field, wisely retreated to their mountains, whence they continually detached flying parties, who harassed the rear of William's army with perpetual skirmishes, and cut off his convoys; so that he was obliged to return without effecting his purpose.

A.D. 1095. An affair of much greater importance now called for his attention. A dangerous conspiracy was formed against his life by some of the principal barons of the kingdom. Robert Mowbray, the most powerful subject in England, was at the head of this dangerous design. The great interest and connections of Mowbray had engaged many of the nobility to join his party, which now became very numerous. William took the most prudent methods to render the design abortive. He summoned Mowbray to attend him at Winchester, to answer for his plundering four merchant ships, which had put into an English port under his jurisdiction. Robert, conscious of his guilt, or vain of his services, refused to obey the royal mandate. William, therefore, marched immediately against him; and Mowbray being in no condition to give William battle, shut himself up in Bamborough castle, which the king immediately invested. Mowbray knowing that the fortress, though impregnable, must, for want of provisions, be forced to surrender, found means to escape from the castle. He repaired to Tinmouth, and endeavoured to corrupt the governor; but before he could effect his purpose, a detachment of William's army followed him, and took him prisoner. The castle of Bamborough surrendered, and the governor impeached all the conspirators. Mowbray was sentenced to be confined for life in Windsor-castle, several were executed, and the estates of the greater part of them were confiscated.

Geoffrey count D'Eu was impeached by Geoffrey Baynard of high treason, in being privy to the late conspiracy. He denied the charge, and offered to vindicate himself by single combat; but being defeated by his antagonist, he was condemned to be castrated, and lose both his eyes. His cousin, William D'Alder, was sentenced to be publicly whipped, and afterwards hanged on a gallows thirty feet high. He suffered the whole punishment with the greatest intrepidity, and, with his dying breath, declared himself innocent of the crime laid to his charge. What bitter reflections must these dreadful severities have excited in the minds of the English! How different are these tyrannical proceedings from the mildness of the Saxon laws!

A.D. 1096. William had some time since appointed the famous Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury. It was customary at that time for persons raised to any place of dignity to make presents to the king proportional to the value of the post; and William, in consequence, expected a very considerable sum sum from Anselm. But to his astonishment, the prelate's offering amounted to no more than five hundred pounds. Enraged at this parsimonious gift, the king refused to take it, and treated Anselm with great indignity. The archbishop left the presence, carrying the money with him, and could not be prevailed upon to furnish any aid towards the expenses of government. Anselm was as tenacious of the church, as William was of the prerogatives of the crown, and most anxious to see the crown as yet.

A schism now happened in the Roman church. Two prelates claimed the pontifical dignity. Odo, bishop of Ostia, under the name of Urban II. was acknowledged pope in Italy and France; while his competitor, Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, under the title of Clement III. was considered as the successor of Peter, by several of the European powers, and particularly by the king of England. Anselm opposed his sovereignty. The haughty prelate disdained to submit to any temporal authority. He even determined to mortify William, and accordingly demanded leave to repair to Rome, and receive his archiepiscopal pall from the hands of Urban II. adding, that he regarded him as the true head of the church. Provoked by this insolence, William was with the utmost difficulty prevented from laying violent hands on the churchman; and Anselm, perceiving that he should not be supported by the prelates and clergy, retired out of the kingdom. William seized immediately on the temporalities of the archiepiscopal see; nor could he ever be persuaded to restore them to the church. They continued in his hands till he paid the debt of nature.

Superstition and enthusiasm form two of the principal features of these times, and produced such consequences as have astonished people of more enlightened ages. A monk of Picardy, known by the name of Peter the hermit, having made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, represented, at his return, in such strong colours, the outrages and oppressions exercised by the Turks on the christian pilgrims, that Urban II. considered him as a proper instrument to exhort the sovereigns of Europe to undertake the conquest of the Holy Land. Peter was accordingly sent from province to province, in order to sow the seeds of enthusiasm, and rouse the people to action.

Urban II. perceiving that the strong paintings of Peter began to produce the desired effect, held a council in the open fields near Placentia, at which above thirty thousand seculars, besides ecclesiastics, were present. The project of invading Palestine was universally applauded; but none engaged in the enterprise. Urban, therefore, held a second council at Clermont in Auvergne, where he made a speech in the market-place, in which he expatiated on the miseries suffered by the Christians in the Holy Land, and painted, in the strongest colours, the scandal that was daily offered to the Christian princes by the Turks, in not suffering their subjects to visit a city, where the great author of their religion had laid down his life for the redemption of the human race. This speech, exactly calculated to the meridian of the times, produced the desired effect. The Italians had wept over the miseries of the Christians in Asia; the French took up arms in their defence. That country was then peopled with a great many new lords, restless, independent, and fond of a life of war and dissipation. Most of them plunged in crimes the natural attendants of debauchery; and in an ignorance equal to their guilt. The pope promised them the remission of all their sins, and to open to them the gates of paradise, on the easy conditions of gratifying their predominant passion for war and tumult. No wonder that such terms were readily embraced by a multitude of enthusiasts. An infinite number of persons took the cross, and were ready to precipitate themselves upon Asia. Many even forgot, on this occasion, the duties they owed to themselves, to their families, and to their country. The glory of the undertaking banished all other considerations. They reflected not on the fatigues, the obstacles, and the dangers they must meet with before they trod the plains of Palestine. The churches and cloisters made their advantage of this enthusiastic madness; they purchased, at very low rates, many of the estates of the barons, who imagined that a little money and their arms were sufficient for them to conquer kingdoms in Asia. Every thing conspired to fill their minds with the most chimerical ideas. The glory of the enterprise, the piety which it indicated, the advantages that might result from it to religion, the honour of extirpating the infidels, and the brilliancy of an eastern conquest, acted too powerfully on the minds of a superstitious people to be withstood. The meanest lords of manors set out at their own expense, and the poor gentlemen followed them as squire. They enlisted an infinite number of cavalry and infantry, under a thousand different banners.

This fanatical fury, though it robbed Europe of millions of inhabitants, had also its advantages. It tended greatly to establish the peace of nations. Great part of the turbulent barons with their vassals were removed to a distance, and their estates vested in the hands of more peaceable proprietors. The sovereigns enjoyed their crowns, and the people their estates in more tranquillity: they were no longer alarmed with the fury of these restless spirits that had often spread the horrors of civil discord over their respective kingdoms. The French monarchy recovered its lustre by this enthusiastic insanity: the principal part of the large estates of the most opulent and powerful barons being purchased by the crown. But no prince gained more, or deserved it less than Henry, Robert's brother, infected with the enthusiasm of the times, and impatient to undergo all the fatigues of a holy war, took the cross, and applied himself to make preparations for leading an army into Palestine. But he soon perceived that the revenues of his duchy were too small to answer this purpose: they were not sufficient to enable him to appear in a manner suitable to his rank and station at the head of his vassals. He had therefore recourse to his brother, and mortgaged his duchy for three years to Rufus, for the trifling sum of ten thousand marks. William raised the money by contributions on his subjects; and Robert, after putting him in possession of Normandy, set out at the head of his vassals to gather laurels on the plains of Palestine.

A.D. 1099. William was now considered as one of the most powerful princes of his time. England and Normandy were once more united; and the many contentions that had subsisted between the barons of the two provinces entirely laid aside. Both were subjects to William, and both felt the weight of his tyranny. But notwithstanding the great power of Rufus, a single lord of la Fleche, a small town in Anjou, alarmed the monarch of England. That nobleman made so many inroads into William's dominions, and struck such terror into the inhabitants bordering on his dominions, that Rufus was obliged to cross the seas several times, in order to drive him out of his territories. But Helie was not to be intimidated; he embraced the first opportunity of William's absence to renew his incursions, and this year laid siege to the city of Mans. William was hunting in the new forest when he received advice of this transaction; when, turning to his attendants, he asked them in what direction the city of Mans lay from them. He was immediately answered, and turning his horse's head towards the place, rode full speed to the sea side, calling to those that were about him, "Let him that loves me, follow me." Dartmouth was the first sea-port town, and there they found only an old and crazy vessel, which William entered notwithstanding all the persuasions of his attendants to the contrary. The master of the vessel declared, that the tempestuous weather rendered it madness to put to sea; it was nothing less than running into unavoidable destruction. But the soul of William was not to be terrified by danger. "What!" said he to the master, "didst thou ever hear of a king that was 'drowned'?" Silenced by this reproof, the master sailed immediately out of the harbour, and the next morning reached Barfleur in safety.

Surprised at the astonishing dispatch of William, Helie, after a few skirmishes, raised the siege, and retreated with the utmost precipitation. William followed the flying enemy, attacked their rear, and took Helie himself prisoner. The captive was treated with insult; which so incensed that intrepid nobleman, that he told Rufus, "He had little cause for triumph, as his success was owing rather to 'surprise than valour'." Adding, "That if he were again at liberty, he would not find it easy to defeat 'him in a fair engagement.'" This speech awakened all the sentiments of valour in the breast of Rufus. He immediately ordered the count to be set at liberty. "Be gone," said he fiercely, "do thy worst; and, 'by the face of St. Luke, if thou hast the good fortune to conquer me, I will not ask the smallest 'return for the freedom I now confer upon thee.'" But no farther action happened between them.

While William was pleasing himself with the acquisition of Normandy, Robert was displaying his intrepid courage against the infidels. After the greatest fatigues, and the loss of multitudes of enthusiastic soldiers, the famous city of Jerusalem was taken, and the diadem of that celebrated capital offered to Robert. But whether that prince was not desirous of a crown that must be supported by continual wars, or preferred the English sceptre to that of the Holy City, is uncertain: he, however, declined the offer, and the crown was placed on the head of Godfrey of Boulogne. Had Robert perceived the consequences that followed his declining this honour, he would not, possibly, have refused it. He was considered as a person without the least regard for religion, because he refused to support the advantageous conquest which had been obtained at the expence of the lives of thousands.

A. D. 1100. Though Jerusalem was recovered from the infidels, the enthusiastic madness of the times still continued: numbers of warriors were daily flocking to the plains of Asia. Among those who were seized with the fanatical insanity, was Henry, earl of Poitou, who offered to mortgage his dominions to William for a sum of money sufficient to defray the expences of the holy war. Rufus, who joined impiety to his other vices, and ridiculed both the motive which gave rise to the crusades, and the madness of those who engaged in so chimerical an undertaking, listened to the offers of Henry. He agreed to pay down the sum demanded on being put in possession of the provinces; and ordered a numerous fleet to be fitted out, on board of which he proposed to embark in person.

While these preparations were making, William amused himself daily with hunting in the New Forest. Sir Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, and famous as an archer, attended the king in these diversions. One day, as they were returning from the chase, and at a distance from his attendants, William alighted from his horse, to wait till they joined him. He was hardly on the ground, before a stag, rushing from an adjacent thicket, passed near the king. William immediately let fly an arrow, which wounded the deer, and he followed the creature, expecting he would soon fall. While William was engaged in watching the wounded stag, another issued from the same thicket, and crossing the path between Tyrrel and the king, the knight shot an arrow, which, either by glancing against a tree, or the horns of the deer, changed its direction, struck the monarch in the breast, and piercing his heart, he fell dead on the spot, without uttering a word. Tyrrel, who had been the innocent cause of this fatal catastrophe, fled immediately to the sea-side, and escaped to France. The royal corpse was treated with the same neglect as that of his father. His attendants, who feared his power, and had followed his fortunes, paid no regard to his remains. The body was suffered to lie in the very posture it fell, till they perceived a peasant approaching with his cart, into which they threw the body, and in that ignominious manner it was conveyed to Winchester, and buried in the cathedral. No funeral pomp attended this monarch to his tomb; his grave was not watered with the tears of his people. An accidental blow put an end to his life, on the second of August, in the forty-fourth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

William had some virtues, and many vices. He was intrepid and magnanimous, a lover and encourager of arts and learning, a friend to military merit, and an implacable enemy to every species of superstition. But he was ungrateful, avaricious, tyrannical, perfidious, cruel, rapacious and dissolute. In a word, his few virtues were obscured by his vices, which have fixed an eternal stain upon his memory. He built Westminster-hall, London-bridge, and the greater part of the Tower. He acquired the surname of Rufus from his hair being of a red colour.

HENRY I. surnamed BEAUCLERC.

A.D. 1100. THE throne of England, by the death of William Rufus, without issue, undoubtedly belonged to Robert; who, after the reduction of Jerusalem, returned to Italy, where he married Sibylla, daughter of William, count of Conversana, a lady celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. In that delicious climate he was enjoying the delights of love and repose, when the throne of England became vacant by the untimely death of his brother. But indolence and pleasure were more prevalent with Robert than the acquisition of a diadem. He continued in Italy till the throne was filled by another.

Henry, the younger brother of William, was hunting in the same forest when the arrow from the bow of Tyrrel put a period to the life of Rufus. He knew the indolence of his brother Robert, and determined to seize the crown in his absence. He posted directly to Winchester, and made himself master of his brother's treasures. This acquisition almost insured his success. He now easily gained over the nobility and prelates to his interest; and he was crowned at London on the fifth of August, three days after his brother's decease.

Henry was aware of the danger that might attend this act of usurpation. He knew that Robert, with all his faults, was a favourite of the English; and therefore wisely determined to gain the love of his people, and colour the unjust measures he had pursued to seize the sceptre of his brother, by the appearance of justice and humanity. Henry was not to learn, that the first acts of a king make the strongest impressions on the minds of the people. He granted a famous charter, under the great seal of England, whereby he restrained himself from seizing the revenues of vacant bishopricks and abbies. He engaged to admit the heirs of barons to the enjoyment of their estates, without exacting those enormous fees which had been required by the two preceding princes. He promised to remit the wardship of minors, minors, by which the crown received the profits of their possessions during their minority. He engaged not to oppose any marriages which the barons might contract for their daughters, sisters, nieces, or kinswomen, unless the persons proposed were his enemies. He promised to exercise with justice and moderation the right of levying imposts, to pardon all past offences, to remit all debts due to the crown, and to maintain, in their full force, the laws of Edward the Confessor.

This charter was signed, with great solemnity, before all the archbishops, bishops, barons, earls, sheriffs, &c. in England; as many copies of it were taken as there were counties in the kingdom, and the transcript was lodged in the principal abbey of each division.

The signing of this charter was followed by an act of justice which endeared Henry to his subjects. Ralph Flambard, bishop of Durham, the oppressive and detested minister of Rufus, was thrown into prison, and fell a victim to the resentment of the public. He abolished the curfew, and granted the citizens of London a new charter, containing very ample privileges.

Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, had rendered himself extremely popular by the vigorous opposition he made to the measures of the late king; and his reputation for sanctity had greatly increased during his banishment. The English were, therefore, very desirous of seeing that famous prelate restored to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. Henry was no stranger to the affection of the people for their pastor, and immediately recalled Anselm from his exile. On his arrival, Henry proposed that he should renew the homage he had done to his brother; but this the lofty prelate absolutely refused; the pope having very lately declared, in a council held at Rome, that it was highly absurd to suppose, that hands destined to create God should be profaned by being ignominiously inserted between hands stained with blood, and polluted with rapine and impure contacts. Henry, though he despised the shallow reasoning of the Roman pontiff, thought it prudent not to insist any farther on the homage, lest he should involve himself in a disagreeable contest with the primate. He was, indeed, desirous of procuring his assistance in effecting a design he had conceived of marrying Matilda, daughter of Malcolm king of Scotland, by Margaret, sister to Edgar Atheling. That princess had resided in the monastery of Wilton ever since the death of her father, and had, for some years, worn the veil, but never taken the vows; and it was questioned whether it was lawful for her to marry.

Anselm refused to decide this question by his own authority. He summoned a general council at Lambeth; where, after the case of Matilda was thoroughly examined, Anselm declared the princess free from all religious engagements, and at full liberty to marry. The ceremony was accordingly performed by the archbishop himself, and Matilda seated on the English throne. Henry could not have performed an act more agreeable to the English nation. The people looked with the highest veneration on their ancient race of kings; and beheld, with love and admiration, the only remaining branch of the Saxon line seated on a throne so long filled by her illustrious ancestors.

A. D. 1101. Robert now returned from the plains of Italy, and took possession of his duchy without opposition. He also made preparations for recovering by force the crown of England, which had been so unjustly usurped by his brother during his absence. The separation of England and Normandy was repugnant to the interest of the most powerful barons, and they were, therefore, well disposed to second the attempts of Robert, provided he landed, at the head of a respectable army, in England. Belesme, earl of Shrewsbury; Warrenne, earl of Surry, and several other nobles, were the firm friends of Robert, and exerted themselves in his interest. Henry perceived the gathering storm, and was persuaded, that the surest way to break its force was to cultivate the friendship of Anselm, whose influence was boundless. He consulted him on every occasion, and followed implicitly his advice. The prelate was deceived by his caresses; he thought him sincere; he supported his interest, and kept his troops from deserting. A general meeting of the states was summoned; where Anselm solemnly engaged, that the king would govern his kingdom according to the laws of equity and justice in all matters, religious and civil.

Robert now landed at Portsmouth, at the head of a numerous army, and was joined by several of the most powerful barons in the kingdom. The crown tottered on Henry's brow: he saw his brother advancing towards the capital, and feared the consequences. The power of Anselm alone supported the drooping monarch. The prelate declared publicly, that if Robert persisted in his design of driving Henry from the throne, he would excommunicate him, and all his adherents. The censures of Anselm were more dreaded than the armed force of Robert. The thunder of the church was then considered as the voice of heaven; and the soldiers refused to fight against their Maker. Robert soon felt the consequences of Anselm's threatenings: his forces, instead of increasing in strength, grew weaker daily; and even those that continued firm to his interest advanced with timidity. The two armies met near Winchester, but continued inactive. Henry was fearful his troops would desert him in the day of battle, and Robert was desirous of waiting for fresh reinforcements.

Anselm exerted all his interest, during this interval of inaction, to sheathe the sword of war, by concluding a peace between the two brothers. He was at last successful, and a treaty was signed by the contending princes. Robert was to receive an annual pension of three thousand marks; and the friends of each party to be restored to their lands and estates, both in England and Normandy. Peace being thus restored, both armies were disbanded; and Henry carried his brother to his court, where they lived in the greatest harmony during two months, when Robert returned to his own dominions.

Though this treaty was very advantageous to Henry, he was the first that violated the articles. Determined to revenge the desertion of his barons, he commenced prosecutions against them; and they thinking it imprudent to appear, their estates were confiscated, and they themselves banished from the kingdom. Robert, who was strongly tinctured with the spirit of chivalry, considered his honour as concerned in recovering the honours and estates of those noblemen who had suffered in violation of the treaty between him and his brother. Benign and generous himself, he was persuaded that his presence alone was sufficient to kindle the flame of candour and humanity in the breast of his brother; but he was mistaken. Henry was determined not to part with the large estates he had confiscated, as he was now in no fear of the attempts of an enemy. Robert arrived in England; but soon found that he had followed the warmth of humanity at the expence of his interest, and almost of his safety. Henry refused to hear his remonstrances, and even hinted that his own liberty was in danger. Robert saw his error when it was too late; and was glad to make his escape at the expence of his pension.

But Henry found a more formidable competitor in Anselm than in the duke of Normandy. Conscious of the merits of his late services, the prelate determined, if possible, to render the clergy independent of the crown. He was no stranger to the violent temper of Henry, nor the jealousy with which he beheld every attempt to lessen the prerogatives of the crown. But he was not to be deterred by difficulties, nor intimidated by dangers. He well knew, that the superstition of the people would support him, and that perseverance only was necessary to render the authority of the mitre little inferior to that of the crown. Henry saw his danger, and was alarmed for the consequences. The power of the church had grown to such an enormous height, that the thrones of the princes of Europe tottered under them. The beneficent religion of the meek and humble Jesus was changed into a system of the most tyrannical power. Ambition and prejudices had effaced the pure principles of the gospel. Anselm knew the power of the Roman pontiff, and that it would be exerted in his favour. He was desirous of establishing the celibacy of the clergy, and of wresting from the crown the right of giving investiture to bishops and abbots. A synod was accordingly convened, in which a sentence of excommunication was fulminated against married priests. Pleased with this success, Anselm determined to proceed, notwithstanding he perceived he should be opposed by the whole power of the crown. Nor was he contented with depriving Henry of a prerogative enjoyed by all the monarchs that had filled the English throne from the first establishment of christianity; he proposed, that all the bishops who had received investiture from the king, should immediately resign their sees, or stand absolutely excommunicated. Exasperated at this insolent attempt, Henry summoned Anselm to appear in the king's court. He obeyed; and was commanded instantly to do homage to the king, to consecrate such persons as had been nominated to vacant sees, or to depart the kingdom immediately; the king declaring, in express terms, "That no person should reside in any part of his dominions, who refused to pay the allegiance due to a sovereign." But Anselm despised the threats of royalty; and with the resolution of a man conscious of his power, told the court, "That he was not to be intimidated from doing his duty; that he should immediately retire to Canterbury, where he should continue to exercise his archiepiscopal functions, and wait the issue with resignation and tranquillity." As Henry was determined not to part with so valuable a branch of his prerogative, and the prelate not to recede from the cause he had undertaken, there remained no hopes of an accommodation. At last it was agreed by both parties, to send a deputation to Rome, in order to lay the whole dispute before his holiness; and that in the mean time the bishops and abbots should continue to exercise the functions of their respective offices.

A.D. 1105. Robert, though a brave and generous prince, was incapable of governing his own dominions. Abandoned alternately to devotion and dissolute pleasures, the affairs of his duchy were neglected; his subjects became a prey to the avidity of his officers; and rapine and injustice ranged at large over the dominions of Normandy. The mildness of his disposition gave a boldness to depredation, and his indolence a tacit sanction to outrage. The complaints of the people were uttered in vain; nothing could rouse Robert from the couch of superstitious inattention. Neglected by their own prince, and subject to the continual insults of rapine and violence, the Normans applied to Henry for redress. That prince listened with pleasure to their complaints; but not having even the shadow of a pretence to justify a rupture with his brother, he contented himself with writing a letter to Robert, in which he represented, in the strongest terms, the enormity of his conduct in not redressing the grievances of his subjects, and securing their properties from the hand of the spoiler. He intreated him, in the most pressing manner, to resume the conduct of a prince, and to act in such a manner as might acquire him the glorious title of being the father of his people. He added, that he thought it his duty as his brother, and the relation he bore to the inhabitants of Normandy, to use every means in his power to redress their grievances; and if, contrary to his wishes, this epistle produced no effect, his brother must not think it strange if he himself espoused the cause of the oppressed Normans, should they apply to him as their protector.

This letter soon produced the intended effect. The hopes of assistance animated the Normans, their complaints against the government increased to an amazing height. Robert was alarmed, and applied himself to remove the complaints of his people; but it was now too late. Henry had raised a storm which threatened destruction to his brother's authority. His letter had inflamed the minds of the people; they formed themselves into parties against the government; and the nobility joined in a request to Henry, begging he would take a distressed province under his protection.

Henry had now obtained the secret purpose of his soul, and soon after passed over into Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. The nobility flocked to his camp; but the season being too far advanced before his troops were ready to take the field, Henry did not think it prudent to begin hostilities. Many of the Norman and English barons now feared the consequences that might attend an open rupture between the two brothers, and laboured assiduously to bring about a reconciliation between them. Robert accordingly paid Henry a visit, and, by the interposition of their nobles, their disputes seemed to be amicably terminated. But before Henry passed over into England, he seized the strong towns of Bayeux and Caen, belonging to Robert, in defiance of the laws of nature and nations, and garrisoned them with English troops.

A.D. 1106. Robert, astonished at this act of hostility, passed over into England; and, with great mildness, though with a resolution becoming an injured prince, expostulated with his brother on his late conduct in Normandy. He displayed the injustice of the action in its proper colours, and peremptorily demanded the restitution of the towns he had seized, contrary to every law, both human and divine. Henry absolutely refused to make any restitution; he even treated the remonstrances of his brother with contempt. Convinced that nothing could be obtained by negotiation, and that war alone must decide the controversy, Robert returned to Normandy, and determined to defend his territories to the last extremity.

Had his own commanders behaved faithfully, and exerted themselves, in defence of their country, in any degree equal to their master, Henry would, in all probability, have fallen into the hands of his brother; but, through the cowardice of one of their generals, the Norman army was defeated, and Robert himself, with several of his nobles, and Edgar Atheling, were taken prisoners. Henry reduced the whole duchy to obedience, and returned, with his captives, in triumph, to England. Edgar Atheling was set at liberty, with a trifling pension; and lived to a good old age, neglected and forgotten. But Robert was committed, a close prisoner, to Cardiff-castle, where he continued till he paid the debt of nature, which did not happen till twenty-seven years after his defeat. The example of this intrepid duke of Normandy affords a convincing proof, that a prince endowed with a large share of good nature and affability, without wisdom and discernment, is incapable of holding the reins of government, so as to acquire either honour to himself, or happiness to his people.

A.D. 1107. The deputies were now returned from Rome, charged with a fulminating letter against the king, for his assuming the right of investitures. "Because," said the pontiff, "Christ is called the door, therefore all ecclesiastics must enter into the church through Christ alone; not through any profane layman, however great in temporal power." This species of reasoning was far from convincing Henry; he treated it with the contempt it deserved. But he feared the power of the pontiff, and was desirous desirous of avoiding an embarrassing dispute with his clergy. He, therefore, suppressed the pope's letter; and prevailed on the bishops, who had attended the Roman council, to declare, that the pontiff did not disapprove of his granting benefices, though he did not chuse to declare his opinion in writing. Anselm, who was acquainted with every thing that had passed at Rome, supported the cause he had undertaken with firmness and resolution. He not only refused to consecrate some new bishops, who had received investiture from the king, but also to communicate with them. Henry was irritated to the greatest degree; and the prelate, to avoid the storm, retired to Rome. The people were alarmed at the departure of their archbishop; they dreaded the consequences of an excommunication; and remembered with terror all the horrid scenes exhibited in Germany, in consequence of an anathema fulminated by the Roman pontiff against the emperors Henry IV. and V. They already saw, in imagination, the flames of dissention and discord lighted up in their own country, by the dreadful torch of religious fury. Henry himself was desirous of avoiding the consequences, and dispatched an ambassador to Rome, who told Paschal, that his master would sooner lose his crown than part with the right of granting investitures. "And I," replied Paschal, "would rather lose my head than allow him to retain it." Every thing indicated a rupture between Henry and the pope; but the former not chusing to see his country wasted by the unrelenting hand of religious bigotry, wisely gave up the claim of investitures, and the pope consented to his exacting from bishops the homage they owed him as temporal peers. An accommodation having thus taken place between Henry and the church, Anselm was re-established in his archiepiscopal chair.

A. D. 1109. During this interval of public tranquillity, ambassadors arrived from Henry IV. emperor of Germany, to demand Matilda, Henry's daughter, in marriage; and the terms of the treaty were adjusted in the presence of the council. Soon after this transaction, the famous Anselm paid the debt of nature and was universally regretted by the clergy. He was a prelate of great learning, considering the age in which he lived; but so ambitious, haughty, and bigotted, that he destroyed the peace of the church, which it was his duty to preserve. Power, and not piety, was the end he wished to attain. He sacrificed internal purity to external magnificence; and preferred the shadow to the substance of religion.

A. D. 1116. Though Henry had, for some time, been master of his brother's territories, he found it very difficult to defend his usurpation. He was frequently involved in wars; and found it often necessary to cross the sea, in order to stop the inroads of the neighbouring princes and discontented barons. William, the son of duke Robert, a prince of the greatest hopes, had fled to the court of Anjou for protection; and the justice of his cause, with the unnatural cruelty of his uncle, exciting in the breasts of the neighbouring princes a detestation of Henry's proceedings, they resolved to reinstate him in the dominions of his father. Lewis the Gros, king of France, was at the head of this association. That prince, as sovereign lord of Normandy, had granted William investiture of all the territories of duke Robert; and resolved, in conjunction with the rest of the confederates, to support him in his just rights against all the power of the usurper. Henry was now sufficiently alarmed, and crossed over into Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. But the season was too far advanced for any military operations of consequence to take place; and the two armies, after a few skirmishes of no consequence, retired into winter quarters.

A. D. 1119. The two preceding campaigns were spent to very little purpose. Henry was obliged to act on the defensive, and the allied army made but a slow progress in reducing the fortified towns of Normandy. But having gained over the earl of Anjou to his party, Henry was now able to meet the enemy in the open field. The two armies met in the plain of Brenneville, where a bloody battle ensued. William, at the head of a chosen body of troops, attacked the van of Henry's army with such impetuosity, that he broke their ranks, and penetrated to the main body, where the king of England commanded in person. But Henry maintained his ground with surprising coolness and presence of mind; he rode from rank to rank, encouraging those who stood firm, and rallying the squadrons which had been broken by the intrepid attack of the young Norman prince. The engagement now became general; and while Henry was employed in leading his troops against the enemy, he was in the utmost danger of falling a victim to one of those chances so frequent in war, by which the monarch and the private soldier, the coward and the brave, are equally exposed. William de Crispin, a Norman knight, celebrated at once for his strength and intrepidity, cut his way to the spot where Henry, regardless of his own safety, fought in person. Pleased with the glorious opportunity of gaining the victory by a single blow, Crispin fell, with the utmost fury, on the king of England, and gave him two such violent blows on the head, that the blood gushed out from his mouth and ears, and he seemed, for a moment, to have lost his senses. Crispin perceived his advantage, and was just going to strike a third blow, when Henry, with surprising resolution, struck his adversary with so much fury, that he fell headlong from his horse, and was taken prisoner.

This personal bravery of Henry had no other effect than defeating the intention of the Norman knight: the battle raged with the utmost fury, and Fortune seemed inclined to give the palm of victory to the French and Norman army. Henry himself began to tremble for the consequences. In this alarming crisis, the English, who formed the rear of the army, advanced, and charged the enemy with so much fury, that, unable to sustain the shock, they gave way, and fled with the utmost precipitation. All attempts to rally them were in vain. Lewis himself was hurried away with the torrent, thrown from his horse, and escaped by the assistance of a peasant, who conducted him from this dreadful scene of confusion, through woods and bye-paths, to the castle of Andeli.

Lewis, notwithstanding his late defeat, was soon able to take the field against the enemy; and a second battle, more furious than the first, ensued, in which both claimed the victory, and, perhaps, with equal reason. The French monarch now perceived that it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to restore the young prince to the dominions of his father by force of arms; and therefore applied to the council of Rheims, assembled by pope Calixtus II. flattering himself with being able to turn the thunder of the church against the English monarch. Aware of the danger, Henry took the most prudent method to divert the storm. He sent large presents to the pontiff, and brought over Calixtus to his interest; so that all the attempts of Lewis were rendered abortive. The pope declared himself satisfied with the reasons Henry had offered for his conduct, and dissolved the assembly. A peace was, soon after, concluded between the contending monarchs, and Henry was permitted to keep possession of Normandy.

A. D. 1120. But the success of Henry was greatly overbalanced by a domestic misfortune, which embittered the remainder of his life. William, his only son, who had been recognized as his successor in a general council of the nation, and attended him into Normandy, was now on his return, with his father, to England. The ship in which the prince embarked was, by some accident, detained several hours after the rest of the fleet; and the interval being spent in drinking, neither the master, nor any of the seamen, were capable of carrying the ship out of the harbour. They ran her upon a sunken rock, where she immediately foundered. All was now a scene of hurry and confusion: the boats were hoisted out, and every one endeavoured to provide for his own safety. The prince, with a considerable number of his companions, leaped into the long-boat, and, with great difficulty, got clear of the ship. But hearing the cries of Matilda, his natural sister, who had been left in the general confusion, he ordered the seamen to row back to the ship, and, if possible, save her life. He never considered, that in such distracting incidents, all respect for persons is lost, and self-preservation the only principle that then fills the human breast. Fatal experience convinced him of his error. They no sooner reached the side of the ship, than such numbers jumped into the boat, that they sunk, and every soul perished. No less than one hundred and forty young noblemen lost their lives by this dreadful accident. The king was inconsolable for the loss of his son: he endeavoured to conceal his grief, but without success: he never got the better of his misfortune; a cloud of melancholy spread over his countenance, and the loss of his son hung heavy on his heart.

A. D. 1121. Desirous, however, of having an heir to succeed him in the throne, Henry, who had, some years since, lost his amiable queen Matilda, married Adela, daughter to the duke of Louvain, a young lady amiable at once for her beauty and accomplishments. But the hopes both of the king and the nation were disappointed; Adela brought Henry no child.

A. D. 1127. Disappointed in having a son to succeed him on the throne, Henry was desirous of securing the crown for his daughter Matilda, who had lately lost her consort, Henry V. emperor of Germany, and was now returned to her father's court. He accordingly summoned a meeting of the states at Windsor, where it was unanimously agreed to acknowledge the empress Maud, or Matilda, as queen of England, in case Henry died without male issue. The English beheld that princess with affection, as she was descended, on her mother's side, from the ancient race of their Saxon kings, whose memories they revered.

A. D. 1128. But Henry was not satisfied with this acquisition; he was also desirous of securing to her the duchy of Normandy. Accordingly he married her to Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Fulk, earl of Anjou. By this political stratagem, he effectually detached Fulk from William, son to duke Robert, and all the allies of that unfortunate prince. But this step, which was taken without the advice of his barons, was extremely disagreeable to the English; and Henry had reason to dread the effects of their resentment. The young duke of Normandy, whom Lewis the Gros had put in possession of Flanders, considered this as a proper opportunity for re-commencing the war, and wresting his hereditary dominions out of the hands of the English monarch; but before he could carry his designs into execution, he was killed in a battle with the landgrave of Alsace. By the death of this young prince, Henry became the undisputed heir to the duchy of Normandy, Robert having no other legitimate issue.

A. D. 1129. Henry had now surmounted all opposition, and a series of profound tranquillity succeeded the boisterous seasons of war and devastation.

The loss of his son, which still oppressed his spirits, had tended greatly to convince him of the vanity of human enjoyments. He saw the folly of grasping at power, that eludes the touch; and of labouring to secure enjoyments as fleeting as the morning cloud. The milder sentiments of mercy and forgiveness succeeded to those of fury and resentment, which had so long filled his breast, and proved a continual source of uneasiness. He extended his pardon to all who implored it; and attached to his interest, by acts of kindness and generosity, several persons of great influence and power; but not a single ray of pity was extended to his brother Robert, who was still a prisoner in Cardiff-castle.

A. D. 1135. Henry often visited his Norman dominions, and enjoyed the pleasure of being present at the birth of several of his daughter's children. While he continued in that country, which seemed the favourite place of his residence, he received advice that the Welsh had renewed their incursions. Exasperated at the behaviour of that restless people, Henry resolved to pass over into England, and chastise the invaders; but before he could embark, death put a final period to all his undertakings. He died at the castle of Lyons, near Rouen, on the first of December, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-sixth of his reign. His brother Robert had paid the debt of nature about ten months before him, in the castle of Cardiff.

The character of Henry exhibits a series of inconsistencies, which too often fall to the portion of frail humanity. He possessed many valuable qualities, but they were sullied by a greater number of faults. His behaviour to his brother and nephew have thrown such a stain upon his memory, as all his good actions can never obliterate. The bands of fraternal affection were separated by the sword of ambition; and the laws of justice, of humanity, of nature, and of nations, were sacrificed at the shrine of unnatural usurpation. At the same time, it must be acknowledged, that the wisdom and vigour of his administration procured to the distressed Normans that tranquillity, happiness, and safety, which they had so long solicited in vain. Like all his predecessors of the Norman race, he was jealous of every encroachment on his power; but he relieved his subjects from several oppressive grievances, under which they had long laboured, and from which they had often petitioned to be relieved. He protected, by his power, the liberties of England; and guarded, by his address, against the insolent usurpations of the Roman pontiff. He was severe in the execution of justice; the licentiousness of the times rendered it necessary. He was an implacable enemy to extortion; the officer who made use of oppression was sure to feel the whole weight of his anger. If he often broke some of the articles in his charter, it should be remembered, that he was the first of the Norman race that made any contract with the people; and that the charter of Henry formed the basis of English liberty. Learning and learned men were not common in these times of superstitious ignorance: Henry cultivated the one, and encouraged the other. He obtained the surname of Beauclerc, or the fine scholar, from the progress he had made in the sciences; which, considering the bigotry and barbarity of the age, was not contemptible. If, therefore, the vices of Henry have fixed an eternal stain upon his memory, his virtues were of the utmost service to his country.

A. D. NO prince ever took more pains to secure the crown to his family, with so little effect, as Henry. His conduct affords a striking example of the vanity of human foresight. Stephen, earl of Boulogne, son of Adela, one of the daughters of William the conqueror, was the first among the favourites of Henry. He had bestowed upon him several large estates in England. But gratitude was not in the catalogue of Stephen's virtues. He had sworn eventual fealty to the empress Maud; the remembrance of his oath was buried in the grave with Henry; and persuaded that riches and intrigue were sufficient to over-balance the claim of that prince, he hastened to England to seize, by usurpation, the crown which had adorned the brow of his patron. Stephen's younger brother had been bred in the monastery of Augny, and the late monarch had made him abbot of Glastonbury and bishop of Winchester. He was of an active and turbulent disposition; bold, dissimbling, and faithless; ready to adapt himself to the circumstances of the times, and always preferred his own interest to that of his country: even fraternal affection had little weight with this dignified ecclesiastic. By a pleasing address and fluency of speech, he had gained the esteem and admiration of an ignorant populace: while his frank and familiar address procured him an unbounded influence over the clergy. The bishop of Salisbury was also a person of great abilities, great riches, and great influence with the people. These two prelates were the principal supporters of Stephen's pretensions. On his arrival in London, he was received with open arms by the citizens, and the two prelates in his interest insisted on the primate's placing the crown upon his head. The archbishop, who with them, had sworn fealty to Maud, refused to perform the ceremony. Artifice was therefore necessary to gain him over to his interest; and these conscientious prelates had recourse to perjury. Hugh Bigod, steward of the household, made oath before the primate, that Henry on his death-bed, had expressed his intention of placing Stephen on the English throne, in preference to his daughter. This oath removed all the scruples of the archbishop, and Stephen was crowned with the usual ceremonies.

That prince was not to learn that riches are the genuine source of power; and that partisans to any cause are easily procured by bribes and promises. The first act of his reign therefore was to seize the late king's treasures, which amounted to one hundred thousand pounds, an enormous sum in those days. By a proper distribution of this money, he gained over to his interest many of the indigent nobility, and still more of the indigent soldiery. The people, who were more guided by superstition, than by the principles of reason or equity, considered Stephen as their lawful sovereign; the religious ceremony of the coronation had removed every suspicion; and silenced every doubt that arose in the mind. It was impossible, they thought, for the head of the church to be mistaken; whoever he anointed must be the undoubted heir to the crown of England.

But it was not enough that the populace were gained over to the interest of Stephen, it was also necessary to prevail on the more thinking part of the nation, the nobles and the clergy, to embrace the same sentiments. He passed a charter, whereby he promised many advantages to the clergy, particularly, that on the demise of a bishop he would instantly give the investiture to the person appointed by a regular canonical election. He promised the nobility that they should not be prosecuted for taking the diversion of hunting in the royal forests; and to the people, that the tax of Danegeld should be abolished, that the laws of Edward should be restored, and executed in their full extent. These flattering acts were the artifices of his ambition; the stratagems by which he fixed the crown of England on his head.

But Stephen found the English noblemen were determined to oblige him to keep his promises, and not like his predecessors, break them as soon as he was firmly fixed in the seat of power. Robert, earl of Gloucester, a natural son of the deceased monarch, led the way to these necessary resolutions. He was determined to support the cause of his sister; but the power of Stephen rendered it necessary for him to conceal his design. He accordingly swore allegiance to Stephen, but with this reserve, that he should not invade any of his rights or dignities. Stephen saw the full force of this reserve, but the great influence of that popular nobleman, rendered it necessary to receive him upon these terms. The clergy, pleased with the cautious reserve of Gloucester, annexed conditions to their oath of allegiance: they declared that it should be binding no longer than while he defended the ecclesiastical liberties of England, and supported the discipline of the church. The barons were determined not to be wanting to themselves in this fortunate crisis, when the sceptre trembled in the hand of an usurper. Accordingly they required, in return for their submission, the liberty of fortifying and putting their own castles in a posture of defence. By this step the tranquillity of the nation was sacrificed to the ambition of the nobles. These were long the source of civil discord, and often filled the kingdom with blood and slaughter.

A. D. 1137. The licentious designs of the nobles were soon apparent. Many of them had no sooner finished the fortifications of their castles, than they renounced their allegiance, and set the power of the crown at defiance. Stephen saw his error, but it was now too late to correct it. The disorder spread every day, and threatened the kingdom with the most destructive consequences. The oaths they had taken were renounced or forgotten: power only was the idol worshipped by the nobles. It was in vain to attempt the removing of these enormities by reason or persuasions; Stephen therefore made his own power the sole measure of his conduct. He sacrificed to the rage of despotic government, both his own concessions, and the ancient privileges of his subjects. His authority was chiefly supported by mercenary soldiers, who, having exhausted the royal treasury, subsisted by depredations. Stephen, however, found means to procure the duchy of Normandy, as well as the sceptre of England. His eldest son did homage for that province to Louis the younger, king of France, and received his daughter in marriage. The count of Blois, and even Geoffrey, count of Anjou, resigned their pretensions to that duchy, in exchange for pensions. Normandy and England were governed by an usurper.

A. D. 1138. But this acquisition of power increased the disturbances in England. The people were exasperated at the government: they were now desirous of hurling from the throne a prince they had so lately considered as their protector. The duke of Gloucester perceived the general defection of the people, and displayed the standard of rebellion. His interest was supported by David, king of Scotland, who entered England at the head of a powerful army, and penetrated as far as Northallerton, in Yorkshire.

Several

Several of the English barons, who still continued firm in their allegiance, entered into an association to give battle to the northern invaders, and deliver their country from the dreadful ravages of the enemy, or perish in the noble attempt. They erected upon a wheel-carriage the mast of a small ship, on the top of which was a silver crucifix; and the pole decorated with the ensigns of St. Peter, St. John of Beverly, and St. Wilfred.

The English surrounded this superstitious ensign in a close compacted body; and to break the first shock of the enemy, the front was composed of pikemen and archers intermixed. The attack was begun by the Galloway men, who formed the van of the Scottish army, with all the fury so natural to their character. But their efforts were in vain; the English stood firm, and plied them so incessantly with their arrows, and other missiles, that they were put to flight. The prince of Scotland now advanced, at the head of a chosen body of knights and archers, and attacked the English with so much impetuosity, that they gave way, and he pierced to the rear-guard; but not being properly supported by his followers, he was in the utmost danger of being taken prisoner; and escaped by throwing away his badge of distinction, and mixing with the English; where he remained undiscovered till the battle was over, and then made his escape. The other part of the Scottish army, by a false report that their king was slain, were seized with a panic; and David himself, after exerting in vain his utmost power to rally them, was hurried away with the torrent, and obliged to retreat to Carlisle, where he was afterwards joined by his son, and great part of his army.

This engagement, known by the appellation of the battle of the standard, might have been fatal to the interest of Maud and her brother, had Stephen known how to profit by his victory. But flattering himself that he had now secured the peaceable possession of the throne, he set no bounds to his ambition. Success rendered him confident: he engaged in a controversy with his clergy, to whom he was indebted for the crown, and to whose authority he could not be a stranger. Stephen had for some time determined to correct the error he had committed, in permitting the nobility to fortify their castles. The evil was every day increasing, and the monarch perceived that the kingdom was garrisoned against himself. The bishops, in imitation of the temporal lords, had erected castles on their estates; and Stephen determined to begin his intended reformation by attacking the strong holds of the clergy. Accordingly he seized the bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln, and obliged them, by menaces, to deliver up their castles.

A.D. 1139. Exasperated at the attempt of his brother to infringe the privileges of the church, Henry, bishop of Winchester, who had lately been invested with the legantine authority, convoked a synod at Winchester, and summoned Stephen to appear in person. The king, who despised the hypocritical pretences to sanctity, whereby the ecclesiastics imposed upon the credulity of the people, refused to obey the summons. He, however, sent one Aubery de Vere, the most learned lawyer of his age, who justified the king's proceedings with great eloquence and force of argument. He observed, that the followers of the meek and humble Jesus could not, with the least pretence to propriety, endeavour to oppose their sovereign with the arm of flesh: that it was irreconcilable with their functions as the preachers of peace, to engage in the tumults of civil discord; and that the castles they had fortified could be considered in no other light than the sanctuaries of discord, and the asylums of rebellion. The legate lost all patience at this bold remonstrance; and he was just going to pronounce an ecclesiastical anathema on the king, and all his adherents; when Aubery gave him to understand, that whoever dared to pronounce any spiritual interdiction against him and their sovereign, should never live to behold the fruits of his insolence. This spirited declaration had more effect than all his reasoning. Astonished at the boldness of the deputy, and dreading the consequences of Stephen's resentment, the synod did not think it prudent to proceed. The prelates departed; and the two complaining bishops were obliged to part with their castles.

The empress Maud considered the differences that subsisted between Stephen and the church as a very fortunate circumstance, and determined to turn it to her own advantage. She ventured to come over to England, attended by her brother the earl of Gloucester. Their whole retinue, however, consisted of no more than an hundred and forty men; a force that could give no alarm to Stephen. But the earl of Gloucester was himself an army. He was the idol of the people, who were desirous of fighting under his banners, and driving from the throne a prince who had forfeited, by his actions, every claim to sincerity. The empress repaired to Arundel castle, where she was affectionately received by the queen dowager, who resided in that fortress. The earl of Gloucester retired to Bristol, a great number of his friends residing in the neighbourhood of that city.

Stephen was alarmed at the arrival of the empress and her brother. He feared the popularity of Gloucester, and that the nation would join his standard, in order to place his sister on the throne of her ancestors. He advanced immediately to Arundel castle, at the head of a considerable body of forces, in order to make himself master of that fortress. The queen dowager was alarmed at the approach of Stephen; and dispatched a messenger, requesting that he would not besiege the empress in her palace, but give her liberty to retire to some other place; assuring him, that she had received her as a guest only, not as a competitor for the crown; and flattered herself, that she should not be compelled to violate the rights of hospitality. Stephen very readily complied with her request; and the empress naming Bristol as the place she chose for her residence, the king ordered his brother Walleran, earl of Mellent, to escort her to that city.

On her arrival at Bristol, she openly declared her title, and asserted her claim to the crown of England. The people flocked to her standard; and Miles, high constable of England, having recognized her title, carried her to the castle of Gloucester, which he had prepared for her reception.

A.D. 1140. The whole kingdom now became a scene of anarchy and confusion; almost every individual declaring for one or other of the contending parties; some swayed by affection, and others by interest. The powerful barons attacked each other's territories with all the rage of the most implacable enemy. Castles, churches, monasteries, towns and villages, were every day levelled to the ground, or laid in ashes, to gratify the private animosity of contending nobles. The most inhuman cruelties were practised on the innocent inhabitants, whose only crime consisted in their weakness. It must, however, be acknowledged, that these horrid attempts received no countenance, either from Stephen or the earl of Gloucester; they saw with concern the miseries of the people, and exerted all their force to terminate this scene of destruction, and bring the ferocious barons to a sense of their shocking enormities.

A.D. 1141. Several negotiations were begun, but soon rendered abortive; and the horrors of a civil war continued to increase. All hopes of peace were now abandoned, and both parties proposed to decide the important controversy by a decisive action. But the siege of the castle of Lincoln being undertaken by Stephen, precipitated these measures, by bringing on a battle between the two armies much sooner than was expected. That castle was considered as a place of the utmost importance; and Gloucester

Gloucester determined, if possible, to relieve it. Accordingly he marched with the utmost expedition, and his troops having forded the Trent, appeared in the neighbourhood before Stephen had received any information of his approach. A general engagement was now irretrievable, and both armies prepared for a contest that was to decide the fate of the crown of England. The battle was begun by William de Ypres, one of Stephen's generals, and considered as the best general of his age. He fell with the utmost fury on a body of Welsh posted in the left wing, and put them to flight; but pursuing the broken Squadron too far, his division was charged in flank, and entirely broken. The earl of Gloucester, taking advantage of this success, fell with amazing impetuosity on the infantry, which composed the center of the royal army, where Stephen himself fought in person. The contest was dreadful; the field was covered with the slain; but Stephen's infantry, being deserted by the horse, were obliged to retreat. Stephen himself, disdaining to turn his back to the enemy, disputed every inch of ground against an amazing superiority. At last, he was felled to the ground by a stone thrown by an unknown hand, and obliged to surrender himself prisoner to the earl of Gloucester. He was treated with the greatest respect by that accomplished nobleman; but he experienced a humiliating reverse of fortune, on his being delivered into the hands of the empress. That imperious princess treated him with every indignity, committed him a close prisoner to the castle of Bristol, and loaded him with chains like a common malefactor.

The friends of Stephen deserted him on this reverse of fortune; the city of London, and the county of Kent, where his queen Matilda, his son Eustace, and his friend William de Ypres, still retained their authority, were the only places that continued faithful to the imprisoned monarch. Even his brother, the bishop of Winchester, courted the favour of the empress: the attractions of power were stronger than the bonds of fraternal affection. Henry declared for Maud, who, in return, promised him all the honours his ambition could desire, or which a churchman could receive. Armed with the legantine authority, and proud of displaying his power, Henry summoned a synod, and after asserting that the clergy were intrusted by heaven with the right of electing and ordaining kings, he declared that it was the will of the Most High, that the empress Maud should be placed on the throne of England. The only laymen summoned to this council were the deputies of London. Their presence alarmed the legate; for they were so far from agreeing with the unexpected declaration of Henry, that they peremptorily demanded the liberty of their king. The legate only answered, by recapitulating the errors of Stephen's administration. "He connived," said the prelate, "at the licentious behaviour of all men; so that virtue and peace abandoned this country, and tyranny and oppression filled their seats: bishops have been imprisoned contrary to law; abbeys have been put up to sale; and churches and convents plundered of their treasures tho' devoted to the sacred purposes of religion. For these and other offences, heaven itself has visibly interposed, and wrested the sceptre from the hand of my brother; and this assembly have unanimously agreed to present it to the empress Maud, to whom it of right belongs." Astonished at the insolence and wickedness of the legate, the deputies, after solemnly protesting against the proceedings of the synod, returned to London; and Henry pronounced an anathema against all the adherents of the imprisoned monarch. Thus was the sceptre of England disposed of by an assembly of ambitious churchmen, who dared to trample upon the authority of the nobles, and despised the liberties of the people. The power of the mitre was exalted above the power of the crown: and the rights of Englishmen sacrificed at the shrine of ecclesiastical tyranny.

Had Maud still suffered herself to be guided by the counsels of the earl of Gloucester; she had enjoyed, during her life, the crown of her father: but pride and insolence, the two capital features in her character, soon rendered all his attempts abortive. Beloved by the people for his virtues, and feared for his valour, that accomplished nobleman found means to procure a majority in the magistracy of London in favour of his sister, and she was received into the capital with great demonstrations of joy. The ceremony of the coronation only was now wanting to constitute Maud the sovereign of England: but that impotence of mind which prosperity alone discovers, delayed the solemnity and hurled her from the throne. Haughty and contemptuous by nature, and obstinate from power, she formed the ridiculous opinion, that no human being had a right to examine her actions; and resolving to shew her independence, she determined to refuse every petition. Neither the soft whippers of humanity, assisted by the powerful intercessions of the earl of Gloucester, could prevail over the obstinacy of her soul; she persevered in her resolution, till she lost the affections of her people. The city of London requested her either to mitigate the severity of the Norman laws, or restore those of Edward the confessor. But she was deaf to their petition; even the remonstrances of Gloucester, who placed in a proper light the madness of such proceedings, were urged in vain: she looked upon all advice as an insult on her understanding.

Gloucester saw with grief the inflexibility of his sister, and trembled for the consequence. The citizens were at once incensed and alarmed. They complained loudly of the tyranny of the empress, and the people caught the infection from the capital. The Londoners entered into a conspiracy to seize her person. The earl of Gloucester was apprized of the assassination, and used every method in his power to soothe the citizens, and fix them in the interests of his sister; but his attempts were in vain; they conceived so deep a detestation of her insolent behaviour, that all the endeavours of that popular nobleman could not erase. He was greatly affected at this reverse of sentiments; he perceived the gathering storm that threatened the empress and her whole party with destruction, and prudently withdrew with Maud and her friends to Oxford. They had hardly left the city, when the populace assaulted the palace of the empress, and stripped it of all its rich furniture.

The legate saw this reverse of fortune, and again embraced the party of his brother. The allegiance he had sworn to the empress was forgotten: his oaths were not proof against interest. He, however, resolved to conceal his sentiments, but fortified his castle at Winchester, and furnished it with provisions and military stores. Maud was no stranger to the real sentiments of the legate, but resolved to practise the dissimulation of the churchman. She advanced at the head of her troops, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Winchester. Orders were immediately dispatched to Henry, commanding his attendance at a council the empress had summoned to meet in her camp. The legate saw the snare, and escaped through a postern gate; but the castle fell into the hands of the empress. Henry fled to London, joined Eustace and William de Ypres, and openly declared in favour of Stephen. A respectable body of forces were soon raised, and the legate, attended by his associates, marched to Winchester with such expedition, that the empress and her friends had hardly time to shut themselves up in the castle before it was invested by the enemy.

Henry had furnished the fortrels with such a stock of provisions that the besieged held out seven weeks, and every attempt to take it by assault was rendered abortive by the valour and conduct of the earl of Gloucester. But famine at length effected what force had attempted in vain; the garrison had but one alternative, either to cut themselves a passage through the legate's forces, or surrender at discretion. They chose the former, and made the necessary preparations parations for the desperate attempt. The care of the person of the empress was committed to the main body of their forces; while Gloucester himself, at the head of two hundred followers, sallied out of the castle, and attacked the besiegers with the utmost fury. Alarmed at the vigour of this party of the besieged, the legate's army left their posts to repulse so formidable a band of desperate assailants. The expected opportunity now offered; and the empress, attended by the principal part of the army, made her escape. She fled to Gloucester, where she was joined by Miles, who had long served her with great fidelity.

But though the empress escaped by the noble efforts of the earl of Gloucester, his valour proved fatal to his liberty. He was taken prisoner, and sent to the castle of Rochester. The empress, sensible that every hope of success depended on the valour and abilities of her brother, consented to exchange Stephen for him.

The legate now summoned a synod of the clergy, and endeavoured to vindicate his conduct with regard to his brother; but even the clergy seemed not affected by his harangue. The legantine power, indeed, with which he was invested, commanded their silence; they feared the anger of the pope more than the anger of heaven. But a lay-deputy from the empress nobly undertook what a dastardly clergy had refused. He entered a protest against the legate's proceedings; accused him of complicated perjury; affirmed, that the landing of the empress in England was owing to his repeated invitations; and the cruel treatment his brother had met with, was in consequence of his pernicious advice. He concluded with charging him, on the faith he had sworn to the empress as his sovereign, not to do any thing in that assembly against her title and dignity. The legate answered only by a profound silence; conscious guilt, or a policy beyond the depth of common comprehension, effectually sealed his lips. He, however, recollected himself sufficiently to pronounce the sentence of excommunication against the counts of Anjou, and all her adherents. The whole assembly were struck with surprize and indignation: they could not hear, without horror, ecclesiastical censures, so directly opposite in their tendency, pronounced, without any other reason than that of satisfying his own pride and malevolence. This was, however, the last time he exerted this authority. Pope Celestine II. on his accession to the papal chair, deprived him of the legantine power, and bestowed it on Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1142. The sword of civil discord was now once more unsheathed, and threatened to spread destruction over this unhappy country. But Gloucester soon perceived the alarming effects of his sister's unseasonable pride and obstinacy. Her party was considerably decreased in numbers, and even many of her powerful friends had forsok her standard. He saw that she could now never hope to ascend the throne by the suffrages of the English, and feared it was too late to recover the popularity she had lost through her own haughtiness. He, however, determined to persevere in the cause he had undertaken, till death, or a decisive victory, put an end to the contest. A council of Maud's principal friends was summoned at the Devises, where it was resolved to solicit a foreign assistance; and Gloucester was dispatched to the continent to engage Geoffrey of Anjou to land in England at the head of his forces.

Stephen exerted all his abilities to profit by this defection of Maud's friends, and the absence of the earl of Gloucester. The empress had no army capable of meeting the enemy in the open field, and was obliged to elude the forces of Stephen by retreating from one castle to another. At last she retired to Oxford, then one of the strongest fortresses in the kingdom, and determined there to wait the arrival of the succours from her husband. Stephen immediately made himself master of the city, and laid close siege to the castle.

Gloucester could not prevail upon the earl of Anjou to pass over into England at the head of his forces: all he could obtain was a reinforcement of four hundred men, under the command of Henry, his eldest son. With this small body of troops the earl of Gloucester landed in Dorsetshire, and immediately laid siege to Wareham castle, in order to induce Stephen to abandon Oxford; but that prince was not to be diverted from his purpose. The arrival of Gloucester, and the young prince Henry, greatly lessened his army: the troops under his command deserted in such numbers, that some of the avenues to the castle were left open. Maud determined to seize this favourable opportunity of making her escape: It was now the depth of winter, the ground covered with snow, and the waters of the river entirely frozen. Encouraged by these favourable circumstances, she dressed herself, and all her attendants, in white, in order to prevent their being seen by the centinels; crossed the river on the ice, and walked on foot above six miles to Abingdon, the snow driving all the way full in their faces. The castle of Oxford surrendered the next morning to Stephen, who was sufficiently mortified in finding all the fruits of his labours snatched from him at the very time when he thought himself sure of success. The empress retired the next day to Wallingford, where she was joined by her brother, and the young prince her son. The sight of this object of her affections excited the full force of parental tenderness; and she forgot, for a moment, all her afflictions, and all her fears.

A. D. 1147. From the time of the escape of the empress from Oxford, nothing material happened between the two contending parties; a few castles were taken, and some skirmishes happened between detachments from each army, but nothing decisive. This year was, however, marked with an event of the utmost consequence to the empress. The earl of Gloucester, the principal support of her cause, died of a fever, and was buried at Bristol. In this accomplished nobleman, the empress lost the only person that deserved her entire confidence, perhaps the only one that served her without views of interest. He was prudent, intrepid, generous and sincere; an enemy to tyranny, an enemy to injustice, an enemy to deceit. He was beloved by his friends, beloved by his soldiers, beloved by his country. His death was lamented by the good and the virtuous, and even Stephen himself dropped a tear of respect to his memory.

The death of this gallant nobleman gave a mortal blow to the party of the empress. She saw it would be impossible for her to contend any longer for the crown. Her troops deserted, her friends acted with coolness, and every thing indicated a sad reverse of fortune. She wisely prevented the blow that was aimed at her liberty, by passing over to the continent, and leaving Stephen in the quiet possession of the throne.

A. D. 1150. Geoffrey Plantagenet, the husband of Maud, now perceived his end approaching; and desirous of settling the succession of his dominions on the surest foundation, invested young Henry with the honours and revenues of his dutchy. The king of France, incensed at this resignation without first obtaining his consent as sovereign lord of the fief, invaded Normandy, and laid siege to Arques. He suspected that Henry was too young to give him any great opposition; but he was mistaken: he made so powerful a diversion in France, that Lewis was obliged to raise the siege, and march to the defence of his own dominions. A peace was soon after concluded; and Lewis invested Henry with the dutchy of Normandy. Geoffrey now paid the debt of nature. Henry was left in possession of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou; and his power was soon after greatly increased by an unexpected event.

Lewis

Lewis the younger, king of France, was more scrupulous than virtuous. In one of those petty civil wars, which the feudal government in France rendered inevitable, the king's troops had set fire to the church of Vitry, and all the people who had taken sanctuary in it perished in the flames. St. Barnard, who had exerted all his abilities in preaching up a crusade against the infidels; persuaded Lewis; that the only method of expiating the crime committed by his forces, was that of going to Palestine. He listened to the voice of the ecclesiastic; took the cross, and, with his young queen, Eleanor, of Guienne, set out for the Holy Land. The hopes of certain victory drew after him a prodigious number of knights, all clothed in complete armour. It is said that they did not amount to less than seventy thousand men: He crossed the Bosphorus, and was surprized, among the rocks near Laodicea; by the sultan of Iconium, and lost the greater part of his army. He retired to Antioch, where Raymond, prince of that city, was suspected of having fallen in love with Eleanor: it is even said that she forgot all the fatigues of so painful a journey in the arms of a young Turk of exquisite beauty. Lewis, on his return, dissolved his marriage, under a pretence of consanguinity, and returned Eleanor all her large possessions. Henry, soon after, married this young heiress; and obtained the rich provinces of Guienne, Poictou, and Xaintonge, which Lewis had returned. These acquisitions rendered him the most powerful subject in France. But, according to the institutions of chivalry, all gentlemen, and even kings themselves, were desirous of receiving the honour of knighthood; a ceremony which was deemed absolutely necessary to all who were desirous of distinguishing themselves in the military profession: Henry obtained this honour from his great uncle, David, king of Scotland; and making several incursions into England, he signalized himself by his abilities and valour. His conduct gave the most flattering prospect of his future greatness, and raised the hopes of his party, so much depressed by the death of the earl of Gloucester.

Stephen had imprudently involved himself in a quarrel with the pope, at a time when his crown tottered on his brow. The holy father had, indeed, given him sufficient reason for his resentment. He had summoned a council to meet at Rheims; but instead of permitting Stephen, or even the church of England, to elect the five deputies required, the pope nominated them himself. Stephen complained loudly of this breach of national privilege; but Eugenius, who then filled the papal chair, regarded not his remonstrances. Enraged at this insult, the king refused them permission to attend; and the pontiff, in revenge for this interposition, laid the kingdom under an interdict. By this sentence all the offices of religion were suspended; the churches shut up, and the dead were not suffered to be interred in consecrated ground. An universal terror spread through the nation; and it became necessary to make submissions to the pope, in order to procure a revocation of the sentence.

A. D. 1152. The quarrel with his holiness being thus happily finished, Stephen, desirous of fixing the English sceptre in his family, attempted to procure his son Eustace to be crowned with the usual solemnities. Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, whose power was increased by the legantine authority, absolutely refused to assist at the solemnity. Incensed at this peremptory denial, Stephen ordered the archbishop to be confined; but he found means to corrupt his guards, and passed over to the continent. This flight rendered the king's attempt to secure the succession in his family abortive; it being then considered, that the archbishop of Canterbury possessed an unalienable right to crown the kings of England.

A. D. 1153. Henry was now convinced that the English were far from being satisfied with Stephen's administration, and determined to attempt the recovery of a crown which had been wrested from his family. He landed on the sixth of January, at the head of a very small body of troops; but their number was soon increased by the greater and most respectable part of the nobility in the kingdom. Stephen saw the gathering storm, and laboured assiduously to break its force. The severity of the season had no effect to lessen his ardour. He marched, at the head of his forces, to meet the duke of Normandy; but the badness of the roads so greatly retarded his progress, that Henry made himself master of several strong castles before Stephen could afford the garrisons the necessary relief. At last the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Wallingford, and made preparations for deciding, by a general action, the great contest for the English crown. But the nobles, unwilling to sheathe their swords in the bowels of their countrymen, interposed their authority: a cessation of arms was concluded; and, soon after, a general peace took place between the contending princes; by which it was stipulated, that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and Henry succeed him as lawful heir by hereditary right.

A. D. 1154. Stephen being, by this reconciliation, freed from all apprehensions of an enemy, employed himself to remove the sufferings of the people, and heal the wounds of his bleeding country. He reformed many abuses; he issued several wise and salutary edicts, and gave many striking instances of his great abilities and love of justice. In a word, he seems to have determined to devote the remainder of his days to the ease and benefit of his subjects; to pursue every method for securing their properties, protecting their persons, and diffusing through the whole kingdom universal harmony and undisturbed repose. But while he was employed in these offices of justice and humanity, death put a period to his life, on the twenty-fifth of October, in the nineteenth year of his reign.

Ambition was the ruling passion of Stephen. To gratify this darling object of his soul, he trampled on the laws of justice, and plunged an innocent people into all the horrors of civil discord. He sought happiness (where it can never be found) in swaying the sceptre of a divided people. At the same time, it must be acknowledged, that he was a prince of great fortitude, courage, activity, prudence, and generosity. He harboured not the passion of revenge, and malevolence seems to have been a stranger to his breast. He dispensed justice impartially to his subjects, and cherished the virtue of forgiveness. In a word, he was possessed of so many amiable virtues, that had he ascended the throne by the right of inheritance, and lived in happier times, he would, in all probability, have been transmitted to posterity with applause, and considered as one of the most illustrious princes of the Norman race.

The history of learning during this period is short and defective. The numerous rebellions and civil wars that desolated the kingdom, disturbed the repose of the studious, and prevented the muses from taking up their abode in Britain. The little learning that subsisted was confined to the cloister, and chiefly employed in ecclesiastical controversies, that had no other tendency than that of setting the nation in a flame, and exalting the authority of the mitre above the power of the crown; of rendering ecclesiastics independent of the laws of civil government, and of placing the observance of superstitious ceremonies above the practice of pure morality. A few, indeed, there were, who employed some part of their time in the study of history and the antiquities of their country, and to whose labours we are indebted for our knowledge of the transactions of these uncultivated ages. Like beacons dispersed on the summits of distant mountains, they have thrown a glimmering light over this night of superstitious ignorance, and faintly irradiated the gloom of Gothic barbarity. Their names, therefore, claim a place in the histories of this country, because their

their memories deserve to be handed down with applause to posterity.

Florence, a monk of Worcester, often called Florentius Baronius, composed a chronicle of the world, from the creation to the year 1118. He was never celebrated for his genius, but always considered as a careful and indefatigable historian. His style, tho' unpolished, abounds not with those absurd and gross barbarisms, which have crept into the writings of his cotemporaries. He paid the debt of nature in 1119.

Alfred, or Alured, a priest and treasurer of the college of Beverly. He appears to have been a writer of genius and abilities; but his history has suffered greatly by the hands of ignorant transcribers. He died in 1136.

Eadernus, an author of sense and gravity, was cotemporary with Alfred, and intimately connected with the famous Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury. He wrote the history of William I. William II. and Henry I. and, if we make some allowances for his being a professed advocate for the papal authority, his works may be considered as impartial. The time of his death is uncertain.

William of Malmfbury is deservedly placed at the head of all the English historians of his time. His sentiments are bold and manly; his style nervous and elegant, far superior to what might have been expected from the barbarous age in which he lived. His principal work is intituled, De Gestis Anglorum, with an appendix called Historiarum Novellæ. He was a monk, and librarian of the college of Malmfbury, in Wiltshire; and died in 1142.

Simeon of Durham composed an history of the English Transactions till the year 1129. He was both a monk, and preceptor in the convent of Durham; but the time of his death is uncertain. Leland tells us, that he distinguished himself by his indefatigable care and assiduity in collecting the monuments of English learning that had escaped the ravages of the Danes.

Henry of Huntingdon wrote an history of England in ten books, ending with the death of king Stephen. This work is very defective in method; and abounds with a number of fabulous stories, transcribed from Geoffrey of Monmouth's history. Besides this work, he wrote a continuation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History, and a chronological table of the kings of England. He was archdeacon of Huntingdon, and the time of his death is uncertain.

But the most eminent monument of the learning of these ages, is the Saxon Chronicle, which begins with the birth of Christ, and ends with the death of Stephen. It is sufficiently evident from the difference of the style, and other infallible marks, that these annals were composed by several authors; and at various periods of time. But their authenticity has never been disputed, especially with regard to the wars between the Anglo-Saxons and Britons; and has been the foundation of all our histories to the Norman conquest. Dr. Gibson, afterwards bishop of London, published at Oxford, in 1692, an accurate edition of this celebrated Chronicle, with an elegant translation.

H E N R Y II.

A.D. 1154. THE death of Stephen restored the English crown to the undoubted heir of Henry I. The king of France, though he was already alarmed at the great power of Henry, opposed not his accession to the throne of his ancestors; and the English, worn out with the miseries of civil discord, joyfully acknowledged a sovereign whom they flattered themselves would establish tranquillity in their exhausted country. Henry was received with great affection by the nobility, and crowned at Westminster on the nineteenth of December, amidst the acclamations of the people.

The English had conceived a very flattering idea of the virtues and abilities of Henry; and the first acts of his government convinced them that their opinion was founded on justice. He exerted himself to remove the complaints of his subjects, and introduce universal harmony among his people. The mercenary soldiers of Stephen were dismissed, by which the kingdom was freed from a burden that had occasioned the most affecting complaints. The bands of robbers, who had so long ravaged the country, were destroyed, and every species of violence repressed; the powerful were restrained from acts of tyranny, and the licentious from disturbing the repose of the innocent. The laws were armed with authority; none dared dispute the power of the magistrate. The fortresses raised by the nobles, who had so often spread desolation over various counties, were demolished; the coin was regulated; and the turbulent barons reduced to obedience. Henry wanted not assistance in establishing these measures of national utility; the people supported their king; he had nothing to fear from a few turbulent barons, who at first opposed the destruction of their castles. But what rendered Henry still dearer to his subjects, was his passing a charter of liberties, in which all the privileges granted by his grandfather Henry I. were confirmed, with several additional immunities. These, and other acts of popularity, endeared Henry to the English; and a perfect tranquillity reigned in every part of the kingdom.

A.D. 1156. While Henry was employed in promoting the happiness of his people, his brother Geoffrey endeavoured to make himself master of Maine and Anjou; but Henry soon reduced the insurgents; and Geoffrey consented to accept of a pension, and relinquish his title to the countries in question. Indeed, he had no other claim than a promise made him by his brother, before he obtained the crown of England, that he would put him in possession of these dutchies as soon as he was settled on the throne of his ancestors.

A.D. 1157. The Welsh, ever restless and uneasy, had invaded several of the counties bordering on their territories; and Henry marched, at the head of an army, to revenge the insult; but the cowardice of his standard-bearer rendered the attempt abortive, and had almost proved fatal both to Henry and his whole whole army. The attack of the Welsh was made with all the fury inherent in that valiant people, and so terrified Henry de Essex, who carried the royal standard, that, throwing down the ensign, he fled with the utmost precipitation. Alarmed at missing the royal standard, the English were intimidated; and, persuaded that the king was slain, fell into confusion. Henry perceived the cause, and rode through the ranks bare-headed, to convince them of their mistake. Ashamed of such pusillanimous conduct, the English returned to the charge and drove back the enemy, but not without considerable loss. A peace soon after ensued, and the king disbanded his army.

A. D. 1159. Henry, who was still desirous of encreasing his possessions, laid claim to the county of Thoulouse, in right of his queen, to whom it belonged; but Raymond, count of Thoulouse, refused to deliver up the territories, pleading prescription, and his right of purchase. Both were determined to support their rights, and the sword therefore was to decide the controversy. Henry saw the difficulties that must attend the reduction of Thoulouse, a city remarkable for its strength. He knew that the usual method of raising armies would never answer his purpose, and therefore determined to have recourse to an innovation which he flattered himself would be of equal advantage to the prince and his people. The usual method of raising armies consisted in the king's sending orders to his military tenants to take the field at the head of a certain number of their vassals, in proportion to the value of their fiefs. Henry was disgusted at this species of military service; because it never answered the monarch's intentions. The great slowness with which the military tenants came into the field, the spirit they possessed of independence, and the shortness of the time they were obliged to serve, being only forty days, rendered the armies not only of little use, but even dangerous. Nor was this method less inconvenient to the subject. When a war was to be carried on in remote countries, the expences of going to and returning from the army, and which they were obliged to bear themselves, was very great: their domestic affairs suffered; the tillage of their lands was neglected, and a famine was often the consequence of military service. Henry, therefore, commuted the personal service of his military tenants, for a proportional sum of money. The people were delighted with this exchange; it was far more agreeable to them to advance money than to furnish troops; and to head them in person. And Henry was pleased to find he had united his interest with the happiness of his people. He received the stipulated sums, and hired mercenary forces, over whom he had a more certain authority, and whose time of service was unlimited.

Henry began his military operations against Cahors, the capital of the generality of Quercy, and was soon master of the place; but the city of Thoulouse made a noble defence, and the English monarch exerted all his abilities to take it. Lewis, king of France, was alarmed at Henry's progress. He feared that if the English monarch was suffered to make himself master of the principal places in the heart of France, his ambition might push him on to farther conquests, and even advance to the very gates of Paris. He therefore marched at the head of a small body of forces, and threw himself into Thoulouse, before Henry could completely invest the city. The military operations immediately ceased, Henry declaring that he owed too much respect to his superior lord, that he would not attack a place defended by him in person. He raised the siege, and a treaty of peace was soon after concluded between the monarchs of France and England.

A. D. 1161. But this peace was of no long continuance: ambition soon dissolved the bands of amity. Henry's eldest son had, for some time, been affianced to Margaret, the daughter of Lewis, and it was agreed by the marriage treaty, that the princess should have city of Gisors with part of Norman Vexin, for her portion; and that these places should remain in the custody of the Knights Templars, till the marriage was celebrated. Desirous of obtaining the possession of those valuable places, Henry prevailed upon the cardinals Pisa and Pavia to grant him a synodical decree, dispensing with the nonage of the parties. The nuptials were immediately celebrated, though the prince was but seven, and the princess only three years of age; and the Templars, considering themselves as free from their engagements, delivered up the castle of Gisors and the other places assigned as Margaret's dower to Henry.

Lewis was highly offended at the stratagem of the English monarch, and a war broke out between them; but pope Alexander III. desirous of preventing the effusion of human blood, offered his mediation, and brought about a reconciliation. Alexander, who the preceding year had been driven from Rome, by the anti-pope Victor IV. had retired into France, Lewis as well as Henry having acknowledged him for the true successor of St. Peter, and the pontiff in return was desirous of bringing about a peace between the two princes, who were equally his friends. The contending monarchs met his holiness at the castle of Torci on the Loire. They immediately dismounted to receive him, and each of them holding one of the reins of his bridle, walked on foot by his side, and in this manner conducted him into the castle. Such was the superstitious bigotry of the times! Can we wonder at the pride and insolence of the Roman pontiff, when two of the most powerful monarchs in Europe were guilty of such unpardonable weakness?

The power of Henry was now sufficiently established, and he flattered himself with a long series of peace and tranquillity: but he was deceived; he was rendered unhappy by a person, who owed his whole fortune to his bounty. This was the celebrated Thomas Becket, whose conduct set the nation in a flame, and rendered abortive the scheme which Henry had formed for confining the ecclesiastical jurisdiction within proper bounds; and of repressing the licentiousness of the clergy, who had for some time expressed an open contempt of the laws of their country. Forgetting that religion is the genuine basis of civil order, they had inverted its tendency, and endeavoured to demolish the very structure it was intended to support. They arrogated to themselves rights and immunities totally subversive of the peace of society. Henry was determined to correct these enormities, and, without depriving the church of her real privileges, to establish proper limits to the pretensions of the clergy. Becket was considered as a proper person for executing this noble design, and whose utmost assistance Henry flattered himself he might command.

That famous ecclesiastic was the son of a citizen of London, and had spent his youth in the study of the civil and canon law at Boulogne. He was endowed with very singular talents, and with a spirit not to be daunted even by the frowns of royalty. Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, had recommended him to Henry, who made him his chancellor. In the execution of that high office he was equally distinguished by the extent of his capacity, and the splendor and gaiety of his life. Far from being tinctured with the superstitious bigotry of the times, he abandoned himself to the pleasures of the age. He was an assiduous courtier, and shared with his prince his amusements and his military toils.

A. D. 1162. Persuaded that Becket would readily sacrifice his own interest to promote that of his sovereign, Henry, on the death of Theobald, promoted him to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. The whole behaviour of Becket was changed on his being placed at the head of the English church. He resigned his office of chancellor, and sent the seals to Henry, who was then in Normandy; renounced all concern in secular affairs, submitted to the most rigid mortifications, mortifications; and became lavish in his generosity to the poor. The gay and splendid minister was changed into a saint.

Becket having thus acquired the veneration of the people, soon convinced Henry that he must not expect any assistance from him in limiting the privileges of the clergy. He attempted to recover all the lands that had been alienated from the see of Canterbury: pretending that none of his predecessors had any right to dispose of the property of the church. Nor was he contented with this attempt to extend his jurisdiction, he asserted that it was the prerogative of the archbishop to fill vacant church livings in the manors of his military tenants, as well as those of the churches of Canterbury. Accordingly, he collated one Laurence to the rectory of Aresford; but the patron, who was a peer of the realm, resolved not to submit to so insolent an intrusion, and immediately ejected Laurence from the benefice. Becket considered this as an unpardonable affront offered to the mitre, and pronounced the sentence of excommunication against the patron.

Henry was at once astonished and alarmed. He wrote to Becket, insisting that the censure should be taken off, which the haughty prelate peremptorily refused. A little reflection, however, convinced him of his error: a law, passed in the reign of William the conqueror, inflicted the penalty of high-treason on any churchman, who should promulgate an ecclesiastical censure on any military tenant of the crown, without the king's consent. The prelate did not chuse to incur the penalty, and therefore annulled the sentence. Henry was now sufficiently convinced that he had been deceived in the opinion he had formed of Becket, and at the same time confirmed in his former resolution of reducing the authority of the ecclesiastics. An event soon after happened, that called upon him, as the father of his people, to carry his design into immediate execution.

A clergyman in Worcestershire having debauched a gentleman's daughter, murdered the father to conceal the offence. Henry ordered that the criminal should be tried in the secular court, and punished according to the laws of the kingdom. Becket insisted on the immunities of the church, and maintained that no greater punishment could be inflicted upon him than that of degradation, and his being shut up in a monastery during the remainder of his life. Adding, that to subject an ecclesiastic to the cognizance of the civil magistrate, was a high infringement of the privileges of the church, and which he would always oppose to the utmost of his power. Astonished at the insolence of the prelate, and disdaining to answer a declaration so subversive of the peace of civil society, the king turned his back upon the prelate, and left him with contempt.

Henry now assembled an assembly of all the prelates of England at Westminster, and solemnly demanded, "whether they consented and allowed, that such clergymen as were convicted of felony should be degraded, and immediately upon their degradation be delivered over to a secular officer for corporal punishment." This demand, which was perfectly agreeable to justice, and the ancient laws of England, met with very little opposition from any of the clergy, except the archbishop, who peremptorily refused his assent, alleging, that it was contrary both to the divine law, and the institutions of the church, for a delinquent to undergo a double punishment for one offence. Telling his brethren at the same time that it ill became them, who were forbid, by the sacred writings, to have any concern in sentences of death, to expose any person of their own order to capital punishment. Swayed by the authority, and fearing the power of Becket, the bishops declined coming to any resolution on the subject of the king's demand. Henry was exasperated at their obstinacy, and asked them this precise and decisive question, "Whether or not they were willing to submit to the ancient laws of the kingdom?" The answer was equivocal; a salvo was added, with regard to their order and immunities of the church; and Henry left the synod with all the marks of indignation and contempt.

Alarmed at the abrupt departure of the king, the bishops represented to Becket, that his unseasonable obstinacy would, in all probability, be fatal to the privileges of the clergy; and therefore advised him, from the regard to the common cause of all the ecclesiastics in this kingdom, to make some concessions to offended majesty: but the archbishop was deaf to their intreaties, declaring, that he was ready to lay down his life in support of the canons of the church. Astonished at his inflexible obstinacy, the bishops, who were not equally blinded by enthusiasm, considered that whatever honour their perseverance might reflect upon them at the court of Rome, yet as English barons, they had every thing to fear from the resentment of an active and warlike prince. Instigated by these motives, they waited upon the king, and gave him an absolute promise to submit themselves to the laws of the kingdom. Becket himself followed their example, and promised, upon the faith of an honest man, to observe the laws of the kingdom without any salvo or qualification.

A. D. 1164. The only difficulty that now remained was, to explain and define those laws, and to ascertain the proper limits of the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions. For this purpose a general council of the nobility and prelates was assembled at Clarendon. And in this assembly the following articles were framed into the form of laws.

"I. All suits about the presentation and advowson of churches, between either laity or clergy, shall be tried and determined in the king's court.

"II. Churches of the king's fee cannot be given away in perpetuity without his consent.

"III. Clergymen accused of any crime whatever, and summoned by the king's justices, shall appear in the king's court, and plead to such articles as the court shall require, and in the ecclesiastical court, to such as are cognizable therein; provided the king's justices send an officer to inspect the proceedings of the ecclesiastical court; and in case a cleric is convicted, or pleads guilty, he is to lose his privilege, and be protected by the court no longer.

"IV. No archbishops, bishops, or priests, may go out of the realm without the king's leave; and if they have leave, they shall give security not to ask or attempt any thing either in their passage, stay, or return, to the prejudice of the king or kingdom.

"V. Excommunicated persons shall not be obliged to make oath, or give security, to continue upon the place where they live, but only to stand to the judgment of the church in order to their absolution.

"VI. Laymen ought not to be accused in the ecclesiastical court, but by legal and reputable promoters and witnesses, and in the presence of the bishop; yet so as the archdeacon lose not his right or any of his dues: and if the offenders are such that nobody will or dare accuse them, the sheriff, at the bishop's request, shall cause twelve legal men of the town or vicinage to make oath before the bishop, that they will declare the truth of the matter, according to the best of their knowledge.

"VII. None, either of the king's tenants in capite, or of his ministerial officers, may be excommunicated, nor any of their lands put under an interdict, unless application be first made to the king, if he be in England, or, in case he be out of the realm, to his justiciary, that he may see justice done in their case; so that what is cognizable in the king's court may be there determined, and what belongs to the ecclesiastical may be remitted thither.

"VIII. If appeals arise in ecclesiastical causes, they are to be made from the archdeacon to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop; in failure of justice from the archbishop, recourse must be had to the king, that by his precept, the suit may be determined in the archbishop's court. Nor shall it be lawful to proceed farther without the king's consent.

"IX. If a suit arise between a clergyman and a layman, which the first pretends to be held by Frank-Almoine, (a tenure of lands or tenements bestowed for perpetual alms) and the latter maintains it to be a lay-fee, the tenure shall be tried before the king's justiciary by the verdict of twelve legal men, summoned according to the custom of the courts, by the order of the king's chief justice; and if the tenement is found to be held in frank-almoine, the suit shall be tried in the ecclesiastical court; but if the verdict brings it in a lay-fee, the suit shall be carried on in the king's court, unless they both hold of the same lord, either spiritual or temporal, in which case it shall be tried in his court; provided, however, that the person seised with the tenement in question be not, on account of such verdict, disseised till the suit is determined.

"X. If any inhabitant of a city, castle, borough, or demesne manor of the king, be cited for any time by the archdeacon or bishop, and will not make satisfaction upon their summons, they may interdict him from divine service; but they ought not to excommunicate him, till the king's principal officer of the place be made acquainted therewith, that he may oblige the person to make satisfaction to the church; and if such officer fail in so doing, he shall be fineable at the king's pleasure; and the bishop may then exert his ecclesiastical authority upon the accused person.

"XI. All archbishops and bishops, and other clergymen possessed of ecclesiastical dignities or benefices, who hold of the king in capite, are to look upon their estates as baronies, and shall appear before the king's justices and officers, to answer the duties of their tenure; and shall observe and perform all the royal customs, rights, and services; and shall hold themselves, as other barons, obliged to be present at judicial proceedings in the king's court, till sentence comes to be given against life or limb.

"XII. When any archbishopric, bishopric, abbey, or priory, of royal foundation or patronage, becomes vacant, the king shall enter thereupon, and receive all the issues and profits thereof as of his own demesne lands; and when he shall think fit that such church be provided for, the king shall send his mandate to the chief chapter or convent, and the election shall be made in the king's chapel, with the king's consent, and by the advice of such dignitaries of the realm as the king shall call together for that purpose: and the person so elected shall there, before his consecration, do homage and fealty to the king, as to his liege lord, for life, limb, and earthly honour, saving his order.

"XIII. If any of the chief nobility of the realm should violently oppose the archbishop or bishop, or archdeacon, in doing justice on themselves, or on their tenants, the king shall take cognizance of the matter, and oblige them to submit to justice. And if any deny the king his rights, and decline standing to the judgment of the court; the archbishop, bishop, and archdeacon, shall employ their authority and censures to oblige them to make the king satisfaction.

"XIV. The goods and chattels of such as have forfeited to the king, shall not be detained in any church or church-yard, to secure them from being seized according to law, because they belong to the king wherever they are found, as well within the precincts of the church as without.

"XV. All actions and suits for debt, due either upon oath, or solemn promise, or otherwise contracted, shall be tried in the king's court.

"XVI. The sons of villeins, or copyholders, are not to be ordained without the consent of the lord of the manor where they were known to be born."

Such are the famous articles, so well known under the title of "The Constitutions of Clarendon." The bishops, overawed by the barons, who were all gained over to the king's party, readily signed the Constitutions; but Becket had now changed his resolution, retracted his promise, and absolutely refused to set his hand to the articles. At last, by the repeated solicitations of the nobility and clergy, he relented, signed the Constitutions, and promised "legally with good faith, and without fraud, to obey them."

Henry transmitted the articles to pope Alexander, in order to have them confirmed by a bull. But the pontiff was so far from complying with the wishes of the king, that he did not hesitate to condemn and annul them, as incompatible with the rights of the church. Becket no sooner perceived that he might hope for support from the see of Rome in his opposition to the constitutions, than he expressed the deepest sorrow for having joined in these concessions: he redoubled his austerities, and refused to exercise any part of his archiepiscopal function, till he should receive absolution from the pontiff.

Henry was now so thoroughly exasperated against Becket, that it was generally feared his ruin was determined. The archbishop himself was alarmed, and applied to Henry for leave to visit the pope, in order to confer with him on some important affair relative to his church, but was refused. The prelate then repaired to Woodstock, where Henry resided, and was refused an audience.

Another council was now summoned at Northampton, where no less than four impeachments were preferred against him. Passion now, rather than justice, dictated the proceedings of Henry. Becket was convicted of contumacy, and condemned to pay a very large fine. The king commanded him to give an account of his administration while chancellor; which the archbishop absolutely refused. It was now apparent that Henry was determined to humble this imperious churchman; but Becket was not to be intimidated. He dressed himself in his pontifical robes, and carrying the cross of Canterbury erect before him, entered the presence chamber. Every person present was struck with astonishment at his insolence and folly. The bishops were ashamed and confounded; and the bishop of Hereford requested that he might bear the cross before him, but he asked in vain. Henry himself remonstrated concerning his conduct, and reminded him, that he had himself subscribed the articles of Clarendon. Becket replied, that the cause of God and the church had rendered his consent to those articles of no force; and that he put himself under the protection of the Roman pontiff, the supreme head of the church, to whom he appealed against the sentences that either had or might be pronounced against him; and strictly inhibited his suffragans not to join in any enterprise contrary to the immunities of the church. The barons, exasperated at his conduct, determined to commit him to prison; but he refused to hear the sentence pronounced, left the assembly immediately, and retired, with his cross erect before him, to the monastery of St. Andrews. He soon after sent three bishops to ask a safe conduct for his departure; but being denied, he retired privately in the night, attended only by two servants, and escaped to the continent. He was received by Lewis king of France, and pope Alexander, who was still at the court of that monarch, with every mark of respect and esteem. By the munificence of the former, he lived with the utmost magnificence in the monastery of Pontigni, and the latter prepared to issue bulls to revenge his disgrace. All the thunder of the Vatican was intended to be launched against the head of the English monarch and his ministers.

Henry was no sooner informed of the escape of Becket, than he immediately dispatched a very respectable embassy to the pope, to solicit the deposition of the primate; offering to double the revenue of Peter's-pence, and render it a perpetual tax. But the the pope was inflexible; he refused the offer, and the ambassadors immediately returned to their master. On their arrival, Henry summoned an assembly of the nobles, where it was determined to sequester all the possessions of the see of Canterbury, together with all the revenues of the churches, chapels, and rents of the clergy, who adhered to Becket; and all the primate's relations and domestics, both clergy and laity, were banished the kingdom.

A.D. 1165. But Henry was still uneasy. The troubles excited in Germany and Italy by the thunder of the Vatican, alarmed both him and his nobles. He therefore passed over to the continent, in order, if possible, to prevent an interdict being laid on the kingdom, by a personal conference with the pope. An interview was accordingly proposed, and it was agreed that Becket should not be present. The archbishop was alarmed at this exclusion; he feared that the pope, on hearing a fair account of the whole proceedings, would withdraw his protection, and abandon him to the vengeance of an enraged monarch. He therefore suggested to his holiness, "that he might be imposed upon by the fluent and plausible speeches of Henry, unless he himself" was present to interpret their meaning by what he "knew of the inward sentiments of his heart." The weak pontiff listened to this artful suggestion of the prelate; he gave up his own infallibility to depend upon that of Becket, and insisted on the archbishop's being present at the interview. Henry disdained to submit to this proposal, and immediately embarked for England.

A.D. 1166. The king, convinced that the pope would now exert all his power in favour of Becket, took every precaution in his power to render the attempt abortive. He prohibited all his subjects, under severe penalties, from receiving any mandates either from his holiness or the archbishop, and from making any appeals to them. Becket now exerted all his power; he thundered out anathemas against his enemies, and at last denounced the sentence of excommunication against all that adhered to the constitutions of Clarendon; and absolved every one from the oaths which they had taken to observe them. At the same time, by virtue of the legantine authority conferred on him by Alexander, he commanded the English bishops to attend him under the penalty of an anathema, and even proceeded so far as to write threatening letters to the king. But Alexander being engaged in a dangerous war with the emperor Frederic Barbarossa, was afraid of drawing upon him the resentment of so powerful a prince as Henry; he therefore suspended the effects of Becket's denunciations.

A.D. 1167. Henry, however, was unwilling to expose his kingdom to those revolutions which the thunder of the Vatican had produced in other parts of Europe; but unfortunately, the obstinacy of the archbishop was equal to the stateliness of the monarch. Lewis, king of France, interposed his good offices to bring about an accommodation. Becket declared he was ready to put an end to all disputes; and to submit to the king, saving his honour, the possessions of the church, and the rights of others. At last an interview was agreed to, and Becket met the kings of France and England at a village in the neighbourhood of Paris; but the primate was so unreasonable and haughty, that Lewis was persuaded it would be impossible to bring about an agreement. Henry, desirous of a pacification, said to Lewis, "There have been many kings of England, and there have also been many archbishops of Canterbury; let Becket act towards me with the same submission which the greatest of his predecessors have paid to the least of mine, and I shall be satisfied." But Becket refused to acquiesce in so reasonable a proposal. Lewis was, or at least seemed to be, disgusted, and the two kings departed without taking leave of the archbishop; but the correspondence and friendship between the monarch of France and the prelate was soon after renewed.

A.D. 1169. Henry now gave Normandy, Le Maine and Anjou, to his eldest son, Henry; Poictou and Guienne to his son Richard; and Brittany to Geoffrey, who held it as a fief depending upon Normandy, and swore fealty to his eldest brother. Lewis, as lord paramount of these fiefs, confirmed the grants, and the young princes did homage to the French monarch for their respective territories.

A.D. 1170. Having provided for the tranquillity of his foreign dominions, Henry returned to England, and summoned a parliament, or great council of the nation, to meet at Windsor. In this assembly the kingdom was divided into circuits; and certain earls, knights, and clergymen, appointed commissioners, to make a progress through these divisions, in order to take cognizance of all abuses committed by the sheriffs, bailiffs, and other inferior officers. This inquisition produced the most salutary effects; the subject was eased of many exactions, various grievances were redressed, and peace established in every part of the kingdom.

But these acquisitions, however great, however valuable, were not the only objects of Henry's design; he had formed another of still greater importance, which he thought proper to conceal, till the very moment of its execution, lest the turbulent primate should find means to render the whole abortive. He remembered with sorrow the little regard the English had paid to their oaths of eventual fealty in the case of his mother, and was therefore determined not to subject his own children to the same misfortune, by placing the crown on the head of Henry, his eldest son, then in the sixteenth year of his age. He accordingly adjourned the national assembly from Windsor to London. No person, not even the young prince himself, was acquainted with the real intention of Henry. The assembly was, however, remarkably full, in order to receive the report of the commissioners. As soon as the report was read, Henry informed them of the resolution he had formed with regard to the coronation of his son, and was pleased to find it received with universal approbation. The only difficulty consisted in finding a prelate who was properly authorized to perform the ceremony. It was generally understood to be a prerogative peculiar to the archbishop of Canterbury; but on this occasion it was performed by Roger, archbishop of York, who had lately been invested with a legantine authority for Scotland; together with a bull, which granted him the eventual privilege of crowning the king of England, an immunity which some of his predecessors had formerly enjoyed. Accordingly that prelate, assisted by the bishops of London and Durham, placed the crown upon the head of young Henry. And immediately after the ceremony, William king of Scotland, his brother David, and all the earls, barons, and franktenants of England, took the oaths of fealty and allegiance to the new king.

The younger Henry was of a haughty and imperious disposition; he was a stranger to generous passions; gratitude was not among his virtues. His father, desirous of displaying, before this august assembly, every mark of paternal love and distinction for his favourite son, served the first dish at his table with his own hands, saying, with an endearing smile, "You may now boast, my son, of being as honourably served as any monarch upon earth." But the soul of young Henry was too haughty to make a proper return to this engaging condescension in a parent. He turned to the archbishop of York, and whispered, with a contemptuous sneer, "That he thought it no great degradation for the son of a petty count to serve the heir of a great king." Henry heard not the ungenerous reflection of his son; he was yet a stranger to his ingratitude.

HENRY II Serving the First Dish to his SON HENRY'S Table.

The coronation of young Henry, without his assistance, filled the breast of Becket with malevolence and rage; he threatened vengeance against the prelates who had performed the ceremony, but his fury spent itself in vain; the pope suspended the effect of his anathemas, till a proper inquisition could be taken. In the mean time Henry paid a visit to his foreign dominions; where another effort was made for terminating the differences between the king and the ambitious primate. The pope, indeed, was just going to launch the flaming bolt of interdict upon all Henry's dominions; the day was fixed, and the Roman council summoned to attend. The powerful effects of superstitious bigotry, on the minds of the most daring, was now conspicuous. The intrepid soul of Henry could not support the shock; the mighty monarch, at whose nod the nations trembled, crouched like an abject slave beneath the uplifted rod of papal tyranny. A conference was held in a meadow between Charton and Maine, where all differences between the king and the archbishop were finally adjusted. It was agreed, that the king should receive the archbishop, his exiled clergy, adherents, and relations into his favour; that the prelate should be restored to his rights and possessions in the see of Canterbury, and be empowered to hold them in the same manner as before the contest began; that satisfaction should be made to the see of Canterbury for the violation of its rights, in the coronation of the young king.

These terms were certainly as favourable as even Becket himself could wish; and Henry hoped, that the archbishop, in return for these concessions, would lay aside all rancour and malice, and apply himself to the proper duties of his office, the cultivation of peace, and promoting brotherly love and charity throughout the kingdom. He was deceived. Becket no sooner mounted his archiepiscopal chair, than he thundered out the sentence of excommunication against the bishops of London and Durham, several of the king's ministers, officers of the household, justiciaries, and the most considerable persons in the kingdom. Henry was informed of those violent measures at Bayeux, and cried out in the bitterness of grief and astonishment, "What! will none of my servants rid me of this ungrateful and imperious prelate." This exclamation was not uttered in vain. Four barons, or knights of his household, swore to revenge the cause of their master, privately withdrew from court, and passed over into England. Henry was informed of their departure; and fearing his exclamation might induce them to violent measures, dispatched messengers after them, to prevent any fatal accident. But it was too late. The four conspirators followed the archbishop into the church, and murdered him before the altar of St. Benedict.

Such was the tragical end of St. Thomas of Canterbury, a prelate of the most imperious and inflexible spirit. He felt a victim to his own pride and obstinacy in a cause which he fancied just, and in which he was guided by the most destructive prejudices. Unable to bear the least contradiction and fond of directing affairs of every kind, he treated all that opposed him with a virulence of behaviour, and a severity of vengeance, which neither suited the character of a christian bishop, nor a decent member of society. He scrupled not to add the sanction of the most sacred oaths to infamous falsehoods, in order to carry any favourite point. And we may learn from his example the amazing influence, which opinion often obtains over the minds even of superior men, and thence perceive the dangers of those false principles which ignorance and superstition have too often substituted in the place of the genuine and pure maxims of the gospel. Alexander, convinced of the great services of Becket in promoting the exorbitant power assumed by the papacy, caused him to be canonized and revered as a martyr about two years after his death, without the usual process generally observed in cases of a similar nature. Pilgrimages were made to Canterbury, and devotions made at his tomb.

A. D. 1171. The death of Becket deeply affected the mind of Henry. He dreaded the consequences of the papal thunder, and knew that his enemies would exert all their influence with the pontiff to launch the flaming bolt of interdict on his dominions. He feared the spiritual much more than the temporal sword. He dispatched a splendid embassy to Rome, to clear him of all suspicion of being concerned in the death of Becket, and to avert the thunders of the vatican. Alexander, at first, refused an audience to Henry's ambassadors; but by the proper distribution of large sums among the members of the sacred college, the intention of Henry was fully answered. The pope, however irritated against Henry, contented himself with issuing general denunciations against the principals and accomplices of Becket's murder. The archbishop of Sens, who had always been an implacable enemy to the English monarch, laid an interdict upon all the French provinces subject to Henry; but the pope prevented the consequences that might have resulted from that sentence. Two cardinals were sent with legantine powers into Normandy, in order to examine into the king's conduct with regard to the murder of Becket, and a conference was opened at Avaranches, where Henry and his eldest son assisted, together with all the clergy of Normandy. After long debates the whole affair was settled, and all differences between Henry and the pope were terminated on the following conditions: The king declared, upon oath and the relics of the saints in the church of St. Andrew, that he had neither commanded nor desired the murder of Becket; but that as some words had escaped him, in his agony of grief, which might have given occasion to it, he was desirous of atoning for that offence by stipulating to pay a sum of money sufficient to maintain two hundred knights for one year in the Holyland; and, if the pope required it, to serve himself three years against the infidels. He farther engaged not to insist on any customs derogatory to ecclesiastical privileges, that had been introduced during his own reign; nor to hinder appeals to the pope; but content himself with exacting sufficient security from those who left his dominions, that they should attempt nothing against the rights of his crown and kingdom. Thus Henry, by a master-stroke of policy, extricated himself from the most difficult situation on the easiest terms. For notwithstanding his promise, he had it always in his power to prevent appeals to Rome, by demanding such securities as the parties could not procure. And because the constitutions of Clarendon were nothing more than the ancient customs of the kingdom, they were still in force.

A. D. 1172. Henry having now no enemy to fear, resumed the scheme he had some years since formed for the conquest of Ireland. Adrian IV. who at that time filled the papal chair, desirous of augmenting the powers and revenues of the holy see, encouraged Henry to pursue the plan he had formed; and granted him a bull with ample privileges. The reader will not, perhaps, be displeased to see this curious instrument at large, as it affords a convincing proof, that the popes of Rome, even in these early times, usurped the power of conferring kingdoms and states on whom they pleased.

"ADRIAN servant of the servants of God, to his son in Christ Jesus, Henry king of England, sends greeting and apostolical benediction.

"The desire your highness expressed to advance the glory of your name on earth, and to obtain in heaven the prize of eternal happiness, deserves commendations. As a good catholic prince you are very careful to enlarge the borders of the church, to spread the knowledge of the truth among the barbarous and the ignorant, and to extirpate the weeds of vice in the the garden of the Lord, for which you apply to us for countenance and direction. We are confident that your enterprize will be crowned with success, because you have undertaken it from the noblest motive; for whatever is taken in hand from a principle of faith and religion, is always sure to succeed. It is certain, as you yourself acknowledge, that Ireland, as well as all other islands that have the happiness of being enlightened by the sun of righteousness, and have embraced the doctrines of Christianity, are undoubtedly St. Peter's right, and belong to the jurisdiction of the Roman see. We, therefore, think, after mature consideration, that to settle in that island colonies of the faithful, will be well-pleasing to God.

"You have informed us, that you intend to make an expedition into Ireland, to subject the island to just laws, and to extirpate vice, which has long prevailed in that country. You promise to pay us, out of every house, a yearly acknowledgment of one penny, and to maintain the rights of the church without the least infringement or diminution. Upon these conditions, we consent and allow, that you make a descent upon that island, to enlarge the bounds of the church, to check the progress of immorality, to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and to promote the growth of virtue and the Christian religion. We exhort you to do whatever you shall judge necessary to advance the honour of God, and the salvation of the people, whom we charge to submit to your jurisdiction, and own you for their sovereign lord; provided always that the rights of the church be inviolably observed, and Peter-pence duly paid. If, therefore, you think proper to carry your design into execution, labour, above all things, to improve the inhabitants in virtue. Use both your own endeavours, and the endeavours of such as you shall judge worthy of being employed in this work, that the church of God be more and more enriched, that religion flourish in the country, and that the things tending to the honour of God, and the salvation of souls, be disposed of in such a manner, as may entitle you to an immortal fame upon earth, and an eternal reward in heaven."

Such was the bull granted by Adrian for the conquest of Ireland, which had excited the ambition of Henry. There is the greatest reason to believe that Ireland was originally peopled from England; but the Irish still remained in the state of savages: they were even ignorant of agriculture; no traces of the arts were found among them; they were destitute of laws, of manners, and of learning. The island was divided into a number of small principalities, each governed by its own prince, but all forming a political confederacy, though they exercised perpetual violences against each other. They were incapable of making any defence against regular forces; but it was no easy matter to unite them into one body or nation, and govern them by wholesome laws. Ferocious by nature, and fond of liberty, they opposed every attempt to civilize them; and, like the ancient Britons, when attacked by a superior force, fled to their forests, mountains and caverns, for safety.

An accident happened about this time, which gave Henry a favourable opportunity of claiming the pretended title he had derived from the bull of Adrian. Dermot, one of the petty kings of Ireland, being driven out of his dominions by a neighbouring chief, whose wife he had carried off, applied to the English monarch for assistance to recover his territories. Henry listened to the Irish chief, and empowered him to levy troops in England. He also gave a general leave to his subjects to assist the prince in person, but declined to embark himself in the enterprize. The romantic notions of valour that then prevailed, excited the ambition of several of the English barons to assist the Irish prince. Among these, Richard, earl of Striguel, furnamed Strongbow, called by several of our historians Richard earl of Pembroke, was the chief. That nobleman, whose ambition was boundless, enjoyed several large estates in Wales, where his tenants were numerous, and the situation of his territories very convenient for passing over into Ireland. Strongbow undertook to assist the Irish chief, on condition of his giving him his daughter in marriage, and leaving him his dominions. Accordingly these adventurers, at the head of a small body of troops, landed in Ireland, defeated very numerous armies of the wild Irish; and, not content with recovering the territories of Dermot, meditated the reduction of the whole island. Jealous of their success, and desirous of acquiring the honour of being the conqueror of Ireland, Henry passed over in person, at the head of a powerful army; but the Irish were already conquered; there remained nothing for him but to receive the submission of a vanquished people. Henry, without the effusion of a single drop of blood, became master of Ireland in less time than would have been necessary to travel over it. Most of the tributary princes attended his court at Dublin, and swore allegiance to the English monarch. The clergy, who had laboured to render their country subject to England ever since Adrian had issued a bull for that purpose, met in a general assembly at Waterford, where they signed their submission, and delivered the instruments to Henry, who transmitted them to Rome. Alexander, pleased with acquiring so considerable an addition of power and interest to the see of Rome, readily confirmed the title.

Henry had now reached the pinnacle of human grandeur, and flattered himself with enjoying a series of happiness and tranquillity. He was deceived. His children proved a source of the most severe disquietude. Henry, his eldest son, a prince of a very haughty and insolent temper, was weary of bearing the royal title without authority. He had married Margaret, daughter to Lewis king of France; and the ceremony of his coronation had been repeated, in order that his consort might be included in the solemnity. He had also been permitted to pay a visit to his father-in-law, and continued some time at the court of France. Lewis, ever attentive to excite commotions in England, embraced this opportunity of kindling the flames of domestic discord in the family of Henry. He persuaded the prince, that in consequence of the ceremony of the coronation, he was intitled to an immediate possession of a part of the dominions of his father. Imperious by nature, and full of this extravagant idea, young Henry returned to England, and demanded from his father, either the kingdom of England, or the duchy of Normandy. Henry was astonished at this unexpected request, and began to fear that his hopes of happiness were built on a chimerical foundation. He endeavoured to convince his son of the extravagance of his demand; and painted in proper colours the folly of a request which could only tend to weaken the power of his family, and, ultimately, his own authority. But his endeavours were in vain: the prince discovered the highest discontent, blended with insolence, at his father's refusal; retired to France, and put himself under the protection of Lewis, whose desire of lessening the power of Henry had given rise to this domestic discord. But the disobedience of his eldest son was not the only misfortune that disturbed the happiness of Henry. His queen, Eleanor, carrying her jealousy of her husband to extremity, encouraged her two younger sons, Richard and Geoffrey, to follow the example of their brother, fly to the court of France, and insist upon being put into actual possession of the territories assigned them by their father.

A.D. 1173. Lewis was not the sole monarch who dreaded the too great power of Henry. William, king of Scotland, had long beheld it with terror, and trembled for the consequences. He followed young Henry to France, under pretence of renewing the league that had long continued between the Scottish and French nations; but in reality to concert proper measures for distressing the king of England. Several of the most powerful barons both in England and Normandy, joined in the unnatural alliance for supporting the unreasonable claim of an undutiful son, on the dominions of an indulgent parent. Henry, alarmed at the departure of his son, demanded him from the court of France, but received a very insolent answer.

Nothing less than the amazing abilities of the English monarch could have extricated him out of the innumerable difficulties with which he was now surrounded. The desertion of many of his powerful barons gave him reason to fear, that his own subjects would desert him in the day of battle; and he was therefore determined to have recourse to foreign mercenaries for assistance. He accordingly took twenty thousand Brabanders, all of them veteran troops, into his pay, and by his liberality attached them firmly to his person and fortunes: These Brabanders, sometimes called Routiers, and Colleraux, were a kind of banditti, or free-booters, who lived upon plunder; they infested, at that time, all the states of Europe, defied the censures of the church, and engaged in the service of any prince who could pay them punctually. But though they were mercenaries by profession, yet, when well paid, no troops could behave with greater fidelity: and though accustomed to plunder, yet, in time of action, they were rigid observers of military discipline.

Henry had experienced the power of the papal thunder in the cause of Becket, and hoped it might have the same effect on his rebellious sons. He was sensible, indeed, of the danger attending the interposition of ecclesiastical authority in civil disputes; but the alarming consequences of the unnatural attempts of his own children, induced him to sacrifice political caution to his own safety. He accordingly applied to pope Alexander, who immediately promulgated anathemas against young Henry and all his adherents. But the spiritual thunder, whose effect was irresistible in ecclesiastical causes, lost its power when employed in a dispute merely temporal: the flaming bolts of the vatican fell harmless to the ground.

But Henry was far from placing his whole dependence on the spiritual arm of the Roman pontiff; his own abilities, and the powerful assistance of his foreign forces, rendered him superior to all his enemies. His virtues never shone with so much lustre as in this alarming crisis. The sight of impending dangers animated him with fresh courage. Bled with the most astonishing presence of mind, and wholly a stranger to fear, he viewed, with the most intrepid coolness, the many dangers with which he was surrounded, and planned the most prudent measures to render them all abortive. He was persuaded, and perhaps with reason, that Eleanor his queen was the principal cause of this domestic insurrection, and accordingly caused her to be imprisoned, at the very moment she was endeavouring to make her escape.

The operations of the confederated princes begun by Richard, who repaired into Guienne, and excited the greater part of the inhabitants to take up arms against his father. Geoffrey stirred up a rebellion in Britany, and put himself at the head of the insurgents. Normandy was invaded by the king of France, assisted by the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois. The Scottish monarch led an army into the northern parts of England. And the earl of Leicester, landed in Essex at the head of a large body of Flemish troops, to excite an insurrection among the English. The soul of Henry now towered above misfortunes. He saw his dangers; but was not intimidated. He had taken such precautions in providing for the defence of the frontiers, that the French monarch, after losing the greater part of his army, was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Ten thousand Brabanders, sent by Henry into Britany, defeated the rebels, and obliged them to return to their duty. The army of Leicester was routed at St. Edmundsbury in Suffolk, and above ten thousand Flemings slain on the spot. Henry advanced at the head of his army against the insurgents in Guienne, retook the places they had seized, and obliged them to lay down their arms, and submit to his authority.

A. D. 1174. Henry now hastened to the defence of his kingdom, which the Scottish army threatened with desolation. He landed at Southampton, and in order to gain the affections of his people, submitted to an act of humiliation, which all the power of the church could not impose upon him. He knew the powerful effect of superstition over the minds of the vulgar; he knew that the ridiculous stories of Becket's miracles were firmly believed by a weak and bigotted people; and that he himself lay under very severe suspicions of being accessory to his death; and therefore determined to remove every shadow of complaint, by joining in the reigning devotions of the times. He set out immediately for Canterbury, and as soon as he perceived the cathedral, though three miles distant, he alighted from his horse, and walked barefoot to the tomb of the saint; prostrated himself before the shrine of Becket, continued the whole day in prayer, and watched all night the holy relicts. When the morning appeared he assembled a chapter of the monks, disrobed himself before them, put scourges into their hands, and presented his bare shoulders to the discipline and lashes of these ecclesiastics. He afterwards made a solemn procession to all the altars in the cathedral; and, retiring to the shrine of the canonized prelate, made an offering of forty pounds per annum to support a number of lamps kept continually burning before his tomb. True devotion is more decent and less ostentatious: Henry was desirous of acquiring the affections of a superstitious people, and a secret penance, however severe, would not have answered his purpose.

The king had hardly left the cathedral, before advice arrived that a decisive victory had been obtained over the Scottish army, and their king taken prisoner. Such remarkable success was immediately attributed to the protection of the saint; and this opinion spreading through the whole kingdom, tended greatly to soften and repress the spirit of rebellion. Many of his restless barons were, however, still in arms, and Henry marched immediately to chastise them, and restore that peace to his kingdom which their unnatural rebellion had destroyed. He first invested the castle of Framlingham, belonging to Hugh Bigod, one of the most powerful of the English malecontents. Bigod was too well acquainted with the disposition of Henry to attempt defending his fortress to extremities; he opened a negotiation, and obtained his pardon on condition of delivering up his castles of Framlingham and Bungay. The bishop of Durham, who had effected an entire independence, delivered up the castle of Norham and Alverton. The officers of the earl of Leicester followed the bishop's example; they gave up the castles of Montferril, Groby and Leicester. Mowbray delivered up the castle of Thirk, and the earl of Ferrers those of Stotville and Dufelde.

Such was the issue of this unnatural rebellion in England. The whole kingdom, in a few days, from the most imminent danger of being lost to the younger Henry, was reduced under his government. Lewis had laid siege to Rouen, and was now joined by the earl of Flanders. This reinforcement enabled the French monarch to push the siege with great vigour; and he flattered himself with being able to make himself master of the place before the arrival of Henry. He was deceived. The garrison made a noble defence, and Henry landed before Lewis could subdue even the outworks. The presence of the English monarch struck the enemy with terror; the siege was immediately raised; and the combined forces fled with the utmost precipitation, leaving all their baggage behind them.

A peace now became necessary. Henry's three rebellious sons made their submission, and were received with the indulgence and affection of a parent. All their adherents were pardoned, and large pensions settled upon themselves. William, king of Scotland, gave up the ancient independency of his crown as the price of his liberty: he did homage to Henry as his liege lord; and engaged, that the nobility and prelates of his kingdom should also do him homage. The castles of Berwick, Roxburgh, Jedburgh, Edinburgh, and Stirling, were delivered up to the English as securities; and William returned to his own kingdom.

A.D. 1176. Henry now applied himself to cultivate the arts of peace, and gain the affection of his English subjects. He summoned a general council of the barons and prelates at Northampton. In this assembly the laws of Edward the Confessor were revived, to the entire satisfaction of the people. And in order to carry those laws into execution, he caused the kingdom to be divided into six parts, and assigned to each three itinerant justices. Those divisions differ very little from the circuits still in use. Henry also restored the barons, who had joined his rebellious sons, to their estates. But as he had learned from experience the danger of suffering so many castles to subsist in the very heart of his kingdom, he seized many of them into his own hands, and demolished others. These wise regulations established tranquillity in his kingdom, and afforded him that satisfaction which he had sought in vain from power and grandeur. His people were protected, contented, and happy.

A.D. 1179. While Henry was enjoying the fruits of his labours for the service of his people, Lewis, alarmed at the danger of his son, who was seized with a violent distemper, resolved to make a pilgrimage to Becket's shrine, in order to obtain the intercession of that saint for the recovery of his son. Henry met the French monarch at Dover, and conducted him to Canterbury, where they both paid their devotions at the altar of St. Thomas; and Lewis offered at his tomb a massy cup of pure gold; and bestowed upon the monks a grant of two hundred gallons of wine annually, and freed them from all duties on such goods as they might purchase in his dominions. Lewis died soon after his return, and was succeeded by Philip, an ambitious and politic prince, who took every occasion to depress the power of the English monarch.

A.D. 1180. Henry was destined to experience all the calamities which undutiful children can inflict on an indulgent parent. Young Henry now renewed his pretensions, again unsheathed the sword of rebellion against his father; and was protected by Philip, who favoured his unnatural designs. But while he was preparing to commence hostilities, he was seized with a violent fever at Martel, a castle in the neighbourhood of Limoges. Perceiving himself past all hopes of recovery, he dispatched a messenger to his father, intreating the favour of a visit, that he might die with the satisfaction of having procured the forgiveness of a parent he had so grossly offended. But fearing to trust himself in the power of those about the person of his son, Henry refused to visit him; but sent one of his prelates, together with a ring, as a token of his blessing and pardon. The bishop found him tottering on the brink of eternity; and received his dying request, that his father would forgive his undutiful behaviour; that he would pay his knights and attendants their salaries; and pardon the barons of Guienne, whom he had excited to rebellion. The bishop promised to relate his requests to his father. He faithfully performed his promise; but before any answer could be returned, the prince paid the debt of nature, on the eleventh of June, in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

Henry was inconsolable for the loss of his son. He fainted thrice, and burst forth into the most excessive lamentations of grief and sorrow. He accused himself of inhumanity in having refused his dying request, in not giving him in person that assurance of forgiveness, which he had only sent by another hand. The death of this prince, however, suspended for a time the rebellion concerted by the three unnatural brothers; and an event that happened soon after, seemed to have put a period to Henry's domestic misfortunes.

A.D. 1185. Heraclius, patriarch of Jerusalem, arrived in England, attended by the grand-masters of the Knights Templars and Hospitalers, on an embassy from Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, to solicit the assistance of Henry against the infidels in the Holy Land. The patriarch presented the English monarch with the keys of the Holy Sepulchre, and the Tower of David, in token of their desire of placing the crown of the Holy City on his head. Henry, however, refused the offer, but promised to assist the Christians with a large supply of money.

A.D. 1187. It was now hoped that the two sons of Henry, Richard and Geoffrey, had laid aside their rebellious intentions; but the English monarch perceived himself mistaken. The former, disgusted at a design formed by his father of settling Guienne as an appanage upon John, his youngest brother, departed the kingdom, and prepared to seize by force the dominions to which he was intitled by his birth. And Geoffrey demanded that Anjou should be annexed to his duchy of Britany. This demand was absolutely refused by Henry, and Geoffrey repaired immediately to the court of France, to solicit assistance against his father. But before Philip had given any answer to his request, Geoffrey was killed in a tournament at Paris. That accident delivered Henry from the enterprizes of the most vicious of his sons. Geoffrey was a prince in whom pride, dissimulation, and perfidy, were equally united. No principle of honour could bind, no precept of religion could restrain that headstrong prince. He was acquainted with every vice, and generally distinguished by the appellation of The Child of Perdition.

Soon after the death of Geoffrey, the melancholy news arrived, that the city of Jerusalem was taken by the valiant and politic Saladine, sultan of Egypt; and that Guy de Lusignan, the last prince that swayed the sceptre of that kingdom, was in the hands of the infidels. This dismal intelligence rekindled at once the ardour and the enthusiasm of the warriors of Europe. Philip and Henry, for a time, suspended their quarrels, and vied with each other in their readiness to succour Palestine. They both took the cross; and both ordered, that such of their subjects as did not chuse to engage in the crusade, should pay the tenth part of their revenues and moveable effects to defray the expence of the armament. This impost was called "Saladine's tax." The clergy insisted that they ought to be excepted, notwithstanding they were the chief instigators of these pious enterprizes.

A.D. 1188. But Philip, who was more desirous of enlarging his own dominions than of recovering Palestine, took advantage of a quarrel that happened between Richard, and Raymond, count of Thoulouse, and led his army into Berry, burnt Mount-Richard, and took several towns in Auvergne. Henry upbraided him with this flagrant breach of faith. He had not only sworn to suspend all hostilities till the crusade was over, but also to undertake the protection of Henry's foreign dominions. While Richard continued to assist his father, Philip was every where defeated; and peace again took place between them. But this was of no long continuance. Richard revolted anew against his father, did homage to the king of France for the provinces provinces possessed by Henry on the continent, and received the investiture of them:

The pope, alarmed at the war between these two princes, interposed his authority, and excommunicated Richard, as the principal cause of hindering the crusade. But this censure produced not the expected effect. The king of France told the legates, "that the pope had no right to intermeddle in the affairs of his kingdom, especially as nothing more was intended than the chastisement of a vassal who had taken up arms against his lord."

A.D. 1189. Henry now found it impossible to defend his Norman dominions against the joint efforts of Philip and Richard. He found himself abandoned by his friends and subjects, and on the point of being stripped of his dominions, his crown, and perhaps his life, by the unnatural rebellion of an undutiful son. The neutral princes could not behold this inhuman connection without regret. They interposed their authority to stop the flames of rebellion, and sheathe the sword of desolation. A treaty was accordingly concluded at Azay near Tours, by which it was stipulated that Henry should pay twenty thousand marks to Philip; that all his subjects both in England and his transmarine dominions, should swear fealty to Richard; that those barons who had entered into a confederacy with Richard, should receive an indemnity for their offence; that his own nobles should engage to compel him to observe this treaty; and in case of his violating it should join Philip and Richard against him.

Henry signed this humiliating treaty; and to complete his misfortunes, when he demanded a list of the barons who were to receive his pardon, he found at the head of them the name of his son John, who had always been his favourite, and in whom he had placed the most implicit confidence. This shock was too great to be supported by human nature, already stooping under a weight of infirmities, and a series of ill success. He broke out into expressions of the utmost despair, cursed the hour of his birth, and laid his irrevocable malediction on his sons. He retired to Chinon, in all the anguish of a forsaken father, where he died of a broken heart on the sixth of July, two days after he had signed the treaty of Azay, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign.

Henry was endowed with many virtues, but they were allayed with many faults. His genius was piercing, and his learning, considering the age in which he lived, uncommon. His judgment was solid, and his memory remarkably tenacious. He was prudent in council, moderate in prosperity, firm in adversity. He was the most consummate general of his age, and always collected amidst the greatest dangers. He was a generous enemy, a wise legislator, a faithful friend. His religion was that of the pious and sensible christian. The princes of Europe entertained so high an idea of his strict regard for justice, that the kings of Castile and Navarre submitted their differences to his decision; and the sentence he pronounced was revered by both parties. He was temperate, good-natured, and the politest prince of his age. But he was ambitious, violent and haughty. His passion for women awakened the jealousy of his queen, and proved the source of those numerous calamities which disturbed the latter part of his reign, and embittered his domestic happiness. But notwithstanding all his faults and all his misfortunes, he is justly placed in the first class among the kings of England. His virtues were beneficial to his subjects; his vices pernicious only to himself. He was at once the king, the priest, and the father of his people.

He enacted many wholesome laws for securing the peace and promoting the happiness of his subjects; those against murder, robbery, false coining, and the burning of houses, were remarkably severe; because their consequences were highly pernicious; and experience had sufficiently shewn, that pecuniary commutations for crimes were ineffectual to answer the purpose intended. He did not, indeed, abolish the ordeal and single combat, because the people were still ignorant and superstitious; but he admitted either of the parties to challenge a trial by a jury of twelve freeholders. It is asserted, that from the beginning of his reign till his dispute with Becket, no less than an hundred assassinations were committed with impunity by ecclesiastics. It was therefore absolutely necessary to abolish their immunities, in order to preserve the lives of the innocent. The constitutions of Clarendon were calculated to remove this egregious enormity. The clergy were subjected to a trial before a civil magistrate; and the murderers of clergymen, besides the common punishment, were subjected to the forfeiture of their estates, and the confiscation of their goods and chattels. Before these laws were enacted, the clergy were equally exposed to the swords of the laity; penances and submission only formed the punishment inflicted on the assassin of an ecclesiastic. Hence the murderers of Becket, after making a pilgrimage to Rome and performing the penances required, were acquitted of their crime. The constitutions of Clarendon, therefore, were calculated to protect and promote the happiness both of the clergy and laity.

RICHARD I. surnamed COEUR DE LION.

A.D. 1189. THE death of Henry put the undutiful Richard in possession of that crown he had endeavoured to obtain by an unnatural rebellion. But Richard, though of a furious and headstrong disposition, was no stranger to the soft whispers of humanity. At the first sight of the dead body of the late king, he felt the whole force of the stings of a guilty conscience, and exclaimed that he had been the murderer of his father. He viewed with horror his base and unnatural conduct; and saw in a very different point of light the services of his pretended friends, who had instigated him to draw the sword of rebellion, and lift his hand against the life of the most indulgent parent. He discharged them from his services, and, instead of the recompences they expected, he loaded them with reproaches. He despised the courtiers who had basely deserted the interest of their master; and gave his confidence to those who had served his father with zeal and fidelity. It would have been happy for himself and happy for his people, had these prudent measures flowed entirely from wisdom or virtue. But it soon appeared, that Richard was governed by the fallies of passion: his conduct was founded on no settled principles; he formed no regular plan for the government of his people. One of his first acts of regal power, was the releasing his mother from her confinement, and bestowing on her the administration of affairs in England during his absence. He remembered not the unnatural part she had acted in arming children against their father, and sacrificing the lives of thousands at the altar of jealousy.

allegiance from all the orders of the state; so that on his arrival, nothing remained but to have them renewed and ratified. This was accordingly done on the third of September, when he was solemnly crowned at Westminster by Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury.

The ceremony, which was prodigiously magnificent, occasioned a scene of detestable barbarity. The expeditions to the Holy Land, and the cruelties inflicted on the Christians by the Infidels, had filled the minds of the people with a kind of enthusiastic madness. Whatever had even the most remote connection with this spiritual warfare, was sufficient to set the whole nation in a flame. The Jews had long been a despised people, and the sufferings of the Christians at Jerusalem now raised the hatred of the people against them to the highest pitch. Richard knew this, and prudently issued a proclamation, forbidding any of them to appear at Westminster during the ceremony of the coronation. That despised people had long endeavoured, by their assiduous application to traffick, to compensate for the infamy with which they were treated. But their riches, instead of procuring them favour, excited the avarice, as much as their religion did the fury of the people. Desirous of obtaining the protection of the new monarch, the Hebrews collected among themselves a very considerable sum of money, which they were desirous of presenting to Richard on the day of his coronation. Several of the most eminent among them were accordingly selected; and, thinking their business a sufficient exemption from the general prohibition, waited at the gates of Westminster-hall to tender him their present, and their compliments of congratulation. The sight of these Jews, and their disregard of the royal mandate, awakened in the people all the fury of resentment. A tumult was immediately excited, and the poor defenceless Hebrews torn in pieces by the populace. But this sacrifice was far from satisfying the fury of the multitude; they entered the city, and massacred all the Jews that fell into their hands, plundered their houses, and laid them in ashes. The conflagration and carnage continued the whole night, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the chief justiciary to appease the tumult. Several thousands of that unfortunate people fell a sacrifice to the blind enthusiastic fury of a bigotted populace.

Richard was highly incensed against the authors of this inhuman tragedy. He caused several of the principal leaders of the tumult to be put to death, as a warning and terror to others. He also published an edict, strictly forbidding any insult to be offered to the Jews, whom he declared to be under his immediate protection.

Richard had always, during the life of his father, expressed the utmost jealousy of his brother John, whom he considered as a very dangerous rival. But either this passion was now totally annihilated, or absorbed in political considerations; for immediately after his coronation, he lavished his favours on a brother who deserved not his confidence. He granted him the estate of William Pepperel, the castles of Marlborough, Lutterghal, Le Pec, Balfover, Lancaster, Nottingham, Tikhill, and Wallingford, with all the honours and forests annexed to them. Nor were these thought sufficient by the imprudent Richard; he gave him also the earldoms of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, Lancaster, and Gloucester. This generosity was at once profuse and dangerous. But his zeal against the infidels opened another, and more fruitful source of misfortunes.

Richard had, some time since, taken the cross from the hands of the archbishop of Tours, and was now determined to make an expedition to the Holy Land in person. He was, indeed, more a soldier than a devotee; and, to gratify his passion for military glory, and gather laurels in the fields of Palestine, he scrupled not to sacrifice at once the interest of his crown and the welfare of his people. His whole attention was now engrossed with forming schemes for raising money to defray the necessary expences of the expedition. He had already seized upon his father's treasures; and the bishop of Ely happening to die without a will, Richard confiscated his estate, which was very considerable. He exacted the most rigorous imposts from the people; he exposed the crown lands to sale; and even disposed of the great seal of England to William Longchamp, his first minister. Ralph de Glenville, chief justiciary, expostulated with Richard on these proceedings, at once so derogatory to his own dignity, and oppressive to the subject. The king replied, "That he would sell the city of London itself, if he could find a purchaser." This answer shocked the upright justiciary; he was alarmed for his country, and remonstrated freely with the king on the consequences that must attend such precipitate measures. But Richard was not patient of admonition; he so highly resented the liberty taken by the justiciary, that he deprived him of his post, and committed him to prison; nor would he suffer him to be released, till he purchased his freedom at the price of the fifteen thousand pounds. At the same time, he sold the post of justiciary to the bishop of Durham for a thousand marks. He obtained a bull from pope Clement, empowering him to discharge from the crusade all who were unable to undertake the expedition; and excuse others who were unwilling to undergo the fatigues, on paying a proportional sum of money. The king of Scotland purchased, for ten thousand marks, his right of superiority over that kingdom, together with the important fortresses of Roxburgh and Berwick; acquisitions of the greatest consequence ever made by his father. By these iniquitous proceedings he acquired a prodigious sum, amounting, on a moderate computation, to seven millions and a half of our present money.

While Richard was accumulating treasures to defray the expences of the expedition, the clergy were zealously labouring to procure him soldiers. The pulpits resounded with the great merit of serving in the holy war. The confessors enjoined no penances but what tended to promote the grand design of recovering Palestine out of the hands of the infidels, and freeing the Christians in that country from the dreadful burdens laid upon them by the declared enemies of the gospel. The people were fired with enthusiasm; the army soon became numerous; nor was there an officer or common soldier but what furnished himself with common necessities, either from his own stock, or by the assistance of his friends.

The same caprice and unaccountable spirit of despotism that had directed Richard in amassing treasure, directed him also in the choice of persons to conduct the administration of affairs during his absence. He consulted not his council, nor listened to the voice of the people. Longchamp, bishop of Ely, and Pudsey, bishop of Durham, were constituted regents of the kingdom. The former was a Norman of mean extraction, of a dangerous character; and being invested with a legantine commission, he seemed to be armed with authority for the destruction of England. Four of the principal barons of the kingdom were appointed their assistants and counsellors in the administration.

A.D. 1190. Having thus provided for the safety of his kingdom, Richard passed over to the continent, and met Philip of France at Gue de St. Remi. Here the two princes swore mutually to maintain an uninterrupted peace; and defend each other's territories, in case either should be attacked by any other power. It was also agreed between them, that in case either of them died during the crusade, the other was to succeed to the command of his army, and become master of his treasures, in order to carry on the war with success against the infidels.

While Richard was engaged in settling the necessary articles with Philip, Longchamp was employed in raising farther aids for his master; who was hardly departed the kingdom, before the Jews were threatened with a general massacre. Mad with enthusiasm, and exasperated at the cruelties exercised on the Christians in Palestine, the people were persuaded it was a meritorious act to extirpate every person who refused to believe the doctrines of the gospel. Reason and humanity pleaded in vain; the unfortunate Hebrews were destined to destruction. The massacre began at Lynn, where these distressed people were murdered, and their houses burnt to the ground. A similar fate attended those who resided at Stamford, Norwich, St. Edmundsbury, and Lincoln. But the most bloody persecution raged at York, where five hundred men, besides women and children, fell a sacrifice to the barbarous fury of religious zeal. The despised Hebrews, dreading the fate of their brethren, prevailed upon the governor to admit them into the castle, hoping, by that means, to avert the storm of popular fury, which threatened their destruction. They were fatally deceived: the bigotted multitude surrounded the castle, and attacked the works with the utmost violence. The Jews offered to purchase the liberty of retiring at the price of all their riches; but they pleaded in vain! the ear of bigotry was deaf to the voice of compassion. Driven to despair, and finding it impossible to defend the place against such multitudes of enemies, they murdered their wives and children; and after throwing the dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, they set fire to the houses, and perished in the flames. Longchamp made a strict but fruitless inquiry after the authors of this horrid tumult. The laws wanted power to curb the licentiousness of a superstitious people.

The two princes, Philip and Richard, now embarked for the Holy Land; the former at Genoa, and the latter at Marseilles. They met at Messina, where contrary winds, and other accidents, detained them several months. Here those feuds and animosities first broke out, which ultimately defeated the principal design of the expedition. It was not, indeed, reasonable to expect, that two kings, in the flower of youth, haughty and violent, ambitious, valiant, competitors in power, and rivals in honour, would long continue to act in concert, and sacrifice their own passions to the interest of the crusade. Could this, indeed, have been effected, the intention had been answered, and the Holy Land intirely recovered from the infidels. But it soon appeared that a mutual harmony was not to be expected; the torch of discord was lighted up by the hand of jealousy, and threatened both armies with destruction. Philip could not behold, without envy, the forces of his vassal so much superior to his own. The power of Richard filled the breast of Philip with malignity.

Tancred, the king, or rather tyrant, of Sicily, trembled for his dominions. He knew that his despotic administration had excited the hatred of his people, and dreaded the consequences of their putting themselves under the protection of either of these powerful princes. He therefore determined to sow the seeds of animosity between them; and prevent, by their discords, any application being made by the Sicilians. Richard had long been affianced to Alice, the sister of Philip; and the princess had been sent, when very young, to the court of England. The consummation of this marriage, which had been delayed on various pretences, had furnished Philip with reasons for quarrelling with Henry II. but now seemed to be forgotten. Tancred revived the contention, by insinuating to Philip, that his honour was concerned in the marriage of his sister, and that there was room sufficient to suspect the sincerity of Richard. Philip, alarmed at the suggestions of Tancred, immediately demanded that Richard should consummate the nuptials; but the English monarch furnished proofs that Alice had been with child by Henry. Philip was amazed; but thought it more prudent to bury in silence the dishonour of his family; than insist any farther on the performance of his rival's engagement. Richard soon after married the princess Berengara, daughter to Sanchez, king of Navarre, and carried her with him to Palestine. Queen Eleanor conducted the princess to Messina, and gave her son a faithful account of the state of affairs in England. Longchamp, disdaining to have a colleague of equal authority, had thrown the bishop of Durham into prison, and governed the nation by his sole authority; and with all the state and tyranny of a despotic monarch. The king was now convinced of his error; in appointing a person of such mean extraction to direct the affairs of government. He signed a charter, appointing a council, without whose concurrence Longchamp was not to act. This charter Richard sent to England by the archbishop of Rouen and the earl of Striguel. But Longchamp was so confirmed in his power, that it was thought proper to conceal, for some time, the charter of Richard; John, the king's brother, only was informed of this commission.

An event, however, soon happened, which exasperated the nobility, clergy and people, against this imperious churchman. Geoffrey, the king's natural brother, had, some time before Richard's departure for the Holy Land, been elected into the see of York; but some disputes arising between them, Geoffrey had promised his brother not to reside in England during his absence in Palestine. Queen Eleanor, however, having procured a dispensation of his promise, Geoffrey passed over into England to take possession of his see: Longchamp ordered him to be arrested; but the archbishop having received intelligence of his design, fled to the monastery of St. Martin, and took sanctuary in the church. The regent's officers paid no regard to the sanctity of the place; they dragged him from the altar in his sacerdotal robes, and committed him to Dover castle.

This tyrannical proceeding excited the detestation of all ranks of people. The clergy were particularly alarmed. The bishop of Lincoln excommunicated all concerned in this sacrilegious violence, and the sentence was confirmed in a general convocation held at Reading. The bishops even threatened the kingdom with an interdict, if Geoffrey was not immediately released. The regent was now sufficiently alarmed, and Geoffrey was set at liberty. But this was not sufficient: it was determined to put a final period to the despotic administration of Longchamp. A general assembly of the nobles and prelates was accordingly assembled, where the king's charter was read, and the legate summoned to attend. He promised to assist at the conference; but conscious that his actions would not bear inspection, he fled to London, and shut himself up in the Tower. He soon found that it would be impossible to defend the fortrefs any length of time; and therefore submitted to appear before the great council of the nation, where he was deprived of his posts; and finding himself deserted by those who had basked in the sunshine of his greatness, he passed over to the continent, in order to apply to the pope for redress. The great seal of England was given to Walter, archbishop of Rouen, a person of great prudence, modesty and integrity. He always consulted his colleagues in the affairs of government; and, by his prudent management, restored peace and tranquillity to the kingdom.

When Eleanor departed from Sicily, the two princes made preparations for passing into Palestine. The emperor Frederic had left Germany some time before the kings of France and England were ready to embark; and passed into Asia, at the head of an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men. He obtained two victories over the sultan of Cogni, but bathing himself in the river Cydnus, when in a profuse sweat, he was seized with a violent fever, and died a few days after. This misfortune rendered his conquests of no advantage to the Christians.

His victories must, however, have been dearly purchased; for at the death of the emperor, when the command devolved upon Conrad, his son, the army was diminished to eight thousand fighting men. During two years, these troops, joined with the Christians of Asia, had been employed in the siege of Acre; but the city, receiving continual succours by sea, and the army of Saladin harassing the besiegers by land, very little hopes remained of their becoming masters of the city, or even of being able to support themselves against the attacks of the enemy. Repeated dispatches were therefore sent to Messina, imploring the assistance of Philip and Richard. The former embarked his forces, and sailed immediately to the relief of the Christian army before Acre; but the latter continued some time longer in Sicily, waiting for express from England.

Richard left Messina on the tenth of April, with a fleet of one hundred and fifty large ships, and fifty-three galleys, and directed his course towards Acre. But before he could reach the coast of Syria, a dreadful storm arose, which separated his fleet, and stranded three of his largest ships on the island of Cyprus. Isaac, the emperor, or tyrant of that island, though a professor of the Christian religion, was so far from assisting these distressed soldiers, who were passing into Asia, to defend the persecuted followers of their common Master, that he used them in a very cruel manner, and committed them to prison. Exasperated at this ungenerous treatment, Richard, who had taken shelter in the harbours of Candia, sent a messenger to the tyrant, demanding that his subjects should be set at liberty, and their effects restored. But Isaac, instead of complying with so reasonable a demand, returned an insolent answer. Richard immediately sailed to Cyprus, landed his forces, and totally routed the tyrant's army. Isaac, whom a single stroke of adversity humbled in the dust, laid his crown at the feet of Richard, who sent him, in silver chains, to Tripoli; and Richard was placed, by the general consent of the people, on the throne of Cyprus.

The English monarch, however, staid no longer in the island than was necessary to secure his new conquest. He embarked his forces, and sailed for Palestine. In his passage, he took a very large ship belonging to Saladin, having on board provisions and military stores for the garrison of Acre, together with a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men. The loss of this ship was of the most fatal consequence to the Infidels, who were now driven to despair; while the appearance of the English fleet inspired the Christian army with the sincerest joy. The military operations, which had languished for some time, were now revived with double fury; the most amazing acts of valour were every day performed, and the besieged soon reduced to the utmost extremity. Saladin, finding it impossible to succour the city, gave the garrison leave to surrender. The articles of capitulation were accordingly signed, and the city delivered up to the crusaders, together with five hundred Christian captives.

Elated with this success, the two leaders formed the design of marching directly to Jerusalem, in order to wrest that city out of the hands of the Infidels. Every thing was ready for the march of the army, and the hopes of the crusaders were raised to the highest pitch, when a dissention arose between the two chiefs, and frustrated all those pleasing expectations. The prodigious valour of Richard during the siege of Acre, his liberality to the soldiers, and the magnificence he displayed on every occasion, procured the hearts of the crusaders, and filled the breast of Philip with malignant jealousy. He, however, concealed his passion, till a dispute, which now happened between Guy of Lusignan, and Conrad, marquis of Montferrat, relative to the crown of Jerusalem, gave him an opportunity of expressing his resentment. Richard espoused the pretensions of the former, and Philip those of the latter. During this contest, which, in reality, had nothing more than an empty title for its object, several sharp messages passed between them; and Richard complained that Philip obstructed the progress of the confederate army; adding, that he was ready to sacrifice every personal consideration to the interest of the cause they had undertaken to support at such immense expence.

Philip was now determined to abandon the enterprise; but ashamed to avow his real motives, had recourse to artifice and deception. He pretended, that the climate of Palestine did not agree with his constitution, and therefore desired Richard would permit him to return. The most solemn promise having been made between them not to abandon the expedition without their joint consent; Richard, after exacting from him the most dreadful oath, that he would not attempt any thing against his dominions, but, on the contrary, protect and defend them to the utmost of his power, consented to his departure, and even furnished him with two of his best ships for carrying that prince and his retinue to Europe.

Philip left the command of his army to the duke of Burgundy; and after giving him public orders to pay the same obedience to the king of England as to himself, he sailed for his own dominions, which he ought not, perhaps, to have left, but to which he certainly ought not to have returned without bringing with him new acquisitions of glory. Nor was Philip the only person who deserted the enterprise; multitudes followed his example; so that the numerous army of the Christians was very greatly reduced.

Richard now remained the undisputed master of the field of honour, and determined to attempt some enterprise worthy the name of the leader of the Christian armies. He accordingly made a general attack upon Saladin's camp; but met with so noble a resistance, that he was obliged to retreat with considerable loss. This check, however, made no change in Richard's resolutions: that martial spirit, which formed his ruling passion, supported him under every misfortune. He determined to march from Acre to Joppa, and fortify all the places that fell into his hands. Saladin posted himself in the road, at the head of an army of three hundred thousand men, to oppose his passage. The martial soul of Richard glowed at this opportunity of signaling his courage. He was also persuaded, that by defeating the army of Saladin, he should open to himself a free passage to Jerusalem, and, perhaps, make himself master of that famous city in a short interval of time. Both armies prepared for a general engagement, which was to decide the fate of thousands, and, possibly, of Palestine itself.

The right wing of the Christian army was commanded by James d'Avesnes, the left by the duke of Burgundy; while Richard in person led the center, or main body. Saladin had concealed part of his troops on the right behind some hills, which covered them from the sight of the Christians. On this body of reserve he placed his greatest hopes of victory; and therefore, without altering his position, waited the attack of the enemy, who began the action with their right wing. The Saracens supported the shock with great resolution; and, by the superiority of their numbers, put that body into great disorder. Their leader, James d'Avesnes, was slain, in endeavouring to rally his broken troops, and lead them once more against the Infidels. The duke of Burgundy, at the head of the left wing, made a furious attack upon the right of the enemy. The Saracens, for some time, supported themselves with great resolution; but on receiving orders from Saladin to retreat as they fought, the duke was deceived, and followed them a considerable way beyond the body of the army. Saladin perceiving that his left wing stood firm, and that the duke of Burgundy was separated from the rest of the army, ordered the body that lay concealed behind the hills to move forward. These troops troops descending the eminences in prodigious numbers, surrounded the duke's forces, and made a dreadful slaughter.

The fate of the Christian army now depended on the valour and conduct of Richard. He had been very successful where he had made his attacks; and though he met with a stout resistance, had compelled the troops that opposed him to retreat in disorder. He was still pursuing the broken forces, when he was informed of the disorder of his right wing, and the danger of his left. He immediately gave over the pursuit; and marching to the duke of Burgundy's assistance, fell upon the victorious troops of Saladin with such impetuosity, that he soon wrested from them the palm of victory, which they thought they had obtained. Richard, on this occasion, performed the most astonishing acts of valour; and those who before were filled with envy, were now struck with admiration. He is said to have met the famous Saladin, and to have dismounted that celebrated leader, who must have fallen into the hands of the English monarch, had not the Saracens used more than common efforts to rescue him from his dangerous situation. But however that be, the valour of Richard entirely changed the fortune of the day, and Saladin was obliged to reinforce his right wing with part of his victorious troops on the left. This motion, which caused some disorder in that part of the Saracen army, gave the right wing of the Christians time to recover themselves; and finding the opposition they had before met with to grow weaker and weaker, they quickly rallied; and falling with the utmost fury on the Saracen troops that opposed them, forced them to seek their safety in a precipitate flight.

Richard still maintained the battle on the right with an intrepidity more than human, in spite of the vast superiority of the enemy, who now directed their whole force against the English monarch. He was, however, in danger of being overpowered by numbers, had not his right wing, meeting with no farther opposition, advanced to his assistance. Finding themselves attacked in flank by a fresh body of forces, the Saracens began to give way; nor was it in the power of Saladin, though he exerted his utmost, to rally them. The Christians took advantage of this disorder, and pressed the Saracens with too much vigour, that they betook themselves to flight. Above fifty thousand of the Infidels were left dead on the field of battle. James d'Avesnes was the only person of distinction among the Christians that fell in this memorable engagement.

This defeat struck the Saracens with a panic: they abandoned the maritime cities of Ascalon, Cæsarea, and Joppa, after demolishing the fortifications. Richard marched directly to Joppa, where he staid some time to repair the fortifications; that if he should be obliged to retreat, he might have a secure port to embark his forces for Europe. While he continued at Joppa, he frequently amused himself with hunting in the neighbourhood, attended only by a few of his intimate friends. As he was one day returning from the chase, with only six persons in his train, he alighted from his horse, laid himself down under a tree, and fell asleep. He was, however, soon roused by the approach of a small party of Saracen horse, passing by the place. Richard immediately mounted his horse; and as the Saracens were few in number, pursued them to some distance. The enemy pretended to fly before him, but artfully drew him into an ambuscade, where he was suddenly surrounded by a squadron of horse. He defended himself for a considerable time with great bravery, without the least thought of retreating, notwithstanding the prodigious disparity of numbers. But even the valour of Richard would have been exerted in vain, had not one of his attendants, by a remarkable presence of mind, saved him from the impending danger. Four of his attendants were already slain, when William Despreaux, the only surviving friend of Richard, cried out, in the Saracen language, "Hold! I am the king of England!" Every eye was now directed to Despreaux; and those who were engaged with Richard immediately left him, that they might have a share in seizing the person they imagined to be the English monarch. This stratagem gave Richard an opportunity of escaping from the enemy. Despreaux did not discover himself till he came before Saladin; when falling at his feet, he ingenuously confessed the deception he had made use of to save his master. Saladin commended his fidelity, and treated him with the utmost respect; but sensible that Richard would never suffer a person who had so signally assisted him to remain in confinement; demanded ten Saracen emirs in exchange for so faithful a servant.

Having finished the fortifications of Joppa, Richard began his march towards Jerusalem, fully determined to wrest that famous city out of the hands of the Infidels. Saladin drew up his army on the plains of Rama, to oppose his passage. A second battle ensued, and Saladin was a second time defeated. Nothing now opposed his march to Jerusalem; but the Knights Templars, who were in the interest of Philip of France, and therefore envious of the glory which Richard must obtain by the conquest of the Holy City, persuaded the English monarch to lay aside his design till the ensuing spring, and take up his winter quarters at Ascalon. Richard, who suspected not the real motive of the knights, followed their advice, marched directly to Ascalon, and repaired the fortifications which Saladin's forces had demolished.

A. D. 1192. The dispute between Guy de Lusignan and Conrade, with regard to the crown of Jerusalem, was now revived; and the duke of Burgundy refused to act any longer in conjunction with the English. The French troops retired into places of safety, and passed their time in luxury and indolence. Still desirous of making himself master of Jerusalem, the great object for which the crusade had been undertaken, Richard put an end to the dispute, by declaring Conrade king of Jerusalem. But at the same time, he indemnified Guy for the loss of a nominal, by presenting him with a real crown. He bestowed upon him the kingdom of Cyprus. Pleased with having obtained the honour he had so long desired, Conrade, who was now at Tyre with his fleets, made preparations for joining the Christian army at Ascalon. But before he could embark, he was stabbed in the streets of that city by two assassins sent for that purpose by a Saracen prince, generally stiled The Old Man of the Mountains. The subjects of that chief esteemed assassination meritorious, when sanctified by his mandate: they courted death, were it even in the extremities of Europe, in the execution of his orders. The prince justified this cruel proceeding, in a letter he wrote to the duke of Austria, some time after; and declared, that the marquis fell by the poniards of his soldiers, in revenge for his having put to death one of his merchants, whose ship was forced into Tyre by a storm.

The death of the marquis proved a fresh obstruction to the progress of the Christian army; but his widow being soon after married to Henry, count of Champagne, that nobleman was, in her right, declared king of Jerusalem; and, at his instance, the French consented to join the army of Richard, who immediately marched towards the capital of Palestine, which he was determined to besiege. But just as he reached the neighbourhood of that city, he fortunately met the caravan passing from Babylon to Jerusalem. The whole consisted of three thousand camels, and four thousand mules, loaded with the rich merchandize of the East, and escorted by ten thousand horse. The Saracens no sooner perceived the Christian army than they began to retreat; but Richard, at the head of five thousand cavalry, attacked them with such fury, that they were put to flight, and the whole caravan fell into the hands of the Christians. Richard, who was equally generous and brave, distributed the whole booty, which was of prodigious value, among the soldiers.

Soon after this successful incident, the army ascended the neighbouring eminences, from the summits of which they had a fair prospect of the celebrated city of Jerusalem, and the reduction of which was the great object of all their labour and toil. But when Richard thought himself sure of conquest, and of putting a glorious period to the expedition, his hopes were rendered abortive by divisions among the leaders of the confederated army. It was urged, in a council of war, that the scarcity which then reigned in the neighbouring countries, would render it difficult, if not impossible, to procure provisions necessary for their subsistence. These reasons were far from convincing Richard; he was determined to besiege the city, which was now almost destitute of troops, the greater part of the garrison having been drawn out to reinforce the army of Saladin. The duke of Burgundy perceiving it would be impossible to divert Richard from his purpose, and envious of the glory which the English monarch would acquire by the reduction of Jerusalem, separated his forces from the allied army, and marched directly to Tyre. The duke of Austria followed the example of the French general: he abandoned Richard at a time when fortune offered them the palm of victory, and the Saracens, shut up within the walls of Jerusalem, trembled for their liberty.

Richard now saw all his hopes of conquest vanish like the morning cloud. It would have been absolute madness for him to besiege a city famous for its strength, especially as Saladin, at the head of a numerous army, hovered on the mountains, ready to seize the maritime places the moment they were deserted by the Christians. But the desire of reducing Jerusalem was still the darling passion of his soul. He even submitted to solicit the assistance of the duke of Burgundy, and the king of Jerusalem himself undertook the office of ambassador. But every attempt was made in vain. Steady to his purpose of depriving Richard of the glory of taking the capital of Palestine, he refused to join the Christian army, under pretence of his having no authority to expose the troops of his master in such desperate service. The English monarch was therefore obliged to abandon the enterprise, and accordingly marched his army to Acre. But he had hardly reached the neighbourhood of that city, before advice arrived that Saladin had taken Joppa, and was pressing the siege of the castle with so much fury, that the garrison must surrender, unless speedily relieved. Richard, who never abandoned his soldiers in distress, ordered his army to march to the relief of Joppa; while he himself, at the head of a small body of chosen troops, embarked at Acre, and reached Joppa some time before his army. The name of Richard was terrible to the Infidels: he fell immediately on the besiegers with such irresistible fury, that the Saracens, who were very slightly armed for defence, abandoned the enterprise, and retreated to the neighbouring mountains.

But it was impossible for valour, however extraordinary, when assisted only by a handful of followers, to defeat the numerous armies of Saladin, and carry their victories to the gates of Jerusalem. At the same time, the enthusiasm of the crusaders began to yield to time and fatigue: they were now more desirous of visiting their own country than the capital of Palestine; and of forgetting their labours and toil in their native vallies, than reposing on the top of the hill of Sion. Richard was no stranger to their wishes, and therefore determined to seize this favourable opportunity of concluding a three year's truce with Saladin, on the following conditions: That the sea-coast from Tyre to Joppa should remain in the hands of the Christians, without any molestation from the Saracens: That the Christians should have free liberty to go in pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, and be permitted to trade in any part of the Sultan's extensive dominions.

Saladin, who surpassed all the princes of the crusade in humanity and moderation, in science and knowledge, continued faithful to his engagements. He gave an illustrious proof, at the taking of Jerusalem, that he was always attentive to the soft-whispers of compassion. He granted to the wife of Lusignan a capitulation she could not hope to obtain. He permitted her to retire wherever she pleased, without demanding any ransom for the Greeks who inhabited the city. On his making his entry into Jerusalem, many women came and threw themselves at his feet; some begging he would restore to them their husbands; and others, their children or their fathers, who were then his prisoners; and he granted their requests with a generosity of which that part of the world had yet afforded no example. But that generous prince, who had formed the highest idea of Richard's military virtues, lived not to see the expiration of the truce; he died at Damascus just before that period arrived, lamented even by the Christians. The last action of his life deserves to be handed down with applause to posterity; it would have shone conspicuous even in a constellation of Christian virtues. He ordered his winding-sheet to be carried through every street of Damascus; while a crier, preceding it, proclaimed with a loud voice, "This is all that remains to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East." By his last will, he left large charities to be distributed to the poor of every denomination: the Christian, the Jew, and the Mahometan, shared equally his bounty.

Richard, desirous of passing, with the utmost expedition, into England, where his presence was absolutely necessary to regulate the affairs of government, embarked in a single vessel, but was unfortunately shipwrecked near Aquileia. He knew the danger of crossing so large an extent of territory with his numerous attendants, and therefore disguised himself in the habit of a pilgrim, intending to travel through Germany, as the safest way, to his own dominions. But he was unable to conceal himself from the piercing eye of curious inquiry. Some German officers, who had served under duke Leopold of Austria, at the siege of Acre, knew the royal pilgrim, and gave their master the pleasing information. Rejoiced at having it in his power to retaliate the affronts he had received from Richard in the Holy Land, he caused him to be seized in the night, at Gynacia, a village near Vienna, and sent in chains to the emperor Henry VI. A Christian prince did not blush to load with irons, and confine in a loathsome prison, the hero of the crusade.

It has been already mentioned, that Longchamp was obliged to quit the kingdom for his mal-administration. Practised in the paths of vice, and a stranger to every sentiment of justice, he exerted all his abilities to excite the resentment of the Roman pontiff against the English. He represented them as a rebellious generation, ready to trample upon the spiritual authority of St. Peter's successors; and that their proceedings against him were nothing more than a prelude of attempts of a much higher nature, the destruction of the pontifical dignity. Celestine III. who now filled the papal chair, was alarmed for his power. Without making any inquiry into the truth of Longchamp's report, he furnished the prelate with letters to the English bishops, commanding them to excommunicate prince John, and all who were concerned in the deprivation of the late chancellor. But the people of England no longer trembled at the papal thunder; they had learned to distinguish between fanaticism and a reasonable submission to the orders of the church: they firmly defended the constitution of their country, and the flaming bolt of spiritual tyranny was launched in vain.

But this opposition, though virtuous in its nature, was excited in defence of a person who merited not the the care of the English. John never scrupled to trample upon the laws of equity and religion, when impelled by his own interest. Ambitious of power, and careless of the means by which he attained it, he exerted all his abilities to pave his way to the crown, should any accident happen to his brother during his absence. He was, indeed, sensible that he had no claim either to the sceptre of England, or the foreign dominions of Richard, while Arthur, duke of Britany, son to his elder brother Geoffrey, lived; and therefore had recourse to every artifice for depriving the legal heir of his just rights, and usurping a throne to which he had no pretensions. He invited Longchamp, whom he had formerly banished from the kingdom, to return, hoping, that by joining their interest, they should be able to distress an administration that had so nobly defended the liberties of England. Pleased with the acquisition of so powerful a protector, the bishop landed in England, and dispatched a messenger with the news of his arrival. But the ministry were not to be intimidated; they informed the prelate, that unless he immediately left the kingdom, they would seize his person as a traitor. Longchamp, whom vice had rendered timorous, waited not the consequences; he embarked directly, and returned to the continent.

Soon after his departure, the news of Richard's imprisonment reached England, and caused a general consternation. John considered it as a very fortunate event, and determined to improve it to his own advantage. He passed over into France, and threw himself into the arms of Philip, the sworn enemy of his brother. Queen Eleanor, on the other hand, exerted herself in the cause of Richard; and conjured the council to take every precaution to prevent the fatal consequences that might attend this alarming accident.

A. D. 1193. Philip now hoped to be amply revenged on Richard for the indignities he had suffered. He revived the calumny, that the marquis of Montferrat was assassinated by Richard, though it was well known that he fell by the enthusiastic subjects of the Old Man of the Mountains. But under this frivolous pretence he persuaded his vassals, that the oaths they had taken not to invade the dominions of a prince engaged in the crusade, were no longer binding in regard to the king of England. He also concluded a treaty with John, who now proved himself at once an unnatural brother and a traitor to his country. He stipulated to deliver into the hands of Philip a great part of Normandy; and received, in return, the investiture of all Richard's transmarine dominions. The title of young Arthur, as well as his own oaths, were forgotten by the ambitious Frenchman. In consequence of this treaty, Philip invaded Normandy, at the head of a powerful army, made himself master of several places, and extended his ravages to the gates of Rouen. But the time of the service of his vassals being expired, he concluded a truce with the English, who stipulated to pay him twenty thousand marks.

While the sword of perfidy was thus laying waste the dominions of Richard, that prince himself was suffering, in a German prison, every kind of insult and indignity. A warrior, who, at the head of his army, made even the mighty Saladin tremble, was now treated with contempt by a petty prince of the empire. He was produced before the diet, and accused of several crimes, which had no existence but in the malignant minds of his enemies. He justified himself with an eloquence that confounded his persecutors, and covered them with confusion. He remonstrated against the ungenerous treatment he had met with from those whom he had rescued from the power of the Infidels before Acre; and complained, that after demonstrating his zeal in the cause of Christianity, he had been confined in a prison, and experienced a treatment hardly proper for slaves, in a country that had expressed the utmost ardour for the crusade, and by princes who professed the tenets of the gospel.

The pope now declared loudly in his favour: he threatened to lay the whole empire under an interdict, if Richard was not released. The princes of the diet were ashamed of the emperor's conduct; and loudly declared, that they could not suffer the Germanic body to be stained with the imputation of violating the laws of nature and nations, by detaining in prison, without any just cause, the person of a great king, who had so nobly ventured his life in the cause of Christianity. The emperor was alarmed, and offered to set Richard at liberty; but demanded one hundred and fifty thousand marks, about three hundred thousand pounds of our present money, for his ransom; of which one hundred thousand were to be paid before he was released from prison, and hostages delivered for the payment of the remainder.

The demand of the emperor was no sooner known in England, than every method was put in practice for raising the enormous sum. Twenty shillings were levied on every knight's fee, and the money already paid into the treasury applied to purchase the liberty of a prince, who had so nobly resisted the power of the Infidels. The churches and monasteries melted down their plate; the nobles, bishops, and abbots, paid a fourth part of their annual revenues, and the parochial clergy a tenth of their tithes. William, king of Scotland, contributed two thousand marks towards the king's ransom. The necessary sum being thus raised, queen Eleanor, and Walter, archbishop of Rouen, passed over to the continent, paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Austria; and Richard was set at liberty, in presence of the archbishops of Mentz and Gologne, and most of the German nobility.

A. D. 1194. Fortunately for Richard, he escaped the perfidy of the emperor. Ambassadors from Philip of France arrived soon after his deliverance, offering prodigious advantages, if the emperor would confine the English monarch one year longer. The base soul of Henry embraced the offer, and dispatched messengers to arrest Richard, and bring him back to the Imperial court. But his treacherous designs were rendered abortive by the agility of Richard, who embarked at the mouth of the Schelde, and lost sight of the German shore before the emperor's messengers arrived at Antwerp. Philip was astonished when he heard that Richard was set at liberty; and wrote a letter to John in the following terms: "Take care of yourself; the devil is broke loose."

Richard was received with the utmost demonstrations of joy and affection by his subjects. They beheld with rapture a prince who had suffered such a dreadful captivity, after so nobly defending the cause of the Christians, and causing the name of an Englishman to be revered in nations before unacquainted with the appellation. This endearing behaviour banished from the mind of Richard the idea of all the indignities he had experienced during his imprisonment; all his alarms, his fatigues, and his sufferings, were buried in oblivion. He seemed even desirous of wiping off the ignominy of his captivity by ordering the ceremony of his coronation to be repeated. He soon after declared his intention of making a resumption of all the crown revenues, and annulling all the contracts he had made before his departure for the Holy Land. He alledged, that the purchasers had already indemnified themselves by the profits of the estates; that necessity had compelled him to make these grants; that the money had been spent in an expedition favoured both by the clergy and laity; and that therefore it was unjust the crown should bear the whole burden. These reasons were unnecessary; none disputed the justice of this resumption. All the purchasers gave up the possessions they had obtained from the king, and seemed to vie with one another who should be the first to make the required surrender. A parliament was also called at Northampton, where Richard demanded justice against his brother John, and his principal abettor, Hugh, bishop of Coventry. They were both cited to appear within forty days, and answer the charge exhibited against them. They refused to obey the summons; on which John was attainted of high treason; and the prelate ordered to be tried by the bishops in his sacerdotal capacity, and in the king's court, as sheriff of the county.

These transactions did not, however, divert the attention of Richard from the resolution he had formed of taking ample vengeance on Philip for his perfidy. A monarch less passionate and haughty than Richard could not have been easily prevailed upon to pardon such detestable conduct. He raised a powerful army, and passed over into Normandy, vowing to execute the most dreadful revenge against the faithless Philip, who, contrary to the most solemn oaths, and in defiance of all laws, both human and divine, had invaded his territories, and endeavoured to prolong the time of his captivity. But the hostilities between two such powerful monarchs, thoroughly exasperated against each other, produced no memorable events. A few castles taken, a few straggling parties surprised, and a rencounter of horse, form the principal actions of this campaign. The only action of any consequence happened at Fretteval, between the French and English cavalry, when the former were totally routed; and Philip lost his chartulary, or register of charters, which he always carried with him, containing the several particulars of the revenues of the prince, a list of his vassals, and the state of the slaves and freemen. This misfortune obliged Philip to make a new register, in which his prerogatives were rather increased than diminished. During this war, prince John, who was destitute both of honour and integrity, deserted the king of France, as he had formerly done his brother. Having invited to dinner all the officers of the garrison of Evreux, where he commanded, he caused them to be massacred, put the whole garrison to the sword, and delivered up the place to the king of England, of whom he craved pardon for his offences. Queen Eleanor interceded, and the king received him into favour. "I forgive him," said Richard, "and hope to forget his injuries as easily as he will my clemency."

About this time the duke of Austria having crushed his leg by a fall from his horse at a tournament, was seized with a fever; and finding his end approaching, was struck with remorse for his cruel behaviour to Richard. An intire restitution was not in his power; but he ordered, by his will, that all the English hostages should be set at liberty, and the remainder of the king's ransom remitted. His son seemed inclined to disobey the orders of his father; but the clergy interposed, and obliged him to perform them.

A.D. 1196. The animosities which subsisted between Philip and Richard occasioned a continual series of hostilities and truces, which were broken almost as soon as concluded. They were, indeed, nothing more than necessary cessations from war, till both princes could recruit their armies. To support these military expeditions, Richard was obliged to load the English with taxes, which excited an universal complaint among the people; and the great talents of Hubert, the chief justiciary, were hardly sufficient to prevent the general discontent from breaking out into open rebellion.

These disturbances were greatly increased by the daily harangues of one William Fitz Osbert, a person of mean birth, and still meaner appearance. He was a lawyer by profession, but pretended to be the advocate of the poor; and in order to render himself still more remarkable, he suffered his beard to grow to an enormous length, from which circumstance he acquired the appellation of Longbeard. He was continually exciting the spirit of resentment in the poor, against the rich, by the most inflammatory speeches; pretending there was a collusion among the great to ease themselves of the load of public taxes, and throw the whole weight on the shoulders of the labouring people, who were considered in no better light than that of beasts of burden. These insinuations produced the desired effect; the fury of the people was raised to a height bordering upon madness; and a tumult ensued in St. Paul's church, where several persons lost their lives.

This dangerous insurrection alarmed the justiciary, who ordered Longbeard to appear before him; but he was so far from obeying the summons, that he killed the officer who delivered the citation. The more rational part of his followers were struck with horror at this inhuman action: they abandoned the pretended advocate for the rights of the people, and a few of the lowest of the rabble only now followed Longbeard. He saw the desertion of the greater part of his audience, but continued, for some days, to rob and murder his fellow citizens with great barbarity. It was now time for the government to interpose, in order to prevent an open rebellion. A strong party of soldiers were accordingly sent into the city, with strict orders to apprehend the incendiary, dead or alive. The rioters were struck with terror, and retired, with Longbeard at their head, to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where they shut themselves up, hoping that a general insurrection would be excited in their favour. They were deceived; the citizens saw their error, and abandoned the wretch, who had deceived them, to punishment. Longbeard, however, refused to surrender; and being driven from the body of the church, he retreated, at the head of his followers, into the steeple, from whence they discharged a shower of stones, darts, and other missiles, on the heads of the assailants. Unwilling to expose the lives of his soldiers to the attacks of a company of desperadoes, the officer caused a large quantity of wet straw to be carried into the body of the church, and set on fire. The smoke effectually put an end to all opposition; and the insurgents, to avoid suffocation, surrendered at discretion. Longbeard was sentenced to be drawn at a horse's tail through the principal streets of the city, and afterwards to be hung in chains, with nine of his principal accomplices.

A.D. 1197. The war in Normandy was still carried on with unremitted animosity, but produced few remarkable events. In one of these battles, Peter de Dreux, bishop of Beauvais, a martial prelate, and cousin-german to the king of France, was taken prisoner. Richard, who hated that prelate, threw him into prison, and loaded him with irons. The bishop applied to the pope for redress. The pontiff immediately demanded his liberty, calling him his son, and insisting highly on the privileges of the church. The king sent the coat of mail, which the bishop had worn in battle, and which was besmeared with blood, with the words of Jacob's sons to their father, "This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or not." The pontiff replied, "That the coat sent by the king did not belong to a son of the church, but to a son of the camp; and that the prisoner was at Richard's mercy." The prelate, thus abandoned, was obliged to purchase his liberty at the price of ten thousand marks.

A.D. 1199. Philip finding no advantage could be gained over the English monarch by arms, and weary of a war which exhausted his country, applied to pope Innocent III. who then filled the papal chair, to employ his good offices in bringing about a peace with Richard. The pope readily complied with his request; and sent cardinal Peter into France, to act as mediator between the contending parties. A negotiation was accordingly begun, and a considerable progress made in a treaty for a durable peace; when the death of Richard put a final period to the labours of the pontiff.

A peasant plowing a field in the lordship of Vidomar, mar, viscount of Limoges, found a treasure, containing, besides money, several valuable pieces of antiquity. The peasant delivered the whole to Vidomar, who sent a part of it to Richard as a present. This did not satisfy the prince; he claimed the whole, as superior lord of the soil; and, at the head of a company of Brabanders, besieged the count in the castle of Chalus. The garrison offered to surrender; but Richard replied, that since he had given him the trouble of coming in person to besiege the place, to recover what was properly his own; he would enter the castle by force, and hang every one of them upon the walls. The same day, Richard, attended only by Margadee, the leader of the Brabanders, approached the castle, to survey the works; when one Bertram de Gourdon discharged an arrow from a cross-bow, which pierced his shoulder. Richard, however, gave orders for the assault, took the castle by storm, and hanged up the whole garrison, except Bertram, whom he reserved for a more cruel death. The wound was not, of itself, dangerous; but the surgeon, by his preposterous treatment, rendered it mortal. Richard perceiving his end approaching, ordered Gourdon to be brought into his presence. "Wretch," said the king, "what have I ever done to you, that you have fought my life?" "What have you done to me," replied the prisoner with a cool and intrepid air, "you killed my father, and my two brothers, with your own hand, and you intended to hang myself. I am now in your power; take your revenge: I shall willingly submit to the severest tortures, provided I can think I have delivered the world from so great a tyrant." Richard felt the justice of the reply, and ordered Gourdon to be set at liberty. But Macardee seized the unhappy archer, caused him to be sea'd alive, and then hanged: Richard did not long survive the fate of Gourdon: he paid the debt of nature on the sixth of April, in the tenth year of his reign, and the forty-second of his age: He died without issue;

Richard excelled all the princes of his age in heroic valour; nor were his abilities as a general inferior to his courage. These talents form the most shining part of his character; and procured him the appellation of The Lion-hearted, Coeur de Lion. Military glory was the darling passion of his soul, and hence his reign became a continual scene of oppression and misfortunes. His character is a compound of remarkable virtues, and remarkable vices. He was open, generous, valiant, and sincere; but he was revengeful, ambitious, haughty, and cruel. He was at once both meanly avaricious, and idly profuse. Few princes ever possessed a greater share of understanding, a more solid judgment, or a more persuasive eloquence; but his headstrong passions too often diverted them to improper objects. His ingratitude and want of filial affection are unpardonable. He was no friend to the superstitious bigotry of his age; the love of glory carried him into the fields of Palestine. He saw and detested the practices of the greater part of his clergy. Being pressed by Fulk, a zealous preacher of the crusades, to abandon his vices, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three favourite daughters, he returned him the following answer: "Your counsel is just. I give my pride to the Templars, my avarice I bestow upon the monks; and my voluptuousness I resign to my prelates." But, with all his faults, he was beloved by the English, though they severely felt the weight of the taxes necessary to support his military expeditions.

JOHN, surnamed LACKLAND.

A.D. 1199. JOHNS, who obtained the appellation of Lackland because his father left him no inheritance, had made preparations for ascending the throne during the captivity of his brother; though Richard, before his departure for the Holy Land, had appointed Arthur, son to his brother Geoffrey, his successor, and who was confessedly the lawful heir to the crown. Richard, indeed, afterwards changed his mind, and, by his last will, left his sceptre to his brother John. Possibly he imagined, that Arthur, who was only twelve years of age, and wholly a stranger to the English, was incapable of supporting his pretensions against the faction of his brother.

Strengthened by the declaration of Richard, John found no difficulty in prevailing on the English to declare in his favour; but the barons of his transmarine dominions supported the pretensions of Arthur, whom they considered as their lawful sovereign, whose right his predecessor had no power to set aside. Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, declared openly in his favour. But Constantia, the mother of Arthur, fearing the barons would not be able to support the title of her son against the forces of his rival, sent the prince to Paris, and put him under the protection of Philip. Pleased with the opportunity of embarrassing the affairs of the king of England, Philip declared in favour of the young duke of Britany; garrisoned all his towns and castles, and caused him to be educated with his own son. But being involved in a quarrel with the court of Rome, on the subject of his divorce with his queen Infelburga, he found it necessary to agree to an accommodation, and a final period seemed to be put to all disputes.

John was now at liberty to pass over into England; where he met with no opposition; and was crowned at Westminster on the twenty-seventh of May, in presence of a numerous assembly of the principal nobility and clergy.

A.D. 1200. But John's vices were alone sufficient to raise him very powerful enemies. He fell in love with Isabella; daughter and heiress of Aymar, count of Arigoulesme, one of the most celebrated beauties of the age. His queen, the heiress of the Gloucester family, was still alive; and Isabella was betrothed to Hugh, earl of Marche. The nuptials, indeed, on account of her tender age, had never been consummated; but she had, some time since, been delivered into the hands of that nobleman. So many difficulties seemed to form an unsurmountable barrier to John's destructive passion; but he disdained to submit to the laws of his country, though founded on the solid basis of virtue. Under pretence of consanguinity, he procured a divorce from Rome; and persuaded Aymar to carry off his daughter, whom he soon after married. The pope was highly exasperated at these irregular proceedings; but John regarded neither the thunder of the Vatican, nor the resentment of the injured earl.

A.D. 1201. The art of conciliation was not in the catalogue of John's virtues. He took no care to soften the resentment of the earl of Marche; he considered even the most distant advances towards submission as a disgrace to royalty. He pursued the same imprudent conduct in England; by rigorously executing the forest-laws, which were thought to be sufficiently abrogated by the charter of Henry II. The earl of Marche saw the misunderstanding between

John and his English subjects with pleasure; and being joined by his brother the count d'Eu, they excited commotions in Poitou and Normandy. John summoned an assembly of his barons; but they refused to attend him into Normandy, unless he confirmed their privileges. But the association was not yet sufficiently established for them to support their noble resolution. The threatenings and power of royalty engaged the greater part of them to submit, and John passed over into Normandy at the head of an army more than sufficient to reduce the insurgents; but he pursued no prudent methods: he advanced claims that gave universal discontent: he added daily to the public grievances. The barons complained to the king of France, as superior lord; and that prince insisted upon John's doing them justice. He promised to redress all the grievances that were founded on justice; but as the jurisprudence of the times permitted that the causes in the lord's court might be decided by single combat, John carried with him a number of barons whom he retained as champions to fight with his disappointed barons. His vassals, despised, offended, and reduced to despair, once more applied to Philip; he received their appeal, and began to exert his authority, in order to prevent their oppression. John again promised to do them justice, and again broke his engagements. This conduct rendered him at once odious and contemptible. His perfidious and pusillanimous measures lighted up the torch of war and civil discord.

A. D. 1203. Alarmed at the dangerous character of his uncle, young Arthur determined to seek security in an union with Philip and the discontented barons. He joined the French army, which had already begun hostilities. Philip received him with great affection, gave him his daughter in marriage, and promised to support him against the king of England. The progress of the French forces was remarkably rapid, and John was now desirous of putting a period to the military operations. But Philip was thoroughly exasperated, and openly declared that he would not sheathe the sword of war, unless the king of England would submit to resign all his transmarine dominions to his nephew, the lawful and undoubted heir.

But John was not yet reduced to such humiliating conditions; he determined to defend his territories to the last extremity; but still pressed Philip for an accommodation upon more reasonable terms. Young Arthur gave several instances of his courage and intrepidity; but he wanted prudence to conduct military expeditions with success. He knew that queen Eleanor was a sworn enemy to his interest, and was therefore desirous of securing her person. She resided in the castle of Mirabel, the fortifications of which were in a ruinous condition, and the garrison too few to make any long resistance. Arthur determined to embrace the first opportunity of attacking the castle, and being placed by Philip at the head of two hundred knights, he precipitately led his small body of forces against Mirabel. The castle was taken at the first assault, but the queen, with the greater part of the garrison, retired into the tower, and made a gallant defence. The danger of his mother roused John from the couch of indolence; he marched at the head of an army of English and Brelanders, attacked the camp of Arthur, put his army to flight, and took the young prince, together with the earl of Marche, and most of the revolted barons, prisoners. The greater part of the captives were sent over to England, but Arthur was shut up in the castle of Falaise, and afterwards removed to the citadel of Rouen.

John improved not his victory. He retired in triumph into Normandy, and Philip abandoned the siege of Arques on his approach. Success is often the destruction of the timorous and bloody tyrant; it rendered John the execration of mankind. He was a stranger to the gentle feelings of compassion, and possessed not the virtue of magnanimity. He considered young Arthur as an eternal bar to his ambition; a perpetual evidence of his treasonable usurpation; and imagined that he could never be truly happy till he commenced assassin. Soon after accounts were received that the young prince was no more, and no one doubted but he fell by the treacherous hand of assassination. The crime was certain, but some dubious circumstances attended the execution. D'Argentré, in his Hist. de Bretagne, gives the following account of the death of prince Arthur. "John, says that historian, leading his nephew after him like a lamb to the slaughter, brought him from Rouen to Cherbourg, that the infernal deed might be executed with more privacy. There, late in the evening, followed only by a few friends, he mounted his horse, and leaving his attendants, ordered the prince to ride on before him. In this manner they passed along the sea-side, till a place was discovered fit for the bloody purpose: it was a high cliff hanging over the sea. John immediately spurred his horse close to the side of that of Arthur, and laying hold of one of the reins of the bridle, stabbed the young prince several times through the body, while the terrified victim cried in vain for mercy. Having finished the infernal deed, he threw the body over the precipice into the sea." Others say that John assassinated the young prince in the prison at Rouen, and threw his body into the Seine.

But in whatever manner the horrid action was performed, all Europe justly accused John of the murder: and fortunately for the instruction of all kings it may be said, that this first crime was the cause of all his misfortunes. The feudal laws, which in other countries had been productive of so many disorders, were in this instance attended with a signal example of justice. Constantia, mother of young Arthur, presented to the court of peers in France, a petition signed by all the barons in Britany. The king of England was ordered to make his appearance; and the summons was served upon him by the serjeant at arms. This accused prince sent a bishop to demand a safe conduct. "Let him come, said that monarch, he safely may." "But will he, asked the bishop, be safe also in returning?" "Yes, answered Philip, if the judgment of his peers will permit." John refused to obey, and sentence was passed against him. He was declared guilty of felony and parricide; and all his seignories and fiefs in France were declared to be forfeited.

Philip immediately prepared to put the sentence in execution; a more favourable event could not have happened for annexing to the crown of France so many considerable fiefs, which, during several centuries, had been dismembered from it. His vassals were in no condition to oppose his intention: the inhuman action of John silenced all opposition, and carried his victorious arms into Normandy. Nor was the hatred which the inhabitants of that duchy bore to the French of any great consequence: it formed but a feeble obstacle to the rapidity of Philip's conquests. The count of Alençon deserted the king of England, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French monarch, who now separated his army. Exasperated at the desertion of so powerful a vassal, John determined to retake Alençon, and immediately invested the place. Philip saw himself exposed to the disgrace of suffering the capital of his new ally to be wrested from him. Fortunately a tournament was now held at Gatinois, and the fertile genius of Philip furnished him with an expedient for obtaining a powerful assistance. He repaired to the tournament, and pointed out the plains of Alençon, as the proper field for displaying their military talents, and inflicting on a base parricide the punishment due to his crimes. The knights vowed to chastise the assassin, and marched immediately to the relief of the besieged. John fled at their approach; and never more made any attempt to defend his dominions. He even affected to be unconcerned at the success of Philip. "Let him go on," said the the pusillanimous monarch, "I shall retake in one day what has cost him years to acquire." John inherited the same disposition as all tyrannical and dastardly princes: he suffered himself to be stripped of his dominions, without making any efforts against the enemy.

But though John made no use of the temporal, he was desirous of employing the spiritual sword in his quarrel. Innocent III. whose protection he solicited, was pleased with any opportunity of exerting the authority he had assumed over the princes of Europe. He wrote to Philip, commanding him to put a final period to the war; and conclude a peace with the king of England. But Philip nobly opposed the tyranny of the pontiff, and disclaimed the temporal authority he challenged over kings.

A. D. 1204. Richard de Laci, constable of Chester, and one of the most able generals of the age, was of more service to John than the thunder of the Vatican. He defended Chateau Galliard for a whole year, with the greatest firmness and intrepidity. The fortress was remarkable for its strength, and Philip was obliged to subdue it by famine. The intrepid governor, after having repulsed every attempt, supported, with remarkable patience, all the miseries of famine, was at last subdued by a sudden attack in the night-time, and taken prisoner, with his whole garrison. Philip was charmed with the abilities of Laci, and notwithstanding he had given him so much trouble, treated him with the utmost civility. True magnanimity respects valour even in any enemy.

A. D. 1205. Philip found little opposition in reducing the other towns and fortresses of Normandy. The inhabitants of Rouen, indeed, at first determined to defend the capital; but finding all resistance would be in vain, they agreed to deliver up the place, provided they were not relieved in thirty days. No supply arrived, and the French monarch took possession of the city. The other towns followed the example of the capital; and Philip enjoyed the honour of re-annexing to the crown of France one of the finest provinces of the kingdom, near three centuries after it had been ceded by Charles the Simple to Rollo the Dane.

John returned to England, covered with disgrace. He found at first some relief in the pride of the English, who were provoked at the insolence of the French barons, who had dared to pass sentence upon their king. But his conduct, which was at once tyrannical and pusillanimous, soon convinced them, that the losses he had sustained in France were the natural consequences of his personal cowardice. He was now looked upon with contempt; and his barons began to form conspiracies for reducing within proper limits the exorbitant prerogatives of the crown. Nothing was wanting to complete his misfortunes, but a quarrel with the church, and this he soon effected by his imprudence.

Innocent III. who then filled St. Peter's chair, carried the papal usurpations much higher than any of his predecessors. Not contented with endeavouring to extend the authority of the Roman pontiff over all the potentates of Europe, he was ambitious of reducing the ecclesiastics themselves to the same degree of servitude. He pretended, that the disposal of all benefices justly belonged to the successors of St. Peter; and that they had a right to employ all the revenues of the church whenever the interest of the papal see demanded assistance. The imprudence of the monks of Canterbury soon furnished him with an opportunity of carrying these pretensions into execution.

A. D. 1206. These monks enjoyed the privilege, on the death of a primate, to name a successor; but it was usual, before they filled an office of such importance, to obtain the king's consent; and it was also generally allowed, that the suffragan bishops had voices in the election. There are, however, times, when the most sacred rights are usurped by unthinking men, who, in order to promote their own interest, make no difficulty of having recourse to the most extraordinary methods. On the death of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, who paid the debt of nature about the close of the preceding year, the junior monks met clandestinely in the night, elected Reginald, their sub-prior, to the vacant dignity; and placed him on the archiepiscopal throne. Knowing that this election was not valid, unless the pope's consent could be obtained, they enjoined him secrecy, and sent him immediately to Rome, to be confirmed by the pontiff. Elated with his elevation, Reginald suffered his vanity to get the better of his prudence; he endeavoured not to conceal the intention of his journey; so that the secret was known in England long before he crossed the Alps. John was highly exasperated; the monks protested against the election; and the suffragan bishops asserted their privilege. The juniors themselves, ashamed of their conduct, and disgusted at the levity of Reginald, were very desirous of annulling the election. The chapter was accordingly assembled, and John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, was chosen primate, without one dissenting voice. Twelve monks were immediately dispatched to Rome, to solicit his confirmation. The opportunity now offered which Innocent had so long desired, and he determined to embrace it: He annulled both elections; and insisted, that the monks sent to his holiness should elect cardinal Langton into the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. The monks represented, that they had no authority from their convent to make such election; and that it would not only be contrary to all the laws of equity; but also to the canons of the church. But Innocent was determined to be obeyed; he listened not to the voice of reason, and the remonstrances of the monks were urged in vain. He even threatened them with the terrors of excommunication; if they refused to obey his orders, and used every menace in his power to terrify them into obedience. One of their number had the courage to persevere in this opposition; the rest were intimidated, and elected cardinal Langton archbishop of Canterbury.

Innocent himself, however bigotted to the power of the Roman see, could not imagine, but this flagrant usurpation must excite the highest resentment in the court of England; and therefore he wrote a very mollifying letter to John; sent him a present of four golden rings, set with precious stones; the value of which he endeavoured to enhance, by explaining the many mysteries they implied. He desired him to observe, with the most serious attention, the form, the matter, and the colour of these rings. "The form," said the pope, "is round, representing eternity, which has neither beginning nor end; and hence you ought to learn your duty of aspiring from earthly to heavenly objects, from things temporal to things eternal. The number Four being a square, denotes steadiness of mind, which neither prosperity nor adversity can subvert; fixed for ever on the solid basis of the four cardinal virtues. The matter, which is gold; the most precious of metals, shadows out wisdom, the most precious of all accomplishments, and justly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all exterior attainments. The blue colour of the emerald represents Faith; the verdure of the sapphire, Hope; the redness of the ruby, Charity; the splendor of the topaz, Good Works."

This explanation, which, in that age, was greatly admired, though it appears extremely ridiculous in our's, produced not the desired effect. John was inflamed with the utmost rage, and threatened the most exemplary vengeance against all that had been concerned in the late collusive election. But when he heard that the monks of Canterbury, dreading the vengeance of the court of Rome, were inclined to support the choice, his passion knew no bounds. He immediately dispatched two resolute knights, whose violent tempers were equal to the ferocity of their manners, to expel the monks from their convent.

vent. They performed their orders with the greatest punctuality; the fathers were obliged to seek their safety in a precipitate flight. They left the knights in full possession of their estates, their houses and effects.

Innocent saw this violence with a secret satisfaction; he was persuaded that by pursuing such violent measures, John would ultimately sink in the contest. He followed not his example; he had recourse to the softer arts of persuasion, till he found the thunder of the vatican produce the desired effect. He wrote a very conciliating letter to John, beseeching him not to oppose the determination of his spiritual father, who was continually labouring for his eternal happiness. He desired him to reflect on the consequences that attended a similar opposition in his father Henry; and begged him not to resist the church of God, nor persecute any longer, that cause for which the holy martyr St. Thomas sacrificed his life, and who was now so justly venerated by the people. But John was firm to his purpose; and had his principles of resistance been founded on the solid basis of virtue, his behaviour would have merited the highest applause. But the vices of John had rendered him contemptible; he could not hope to be supported by his subjects. The pope knew this, and determined to persevere. He commanded the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester to expostulate with him, and if he persevered in his disobedience, to threaten the kingdom with an interdict. John was exasperated almost to madness at the insolent behaviour of the pontiff. He swore that if the pope presumed to pronounce the sentence, he would put out the eyes, and cut off the noses of all the Roman clergy he could find in his dominions. In vain were all the persuasions of the bishops to mitigate his fury, he wrote a letter to the pope, telling his holiness, that he looked upon his proceedings as an insult upon royalty; that his own kingdom furnished a sufficient number of clergymen, eminent at once for their learning and piety, without suffering those of a foreign seminary to be intruded upon him; that he was determined to maintain the election of the bishop of Norwich to the utmost extremity; and concluded with telling the pontiff, that if he refused to do him justice in this particular, he would prohibit all commerce between his subjects and the Roman see; nor suffer any appeals to be made to a foreign tribunal.

Innocent, who knew the animosity which already subsisted between John and his people, was not to be diverted from his purpose. He thundered out the dreadful sentence of interdiction against the kingdom. This censure had all the requisites for exciting a popular commotion. The ruin of his people was involved in the punishment of the king. The exterior parts of religion ceased immediately. The altars were stripped of their ornaments; the images, the crosses, the statues of saints, and all the holy relics were laid upon the ground. The churches were shut against the laity; and divine service was suppressed. Even the sacraments were no longer administered but to dying persons; nor the dead suffered to be buried in consecrated ground. The severest penances were commanded, and every pleasure, every entertainment, strictly forbidden.

In an age of superstitious bigotry, when the people were thoroughly persuaded that the pontiff was the true vicegerent of heaven, and that the divine vengeance and indignation were the inevitable consequences of his sentence, it is no wonder that the whole nation should be alarmed; and that every person in the kingdom should exert all his power to avert such dreadful calamities from the kingdom. But John was not to be moved with tears and supplications. He opposed with the most obstinate inflexibility, every attempt to remove the scourge, and restore tranquillity to his dominions. He punished with the utmost rigour, all who submitted to the orders of the pope, whether bishops, monks or secular clergy. Some of the ecclesiastics, indeed, disregarded the censure of the Roman pontiff. The Cistercian order continued to perform divine service publicly; the bishops of Winchester and Norwich followed their examples, and several of the most eminent divines openly preached against these proceedings, which they called unjust and unwarrantable. An exertion of prudent vigour therefore might have dissipated the tempest: but John listened not to the voice of reason; he followed the dictates of his headstrong passions, which led him to the brink of a precipice that threatened his destruction.

The kingdom laboured several years under this censure: but John was so far from being reclaimed, that he became more tyrannical than ever: his cruelties increased in the same proportion with the danger of his government. The clergy were the particular objects of his fury. He seized upon their temporalities; he drove them from their monasteries, and inflicted on them every kind of indignity: he endeavoured to retaliate on them the sufferings of himself and his people. But his despotism was not confined to the clergy, the laity also felt the weight of his oppression. He not only enforced the forest laws, which had always excited troubles and distress, he likewise ordered all the mounds of his forests to be levelled, that his deer might range at large, to the inexpressible distress of the husbandmen. But so inconsistent were the measures of this infatuated prince, that even while he had recourse to these violent oppressions, he felt the crown totter on his head, and had recourse to the most extraordinary stretch of power to enforce the obedience of his barons. He compelled them to give him hostages for their good behaviour and fidelity. The greater number complied with this demand; but when the king's messengers came to the castle of William de Barouse, a nobleman of great power in the Marches of Wales, his lady replied, "That she would never trust her son to the care of a prince, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own nephew." Barouse, who knew the cruel temper of John, and that the sarcasm of his wife would never be pardoned, fled, with his family, into Ireland. But the place of their retreat was soon known, and John gave a loose to his cruelty. The lady and her son were shut up in prison, and starved to death. The nobleman himself escaped to the continent.

A. D. 1211. John had long feared the sentence of excommunication; and was very desirous of averting the dreadful shaft. He dispatched the abbot of Beaulieu on an embassy to Rome, to effect, if possible, a reconciliation with the pontiff. Cardinal Langton was immediately ordered to repair to England; but the proposals not being equal to what the pope demanded, he broke off the conference abruptly and returned to the continent. Innocent now prepared to launch the dreadful bolt of excommunication against John, and to absolve his subjects from their oaths of allegiance. But notwithstanding the power of Rome, and the cruelties which John had exercised on his subjects, a few only of the English bishops could be prevailed upon to publish the sentence, which, however, produced the desired effect. The prelate, who dreaded the power and cruelty of the king, stole out of the kingdom, and the barons entered into cabals against him. This ecclesiastical thunderbolt was really terrible, because the pope gave the kingdom of England to Philip of France, a prince who wanted neither power nor inclination to assert his claim. The pontiff did more, he promised him the remission of all his sins, if he succeeded in the reduction of England. He even granted the same indulgences on account of this expedition, as had been given to those who went into Asia to recover the Holy Land from the infidels. The fascinating lustre of the English diadem, wholly changed the opinion of Philip. He did not now tell his holiness, that the pope had no right to give away crowns. His own kingdom had been interdicted some years before, and he himself excommunicated by this very pope, for attempting attempting to marry another wife. He then asserted the independence of his own crown, and declared these papal censures insolent and abusive. He seized the temporalities of every ecclesiastic in France who had proved himself so bad a subject as to obey the pope: but he thought quite differently, when he saw himself commissioned with the execution of a bull, which was to put England into his possession. He took again to his bed that very prince, whose divorce had been the cause of so many excommunications, and devoted himself intirely to execute the sentence of the see of Rome. He employed a whole year in building one hundred and seventy ships, and in raising and disciplining the finest army ever seen in France. The aversion which the English bore to John might, in regard to Philip, be considered as equivalent to another army. But by the perpetual emulation between the English and French, by the horror the people had conceived against the pope's arbitrary proceedings, and by the assistance of the extensive prerogatives of the crown, John was enabled to raise and keep together, during several weeks, an army of sixty thousand men, at the head of which he advanced towards Dover, to meet the prince who had tried and condemned him in France, and was now coming to dethrone him in England.

A. D. 1213. While all Europe was in the utmost expectation of a battle that was to decide the fate of the English diadem, the pope was forming schemes for turning the whole to his own advantage. Pandolf, the pope's legate, who headed the opposition against John, procured an interview with him at Dover, under pretence of treating with the barons in favour of Philip. He represented to the English monarch all the dangers of his situation. "The French fleet," said the artful Italian, "is ready to sail: your troops will certainly desert you in the day of battle; they will never fight against the arm of Omnipotence. One resource only is left, which is that of submitting yourself absolutely to the protection of the Holy See." John was now completely humbled; he feared the power of Philip, and dreaded the desertion of his barons. The advice of Pandolf only promised him sufficient assistance, and he determined to embrace it. Accordingly he repaired to the prelate, and, in the presence of four of his principal barons, he promised, that he would receive cardinal Langton as primate, that he would make reparation to the clergy, and that he would instantly consign a considerable sum for that purpose.

But this was not sufficient to free John from his present embarrassed situation. Philip only waited the legate's return, to embark his forces, and wrest the sceptre from his hand: he, therefore, thought it necessary to put himself and his kingdom under the protection of the pope. Accordingly he repaired to the house of the Knights Templars at Dover, where he resigned the two kingdoms of England and Ireland to the holy see, acknowledged himself the vassal of the pope, and promised to pay him an annual tribute of a thousand marks. It was also stipulated, that if either he, or any of his successors, should ever infringe upon those engagements, he, or they, should forfeit all right to the two crowns. This disgraceful treaty was followed by the truly humiliating ceremony of homage. The king, unarmed, and on his knees, appeared before Pandolf, seated on a throne. In that degrading posture he swore fealty to the pope.

A sum of money was then put into the legate's hands, as the first payment of this tribute; and John himself presented him with the crown and sceptre. The imperious priest, to shew his triumph over the fallen monarch, had the insolence to trample the money under foot. He, indeed, returned the regalia to the king, but not without declaring, in an audible voice, that he must consider it as a particular favour of the Roman see. Nor would Pandolf take off the interdict and excommunication, till the exiled clergy had received full satisfaction for their losses.

Pandolf having executed his secret commission in England, passed over to the continent; where Philip was waiting for him, every thing being ready for the armament to put to sea. The legate immediately repaired to the prince's court, and informed him, that he was no longer permitted to make a descent upon England, now become a fief of the Roman church; and that John was under the protection of the holy see. Philip, at once surprised and incensed at this declaration, treated the legate as an impostor. He told him, that he had made these preparations at an immense expence, at the pressing instances of the pope; and therefore, that no contrary orders, nor even all the threats of the Vatican, should now deter him from prosecuting his design. He immediately summoned a general council, wherein he painted the pope's insidious proceedings in the most glaring colours, and desired their advice with regard to prosecuting the design against England. They all expressed their abhorrence of the pope's duplicity, and the greater part declared for making the intended descent. The earl of Flanders not only dissented from the general opinion, but declared strongly against it. He boldly told Philip, that his expedition against England was inconsistent with justice, and the laws of nations, as none of his ancestors ever pretended any claim to that kingdom. Exasperated at this remonstrance, Philip ordered the earl to quit his dominions, and immediately turned the armament he had raised for an expedition into England, against Flanders. But William earl of Salisbury, at the head of an English fleet fitted out to guard the channel, fell with such fury on the French transports, that one hundred of them were sunk, and three hundred taken. Philip perceiving that the total destruction of his ships was inevitable, set fire to the rest, as the only method to prevent their falling into the hands of the English.

John was desirous of pursuing this advantage over Philip, but his barons refused to join the standard of an excommunicated prince. He therefore wrote a very pressing letter to Langton, beseeching him to come with all expedition, and give him absolution; assuring him, that he would, to the utmost of his power, love, defend, and maintain the church and clergy against all their adversaries; that he would re-establish the wholesome laws of his predecessors, particularly those of king Edward; and that he would annul all oppressive edicts, and judge every man according to justice and equity. The prelate obeyed; and, on the above conditions, gave him absolution in the cathedral church of Winchester, before the principal nobility and clergy of the kingdom.

A. D. 1214. John being now delivered from this vexatious affair, attempted to carry the war into the dominions of Philip; but he wanted both courage and prudence to lead an army against an enemy. He besieged a castle near Angiers; but the approach of an army, under the command of prince Lewis, excited all his natural timidity. He raised the siege with the utmost precipitation, leaving behind him all his tents, machines, and baggage. A few days after, advice arrived, that Philip had defeated, at Bovines, the emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of one hundred and fifty thousand Germans. This victory established for ever the reputation of Philip, and put a final period to all John's hopes of conquest. He returned to England, covered with disgrace.

Nor was peace yet established in England. Though the feudal government, since the Norman conquest, had set bounds to the sovereign authority, the prerogatives of the crown had been very greatly extended. The English nobility were now determined to assume the same privileges which those of similar rank enjoyed in the other kingdoms of Europe. The charter passed by Henry I. renewed by Stephen, and confirmed by Henry II. had flattered the people with liberty, without communicating to them any real advantages: the form appeared lovely; but it was destitute of substance. The articles had never been executed on the part of the crown, and the whole was now nearly forgotten. The barons were roused from the couch of indolence by the debauchery, the meanness, the violence, and the tyranny of John. Both clergy and laity joined in opposing the tyrant of their country. Archbishop Langton became the head of a faction. The promise the king had made at the time he received absolution, furnished the primate with pretences for a revolt. He assembled the barons; he produced a charter of Henry I. which he had fortunately found in the library of a monastery, and exhorted them to join firmly in insisting on a renewal and solemn confirmation of that contract of privileges. Pleased with the opportunity of setting bounds to the royal authority, and of procuring a positive declaration of the rights of Englishmen, the barons took an oath to adhere firmly to each other; planned measures for forcing the king to grant their request, should he be disposed to refuse it; and agreed to meet at London soon after Christmas, to present in a body their common petition.

A. D. 1215. They accordingly assembled at the capital on the day appointed, and demanded of the king a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of Edward the Confessor. The king, alarmed at their number, zeal, and unanimity, promised to give them a positive answer at Easter. In the mean time he laboured, with the utmost assiduity, to gain the clergy over to his interest, by making them the most lavish concessions. He granted them a charter, by which he granted to them the election to all vacant benefices; reserving only the right of a congé d'élire, and to subjoin a confirmation of the election; but declaring, that if either of these were delayed, the choice should nevertheless be deemed valid. At the same time, he implored the assistance of the pope, and vowed to lead an army into Palestine, not doubting but he should receive from the church that protection which she had granted to every prince engaged in those pious expeditions. It was the interest of Innocent to protect his vassal, in order to secure his submission. But the English clergy, weary with the despotism of the Roman court, and who regretted the loss of those privileges which the pontiff treated with contempt, openly professed their zeal for the liberty of the people. This encouraged the barons to proceed with alacrity; and though they expected to have the pope, as well as the king, to contend with, they did not despair of success; they determined to procure a charter of liberties, or perish in the glorious attempt.

When the feast of Easter approached, the king desired to have a schedule of the different articles of their pretensions. The barons immediately prepared the writing requested; and advanced in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, where the court then resided, and sent the schedule by the archbishop of Canterbury and the earl of Pembroke. The king read the demands of the barons, and burst into the most furious passion, asking, "Why they did not also demand his crown?" Swearing, that he would never grant them liberties which must reduce the king to the station of a slave.

The primate immediately communicated this answer to the discontented barons, who immediately elected Robert Fitz-Walter their general, under the title of "The Marshal of the army of God, and of the Holy Church." They staid not for any farther answer from John, but immediately began hostilities. They published a proclamation, inviting the rest of the nobility to join them in this national cause. They advanced towards London, and entered the capital without opposition. Almost all the nobility now joined the standard of the barons; and John was left at Odiham, in Surry, with the poor retinue of only seven knights. He made several attempts to elude the blow. He offered to refer the whole dispute to the pope, and sign any charter that his holiness should approve. This was refused. He then proposed to empower eight barons to settle the contest, four of them to be chosen by himself, and four by the insurgents. But this offer was also rejected. John now perceived that all opposition would be in vain: he saw himself abandoned by his subjects, and was obliged to consent to the demands of the barons.

Runimede, a place between Windsor and Staines, was appointed for holding a conference between the king and the confederates; where, after a debate of a few days, the king signed, on the nineteenth of June, the celebrated charter of English liberties. This famous deed, which is still considered as the foundation of British freedom, either granted or secured very important privileges; and therefore it was thought necessary to give a faithful translation of it here, where, it is presumed, every Englishman will expect to find it.

MAGNA CHARTA; or, The Charter of Liberties, granted by King John to his Subjects, in the Year 1215.

"JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justiciaries of the forests, sheriffs, governors, officers, and to all bailiffs, and other his faithful subjects, greeting. Know ye, that we, in the presence of God, and for the health of our soul, and the souls of all our ancestors and heirs, and to the honour of God, and the exaltation of the Holy Church, and amendment of our kingdom, by advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church; Henry, archbishop of Dublin; William, bishop of London; Peter of Winchester; Joceline of Bath and Glastonbury; Hugh of Lincoln; Walter of Worcester; William of Coventry; Benedict of Rochester, bishops; and master Pandolf, the pope's sub-deacon and ancient servant; brother Aymeric, master of the temple in England; and the noble persons William Marshal, earl of Pembroke; William earl of Salisbury; William earl of Warren; William earl of Arundel; Alan de Galloway, constable of Scotland; Warin Fitz-gerald; Peter Fitz-herbert; and Hubert de Burgh, seneschal of Poitou; Hugo de Neville; Mathew Fitz-herbert; Thomas Basset; Alan Basset; Philip de Albiney; Robert de Ropely; John Marshal; John Fitz-Hugh; and others our liege-men, have, in the first place, granted to God, and by this our present charter, confirmed for us and our heirs for ever.

I. "That the church of England shall be free, and enjoy her rights intire, and her liberties inviolable. And we will have them so to be observed, that it may appear from hence, that the freedom of elections, which was reckoned chief and indispensable to the English church, and which we granted and confirmed by our charter, and obtained the confirmation of from pope Innocent III. before the discord between us and our barons, was granted of mere free will; which charter we shall observe, and do will it to be faithfully observed by our heirs for ever.

II. "We have also granted to all freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever, all the under written liberties, to have and to hold them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.

III. "If any of our earls, or barons, or others, who hold of us in chief by military service, shall die, and at the time of his death, his heir shall be of full age, and owe a relief, he shall have his inheritance by the ancient relief; that is to say, the heir or heirs of an earl, for a whole earl's barony, by an hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a knight, for a whole knight's fee, by an hundred shillings at most; and and whoever oweth less, shall give less, according to the ancient custom of fees."

IV. "But if the heir of any such shall be under age, and shall be in ward," (his lord shall not have the wardship of him, nor his lands before he hath received his homage; and after such heir shall be in ward, and attain to the age of one and twenty years) "when he comes of age, he shall have his inheritance without relief, or without fine." (Yet so that if he be made a knight while he is under age, nevertheless the lands shall remain in custody of the lord, until the aforesaid time.)

V. "The warden of the land of such heir, who shall be under age, shall not take of the land of such heir, other than reasonable issues, reasonable customs, and reasonable services; and that without destruction and waste of the tenants or effects" (upon the estate.) "And if we shall commit the guardianship of those lands to the sheriff, or any other who is answerable to us for the issues of the land; and if he shall make destruction and waste upon the wood-lands, we will compel him to give satisfaction, and the land shall be committed to lawful and discreet tenants of that fee, who shall be answerable for the issues to us, or to him to whom we shall assign them. And if we shall give or sell to any one the wardship of any such lands, and if he makes destruction or waste upon them, he shall lose the wardship itself, which shall be committed to two lawful and discreet tenants of that fee, who shall in like manner, be answerable to us as aforesaid."

VI. "But the warden, so long as he shall have the wardship of the land, shall keep up the houses, parks, warrens, ponds, mills and other things pertaining to the land, out of the issues of the same land; and shall restore to the heir, when he becomes of age, his whole land, stocked with ploughs and carriages, according as the time of wainage shall require, and the issues of the land can reasonably bear." (And all these things shall be observed in the custodies of vacant archbishoprics, bishoprics, abbies, priories, churches, and dignities which appertain to us, except that these wardships are not to be sold.)

VII. "Heirs shall be married without disparagement, so as that before matrimony shall be contracted, those who are nearest in blood to the heir shall be acquainted with it."

VIII. "A widow, after the death of her husband, shall forthwith, and without difficulty have her marriage and inheritance; nor shall she give any thing for her dower, or her marriage, or her inheritance, which her husband and she held at the time of his death: and she may remain in the mansion-house of her husband forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned." (If it was not assigned before, or unless the house shall be a castle, and if she departs from the castle, there shall forthwith be provided for her a complete house, in which she may decently dwell, till her dower be to her assigned, as hath been said; and she shall, in the mean time, have her reasonable estover, that is, competent maintenance, out of the common revenue. And there shall be assigned to her for her dower, the third part of all her husband's lands which were in his lifetime, except she were endowed with less at the church door.)

IX. "No widow shall be distrained to marry herself, so long as she has a mind to live without a husband. But yet she shall give security that she will not marry without our assent, if she holds of us; or without the consent of the lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another."

X. "Neither we, nor our bailiffs, shall seize any land or rent for any debt, so long as there shall be chattels of the debtor's upon the premises, sufficient to pay the debt," (and the debtor be ready to satisfy it.) "Nor shall the sureties of the debtor be distrained, so long as the principal debtor is sufficient for the payment of the debt."

XI. "And if the principal debtor shall fail in the payment of the debt, not having wherewithal to pay it," (or will not discharge when he is able,) "then the sureties shall answer the debt; and, if they will, they shall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until they shall be satisfied for the debt which they paid for him; unless the principal debtor can shew himself acquitted thereof, against the said sureties."

XII. "If any one have borrowed any thing of the Jews, more or less, and dies before the debt be satisfied, there shall be no interest paid for that debt, so long as the heir is under age, of whomsoever he may hold; and if the debt falls into our hands, we will take only the chattels mentioned in the charter or instrument."

XIII. "And if any one shall die indebted to the Jews, his wife shall have her dower, and pay nothing of that debt; and if the deceased left children under age, they shall have necessaries provided for them, according to the tenement, or real estate, of the deceased; and out of the residue the debt shall be paid; saving, however, the service of the lords. In like manner let it be with the debts due to other persons than Jews."

XIV. "No scutage, or aid, shall be imposed in our kingdom, unless by the common council of our kingdom, except for ransoming our person, and making our eldest son a knight, and once for marrying our eldest daughter; and for these there shall be paid only a reasonable aid."

XV. "In like manner it shall be concerning the aids of the city of London; and the city of London shall have all its ancient liberties, and free customs, as well by land as by water."

XVI. "Furthermore, we will and grant, that all other cities, and boroughs, and towns," (and barons of cinque ports) "and ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs; and for holding the common council of the kingdom concerning the assessments of their aids, except in the three cases aforesaid."

XVII. "And for the assessing of scutages, we shall cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and great barons of the realm, singly by our letters."

XVIII. "And furthermore, we shall cause to be summoned in general, by our sheriffs and bailiffs, all others who hold of us in chief, at a certain day, that is to say, forty days before their meeting at least, and to a certain place; and in all letters of such summonings, we will declare the cause of the summonings."

XIX. "And summons being thus made, the business shall proceed on the day appointed, according to the advice of such as shall be present; although all that were summoned come not."

XX. "We will not, for the future, grant to any one that he may take aid of his own free tenants, unless to ransom his body, and to make his eldest son a knight, and once to marry his eldest daughter; and for these there shall only be paid a reasonable aid."

XXI. "No man shall be distrained to perform more service for a knight's fee, or other free tenement, than is due from thence."

XXII. "Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be holden in some certain place; trials upon the writs of novel disseisin, and of mort d'ancestor, and of darreine presentment, shall not be taken but in their proper counties, and after this manner. We, or, if we shall be out of the realm, our chief justiciary, shall send two justiciaries through every county four times a year, who, with four knights, chosen out of every shire by the people, shall hold the said assizes in the county, on the day, and at the place appointed."

XXIII. "And if any matters cannot be determined on the day appointed for holding the assizes in each county, so many of the knights and freeholders as have been at the assizes aforesaid, shall be appointed to decide them, as is necessary, according as their is more more or less business. (Affizes of darreine presentment to churches shall be always taken before the justiciaries of the bench.)

XXIV. "A freeman shall not be amerced for a small fault, but according to the degree of the fault; and for a great crime, in proportion to the heinousness of it, saving to him his contentment; and after the same manner a merchant, saving to him his merchandise.

XXV. "And a villain (of any other than our own) shall be amerced after the same manner, saving to him his wainage, if he falls under our amercement; and none of the aforesaid amercements shall be assayed but by the oath of honest men of the neighbourhood. (Of the county.)

XXVI. "Earls and barons shall not be amerced but by their peers, and according to the degree of the offence.

XXVII. "No ecclesiastical person shall be amerced for his lay-tenement, but according to the proportion of the others aforesaid, and not according to the value of his ecclesiastical benefice.

XXVIII. "Neither a town, nor any tenement, shall be distrained to make bridges over rivers, unless that anciently and of right they are bound to do it. (No river, for the future, shall be embanked, but what was embanked in the time of king Henry, our grandfather.)

XXIX. "No sheriff, castellan, coroner, or other our bailiffs, shall hold pleas of the crown.

XXX. "All counties, hundreds, wapentakes, and trethings, shall stand at the old ferm, without any increase, except in our demesne manors.

XXXI. "If any one holding of us a lay-fee, dies, and the sheriff, or our bailiff, shew our letters-patent of summons concerning the debt due to us from the deceased, it shall be lawful for the sheriff, or our bailiff, to attach and register the chattels of the deceased found upon his lay-fee, to the value of the debt, by the view of lawful men, so as nothing be removed until our whole debt be paid; and the rest shall be left to the executors, who are to fulfil the will of the deceased. And if there be nothing due from him to us, all the chattels shall remain to the deceased, saving to his wife and children their reasonable shares.

XXXII. "If any freeman shall die intestate, his chattels shall be distributed by the hands of his nearest relations and friends, by view of the church, saving to every one his debts, which the deceased owed to him.

XXXIII. "No constable or bailiff of our's shall take corn, or other chattels, of any man, (who is not of the town where the castle is) unless he presently gives him money for it, or hath respite of payment by the good-will of the seller. (But if he be of the same town, he shall pay him within forty days.)

XXXIV. "No constable shall distrain any knight to give money for castle-guard, if he himself will do it in his own person, or by another able man, in case he cannot do it through any reasonable cause.

XXXV. "And if we lead him, or send him into the army, he shall be free from such guard, for the time he shall be in the army, by our command. (For the fee for which he did service in the army.)

XXXVI. "No sheriff or bailiff of our's, or any other, shall take horses or carts of any for carriage, but by the good-will of the said freeman. (Without paying according to the rate anciently appointed; that is to say, for a cart and two horses, ten-pence a day; and for a cart with three horses, fourteen-pence a day.)

XXXVII. "Neither shall we, or our bailiffs, take any man's timber for our castles, or other uses, unless by the consent of the owner of the timber. (No demesne cart of any ecclesiastical person, or knight, or any lady, shall be taken by our officers.)

XXXVIII. "We will retain the lands of those that are convicted of felony only one year and a day; and then they shall be delivered to the lord of the fee.

XXXIX. "All wares, for the time to come, shall be put down in the rivers of Thames and Medway, and throughout all England, except upon the sea-coast.

XL. "The writ, which is called Præcipe, for the future, shall not be made out to any one of any tenement, whereby a freeman may lose his court.

XLI. "There shall be one measure of wine, and one of ale, throughout our whole realm, and one measure of corn; that is to say, the London quarter; and one breadth of dyed cloth, and ruffs, and habergeants; that is to say, two ells within the list. As to weights, they shall be as the measures.

XLII. "From henceforward, nothing shall be given or taken for a writ of inquisition of life or limbs; but it shall be granted gratis, and not denied.

XLIII. "If any one holds of us by fee-farm, or socage, or burgage, and holds lands of another by military service, we will not have the wardship of the heir, or land, which is of another man's fee, by reason of what he holds of us by fee-farm, socage, or burgage: nor will we have the wardship of the fee-farm, socage, or burgage, unless the fee-farm is bound to perform military service.

XLIV. "We will not have the wardship of an heir, nor of any land which he holds of another by military service, by reason of any petit-serjeanty he holds of us, as by the service of giving us knives, arrows, or the like.

XLV. "No bailiff, for the future, shall put any man to his law, (nor to an oath) upon his single word, without credible witnesses produced to prove it.

XLVI. "No freemen shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseised, (of his freehold, or liberties, or free-customs) or outlawed, or banished, or any ways destroyed; nor will we pass sentence upon him, or commit him to prison, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

XLVII. "We will sell to no man, we will deny no man, nor delay right nor justice.

XLVIII. "All merchants (unless they be publicly prohibited) shall have safe and secure conduct to go out of, and to come into England, and to stay there, and to pass as well by land as by water; for buying and selling by the ancient and allowed customs, without any evil tolls, except in time of war, or when they are of any nation at war with us.

XLIX. "And if there be found any such in our land in the beginning of the war, they shall be attached, without damage to their bodies or goods, until it may be known unto us, or our chief justiciary, how our merchants are treated in the nation at war with us; and, if our's be safe there, the others shall be safe in our dominions.

L. "It shall be lawful, for the time to come, for any one to go out of our kingdom, and return safely and securely by land or by water, saving his allegiance to us, unless in time of war, by some short space for the benefit of the realm, except prisoners and outlaws, according to the law of the land, and people in war with us, and merchants who shall be in such condition as is above mentioned.

LI. "If any man holds of any escheat, or of the honour of Wallingford, Nottingham, Bulloign, Lancaster, or of other escheats which are in our hands, and are baronies, and dies, his heir shall give no other relief, and perform no other service, to us, than he would to the baron, if the barony were in possession of the baron: we will hold it after the same manner the baron held it. (Nor will we, by reason of such barony or escheat, have any escheat or wardship of any of our men, unless he that held the barony or escheat held of us in chief elsewhere.)

LII. "Those men who dwell without the forest, from henceforth shall not come before our justiciaries of the forest upon common summons, but such as are impleaded, or are pledges for any that were attached for something concerning the forest. (No country-

country-court, for the future, shall be holden but from month to month; and where there used to be a greater interval, let it be so continued. Neither any sheriff, nor his bailiff, shall keep his turn in the hundred oftner than twice in a year, and only in the accustomed place, that is once after Easter, and once after Michaelmas; and the view of frank-pledge shall be held after Michaelmas, without occasion, and so that every one shall have his liberties, which he had, and was wont to have, in the time of king Henry, our grandfather, or such as he obtained afterwards. But the view of frank-pledge shall be so made, that our peace may be kept; and that the thything be full as it was wont to be. And the sheriffs shall not seek occasions, but shall be content with what the sheriff was wont to have for making his view in the time of king Henry our grandfather. For the time to come it shall not be lawful for any man to give his land to a religious house, so as to take it again, and hold it of that house. Nor shall it be lawful for any religious house to receive land, so as to grant it to him again of whom they received it, to hold of him. If any man for the future, shall so give his land to a religious house, and be convicted thereof, his gift shall be void, and the land shall be forfeited to the lord of the fee. Scutage, for the future, shall not be taken as it was used to be taken in the time of king Henry our grandfather; and that the sheriff shall oppress no man, but be content with what he was wont to have. Saving to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, templars, hospitalers, earls, barons, knights, and all others, as well ecclesiastics as seculars, the liberties and free-customs which they had before: these being witnesses, &c.)

LIII. We will not make any justiciaries, constables, sheriffs or bailiffs, but such as are knowing in the law of the realm, and are disposed duly to observe it."

LIV. "All barons, who are founders of abbies, and have charters of the kings of England for the advowson, or are entitled to it by ancient tenure, may have the custody of them, when vacant, as they ought to have."

LV. "All woods that have been taken into the forests" (by king Richard our brother) "in our time shall forthwith be laid out again," (unless they were our demesne woods,) "and the same shall be done with the rivers that have been taken or fenced in by us, during our reign."

LVI. "All evil customs concerning forests, warrens, and foresters, warreners, sheriffs and their officers, rivers and their keepers, shall forthwith be enquired into in each county, by twelve knights sworn of the same shire, chosen by creditable persons in the same county, and upon oath; and within forty days after the said inquest, be utterly abolished, so as never to be restored." (No freeman, for the future, shall give or sell any more of his land, but so that, out of the residue, the service due to the lord of the fee may be sufficiently performed.)

LVII. "We will immediately give up all hostages and writings delivered unto us by our English subjects, as securities for their keeping the peace, and yielding us faithful service."

LVIII. "We will entirely remove from our bailiwicks the relations of Gerard de Athyes, so as that, for the future, they shall have no bailwic in England. We will also remove Engelard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter, and Gyon, from the chancery; Gyon de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martin, and his two brothers, Philip Mark and his two brothers, and his nephew Geoffrey, and their whole following."

LIX. "And as soon as peace is restored, we will send out of the kingdom all foreign soldiers, cross-bow men, and stipendiaries, who are come with horses and arms, to the prejudice of our people."

LX. "If any one has been dispossessed, or deprived by us, without the legal judgment of his peers, of his lands, castles, liberties, or rights, we will forthwith restore them to him, and if any dispute arises upon this head, let the matter be done away by the five and twenty barons, hereafter spoken of, for the preservation of the peace.

LXI. "As for all those things, of which any person has, without the legal judgment of his peers, been dispossessed or deprived, either by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we have in our hands; or are possessed by others, and we are bound to warrant and make good, we shall have a respite, till the term usually allowed the croises; excepting those things about which there is a plea depending, or whereof an inquest hath been made by our order, before we undertook the crusade. But when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we do not perform it, we will immediately cause full justice to be administered therein."

LXII. "The same respite we shall have for disafforesting the forests, which Henry our father, or our brother Richard hath afforested; and for the wardship of the lands which are in another's fee, in the same manner as we have hitherto enjoyed those wardships, by reason of a fee held of us by knight's service; and for the abbies founded in any other fee than our own, in which the lord of the fee says he has a right; and when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we should not perform it, we will immediately do full justice to all the complainants in this behalf."

LXIII. "No man shall be taken, or imprisoned, upon the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other person than her husband."

LXIV. "All unjust and illegal fines made with us, and all amerciaments imposed unjustly, and contrary to the law of the land, shall be entirely forgiven, or else left to the decision of the five and twenty barons hereafter mentioned, for the preservation of the peace, or of the major part of them, together with the foresaid Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and others whom he shall think fit to take along with him: and, if he cannot be present, the business, notwithstanding, shall go on without him. But so that, if one or more of the foresaid five and twenty barons be plaintiffs in the same cause, they shall be set aside, as to what concerns this particular affair; and others be chosen in their room, out of the said five and twenty, and sworn by the rest to decide that matter."

LXV. "If we have disseised or dispossessed the Welsh of any lands, liberties, or other things, without the legal judgment of their peers, they shall immediately be restored to them. And if any dispute arises upon this head, the matter shall be determined in the Marche, by the judgment of their peers; for tenements in England, according to the law of England; for tenements in Wales, according to the law of Wales; for the tenements of the Marche, according to the law of the Marche: the same shall the Welsh do to us and our subjects."

LXVI. "As for all those things, of which any Welshman hath, without the legal judgment of his peers, been disseised or deprived, by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we either have in our hands, or others are possessed of, and we are obliged to warrant it, we shall have respite till the time generally allowed the croises; excepting things about which a suit is depending, or whereof an inquest has been made by our order, before we undertook the crusade. But when we return, or if we stay at home without performing our pilgrimage, we will immediately do them full justice, according to the laws of the Welsh, and of the parts before-mentioned."

LXVII. "We will, without delay, dismiss the son of Llewellyn, and all the Welsh hostages, and release them from the engagements they have entered into with us for the preservation of the peace."

LXVIII. "We shall treat with Alexander, king of Scots, concerning the restoring his sister and hostages, and his right and liberties, in the same form and manner as we shall do to the rest of our barons of England; unless by the charters which we have from his father, William, late king of Scots, it ought to be otherwise; and this shall be left to the determination his peers in our court."

LXIX. "All the aforefaid customs and liberties which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as it belongs to us towards our people of our kingdom, as well clergy as laity, we shall observe, as far as they are concerned, towards their dependents."

LXX. "And whereas, for the honour of God, and the amendment of our kingdom, and for quieting the discord that has arisen between us and our barons, we have granted all the things aforefaid; willing to render them firm and lasting, we do give and grant our subjects the under-written security; namely, that the barons may chuse five and twenty barons of the kingdom, whom they think convenient, who shall take care, with all their might, to hold and observe; and cause to be observed, the peace and liberties we have granted them, and, by this our present charter, confirmed. So as that, if we, our justiciary, our bailiffs, or any of our officers, shall in any circumstance fail in the performance of them towards any person, or shall break through any of these articles of peace and security, and the offence is notified to four barons, chosen out of the five and twenty fore-mentioned, the said barons shall repair to us, or our justiciary, if we are out of the realm, and laying open the grievance, shall petition to have it redressed without delay; and, if it is not redressed by us, or, if we should chance to be out of the realm, if it is not redressed by our justiciary, within forty days, reckoning from the time it has been notified to us, or to our justiciary, if we should be out of the realm, the four barons aforefaid shall lay the cause before the rest of the five and twenty barons; and the said five and twenty barons, together with the community of the whole kingdom, shall distrain and distress us all the ways possible; namely, by seizing our castles, lands, possessions, and in any other manner they can, till the grievance is redressed according to their pleasure, saving harmless our own person, and the persons of our queen and children; and when it is redressed, they shall obey us as before."

LXXI. "And any person whomsoever in the kingdom, may swear that he will obey the orders of the five and twenty barons aforefaid, in the execution of the premises, and that he will distress us jointly with them, to the utmost of his power; and we give public and free liberty to any one that shall please to swear to them, and never shall hinder any person from taking the same oath."

LXXII. "As for all those of our subjects, who will not, of their own accord, swear to join the five and twenty barons, in distraining and distressing us, we will issue our order to make them take the same oath, as is aforefaid."

LXXIII. "And if any one of the five and twenty barons dies, or goes out of the kingdom, or is hindered any other way, from carrying the things aforefaid into execution, the rest of the said five and twenty barons may chuse another in his room, at their own discretion, who shall be sworn in, in like manner as the rest."

LXIV. "In all things that are committed to the execution of these five and twenty barons, if, when they are all assembled together, they should happen to disagree about any matter, or some of them, when summoned, will not, or cannot come, whatever is agreed upon, or enjoined, by the major part of those who are present, shall be reputed as firm and valid, as if all the five and twenty had given their consent; and the forefaid five and twenty shall swear, that all the premises they shall faithfully observe, and cause with all their power to be observed."

LXXV. "And we will not, by ourselves, or by any other, procure any thing, whereby any of these concessions and liberties be revoked and lessened; and if any such thing be obtained, let it be null and void; neither shall we ever make use of it, either by ourselves, or any other."

LXXVI. "And all the ill-will, anger, and malice, that hath arisen between us and our subjects, of the clergy and laity, from the first breaking out of the diffension between us, we do fully remit, and forgive. Moreover, all trespasses occasioned by the said diffension, from Easter, in the sixteenth year of our reign, till the restoration of peace and tranquillity, we hereby entirely remit to all, both clergy and laity, and, as far as in us lies, do fully forgive."

LXXVII. "We have moreover granted them our letters patent testimonial of Stephen, lord archbishop of Canterbury, Henry, lord archbishop of Dublin, and the bishops aforefaid, as also of master Pandolf, for the security and concessions aforefaid."

LXXVIII. "Wherefore we will and firmly enjoin, that the church of England be free, and that all men in our kingdom, have and hold all the forefaid liberties, rights and concessions, truly and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, to themselves and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever, as is aforefaid."

LXXIX. "It is also sworn as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all the things aforefaid shall faithfully and sincerely be observed."

"Given under our hand, in the presence of the witnesses above-named, and many others, in the meadow called Runnemede, between Windelesore and Staines, the fifteenth day of June, in the seventeenth year of our reign."

The above translation is made from an original manuscript now in the British Museum: But the passages comprehended between parenthesis, are taken from the copy given by Matthew Paris. This charter is more noble, more express, and more extensive, than any other instrument of its kind in the world. It decides all disputes, removes all doubts, with regard to the compact between the king and his people: for here that contract is not understood only, but expressed; not loosely implied, but positively stipulated: it was obtained not by representation, but by the collected body of the English nation; and is perhaps the only instance on record, when a king talked and treated thus publickly with his free subjects.

The forest laws had long afforded just source for complaint; and the English barons were determined not to omit so favourable an opportunity of removing, for the future, the causes which gave rise to an infinite number of vexatious suits. Accordingly they insisted upon the king's signing a charter, by which the rights of the people would be ascertained. The following translation of this charter is made from an original manuscript in the British Museum.

The CHARTER of FORESTS, granted by king John to his subjects in the year 1215.

"JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. Know ye that, for the honour of God, and the health of our soul and the souls of all our ancestors and successors, and for the exaltation of holy church, and for the amendment of our kingdom, we have of our free and good will, given and granted, for us and our heirs, these liberties hereafter specified, to be had and observed in our kingdom of England for ever."

I. "Imprimis, All the forests made by our grandfather, king Henry, shall be viewed by honest and lawful men; and if he turned any other woods into forests, to the damage of him whose wood it was, it shall forthwith be laid out again and disforested. And if he turned his own proper wood into forest, they shall remain so, saving the common of pasture and other things in the said forest, to such as were formerly wont to have it.

II. "Is the LII. and LV. of the Great Charter put into one chapter:

III. "The archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, knights, and free tenants who have woods in forests, shall have their woods as they had them at the time of the first coronation of our grandfather king Henry, so as they shall be discharged for ever of all purprestures, wastes, and assarts made in those woods, after that time to the beginning of the second year of our coronation; and those who, for the time to come, shall make waste, purpresture, or assarts in those woods, without our licence, shall answer for them.

IV. "Our inspectors, or viewers, shall go through the forest, to make inspection, as it was wont to be at the time of the first coronation of our said grandfather, king Henry, and not otherwise.

V. "The inquisition or view for lawing of dogs which are kept within the forest, for the future, shall be when the view is made; that is, every three years, and then shall be done by the view and testimony of lawful men, and not otherwise. And he whose dog at such time shall be found unlawed, shall be fined three shillings, and for the future no bail shall be taken for lawing. But such lawing shall be according to the common assize, namely, the three claws of the dog's fore foot shall be cut off, or the ball of the foot taken out. And from henceforward dogs shall not be lawed, unless in such places where they were wont to be lawed in the time of king Henry, our grandfather.

VI. "No forester, or bedal, for the future, shall make any ale-shots, or collect any sheaves of corn, or hay, or any kind of grain, or lambs, or pigs, nor shall make any gathering whatsoever, but by the view and oath of twelve inspectors; and when they make their view, so many foresters shall be appointed to keep the forests as they shall reasonably think sufficient.

VII. "No swainmote, for the time to come, shall be holden in our kingdom oftener than thrice a year; that is to say, in the beginning of the fifteen days before Michaelmas, when the agisters come to agist the demesne woods; and about the feast of St. Martin, when our agisters are to receive their pannage; and in these two swainmotes the foresters, verdurers, and agisters, shall meet, and no other by compulsion or distress; and the third swainmote shall be holden in the beginning of the fifteen days before the feast of St. John Baptist, concerning the fawning of our dogs, and at this swainmote shall meet the foresters and verdurers, and no other by compulsion.

VIII. "And furthermore, every forty days throughout the year, the verdurers and foresters shall meet to view the attachments of the forests, as well of vert as of venison, by presentment of the foresters themselves; and they who committed the offences shall be forced to appear before them: but the aforesaid swainmotes shall be holden but in such counties as they are wont to be holden.

IX. "Every freeman shall agist his wood in the forest at his pleasure, and shall receive his pannage.

X. "We grant also, that every freeman may drive his hogs through our demesne woods, freely and without impediment, and may agist them in his own woods, or elsewhere, as he will: and if the hogs of any freeman shall remain one night in our forests, he shall not be troubled so as to lose any thing for it.

XI. "No man, for the time to come, shall lose life or limb for taking our venison; but if any one be seized and convicted of taking venison, he shall be grievously fined, if he hath wherewithal to pay; and if he hath not, he shall lie in our prison a year and a day; and if, after that time, he can find sureties, he shall be released; if not, he shall abjure our realm of England.

XII. "It shall be lawful for every archbishop, bishop, earl, or baron, coming to us by our command, and passing through our forest, to take one or two deer, by view of the forester, if present; if not, he shall cause a horn to be sounded, lest he should seem to do this privately: also, in their return, it shall be lawful for them to do the same thing.

XIII. "Every freeman, for the future, may erect a mill in his own wood, or upon his own land which he hath in the forest; or make a warren, or pond, a marle-pit or ditch, or turn it into arable, without the covert in the arable land, so as it be not to the detriment of any neighbour.

XIV. "Every freeman may have in his woods ayries of hawks, sparrowhawks, falcons, eagles, and herons; and they shall have likewise the honey which shall be found in their woods.

XV. "No forester, for the future, who is not a forester in fee, paying rent for his office, shall take cheminage; that is to say, for a cart two-pence during half a year, and for the other half year two-pence; and for a horse that carries burdens, for half a year a halfpenny, and for the other half year a halfpenny; and then only of those who come as buyers, out of their bailiwick, to buy underwood, timber, bark, or charcoal, to carry it to sell in other places where they will; and for the time to come, there shall be no cheminage taken for any other cart or carriage-horse, unless in those places where anciently it was wont and ought to be taken: but they who carry wood, bark, or coal, upon their backs to sell, though they get their livelihood by it, shall for the future pay no cheminage for passage through the woods of other men: no cheminage shall be given to our foresters, but only in our own woods.

XVI. "All persons outlawed for offences committed in our forests, from the time of king Henry, our grandfather, until our first coronation, may reverse their outlawries without impediment; but shall find pledges, that, for the future, they will not forfeit to us in our forest.

XVII. "No castellan or other person shall hold pleas of the forest, whether concerning vert or venison; but every forester in fee shall attach pleas of the forest, as well concerning vert as venison, and shall present the pleas, or offences, to the verdurers of the several counties; and when they shall be enrolled and sealed under the seals of the verdurers, they shall be presented to the chief forester, when he shall come into those parts to hold pleas of the forest, and shall be determined before him.

XVIII. "And all the customs and liberties aforesaid, which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as belongs to us towards all our vassals of our kingdom, as well laics as clerks, shall observe as much as belongs to them towards their vassals."

But the barons well knew that it was not enough to procure these charters: they were too well acquainted with the sanguinary character of John, not to know that every precaution in their power would be necessary for their support against his anger, and to oblige him to observe the articles of these two instruments of liberty. Twenty-five of their own number were therefore elected, under the title of Conservators of the liberties of the kingdom; and invested with a power almost absolute: Every man in the nation was obliged, under a very severe penalty, to take the oath of obedience to them. Even a power of admonishing the king, with regard to any violation that might be made in the great charter, was delegated to them; and in case he refused to redress the grievance, they were empowered to take up arms against him, in concert with the prelates and nobility, who formed the national council.

John made no objection to this ignominious submission. He submitted, with great tranquillity, to the most humiliating indignities. He even sent writs to his sheriffs, ordering them to oblige every person to swear obedience to the conservators. But notwithstanding all this seeming desire of acting in conformity formity to the articles of the great charter, John never intended to observe that treaty any longer than the necessity of the times obliged him. He only bowed beneath the storm that roared around him; and as soon as the threatening blast was over, determined to resume the power he had lost. He was principally encouraged in this design by the foreign mercenaries he kept about his person. They insinuated, that it was shameful for a king to make any concessions to his subjects; and that no compact, extorted by the force of rebellion, could be binding. These insinuations coincided exactly with the king's opinion, and determined him to make one attempt to shake off the yoke of compulsion, so galling to his mind. He became sullen and melancholy, separated himself from the company of his courtiers, and at last retired privately by night, attended only by seven of his friends, into the Isle of Wight, where he meditated the most fatal vengeance against his enemies. He solicited the pope to absolve him from all the engagements he had entered into with his barons; and sent several emissaries into France, Germany, and Flanders, to engage a number of Brabanders in his service.

The pope exerted all his power in favour of his vassal. He issued a bull, by which the great charter was condemned and annulled, as derogatory to the holy see. Both the king and the barons were prohibited from paying any regard to its articles: the oaths which had been administered were annulled, and the sentence of excommunication denounced against every one that persevered in maintaining the authority of the charter of liberties. But the thunder of the Vatican, in temporal affairs, had now lost great part of its force; and Innocent III. had the mortification to see even Langton, whom he himself had placed on the archiepiscopal throne of Canterbury, refuse to promulgate his censures. Exasperated to the highest degree at this opposition in a prelate he expected would have exerted his utmost power to promote the interest of the holy see, the pope suspended Langton from the exercise of his functions. But this act of papal vengeance did not produce the desired effect; the clergy, with the primate at their head, as well as the nobility and people, discovered a noble ardour for their liberty and independence.

John's emissaries had been very successful on the continent; and engaged a powerful army, wholly composed of soldiers of fortune, in the service of their master. They were all veteran troops, and ready to venture their lives in any cause to gain an independent fortune; and John had promised them the estates of his turbulent barons. As soon as advice arrived of the embarkation of these forces, John ventured to take off the mask; he recalled all the liberties he had granted to his subjects; declared the great charter null and void, and the barons, who had extorted that instrument from him, rebels and traitors. His foreign forces landed at Dover; and John, putting himself at their head, seemed determined to satiate his cruelty. He marched to Northampton, reducing the whole country through which he passed to a smoking desert. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, incited by a cruel and enraged prince, were let loose against the estates, tenants, manors, houses, and parks of the barons. Every thing was levelled in the dust; and cruelties, such as would shock even savages themselves, were practised on the innocent inhabitants.

A.D. 1216. Many of the northern barons, unable to meet the foreign mercenaries in the open field, fled for protection to Alexander, king of Scotland. John followed them into that kingdom, burnt Haddington, Dunbar, and several other towns; but receiving advice that Alexander had raised a numerous army, and was advancing to give him battle, the pusillanimous monarch thought proper to retreat, well knowing that a defeat must be fatal. He had made himself master of most of the castles in England, and now determined to besiege London, the only place of consequence that held out in support of independence.

The barons, now driven to despair, had recourse to a desperate method for relief. They applied to the French for assistance. Saher, earl of Winchester, and Robert Fitz-Walter, were sent to the court of Philip; and offered the sceptre of England to his son Lewis, if he would assist them with a body of forces against their enraged monarch. They asserted, and, indeed, with reason, that John had deposed himself, by submitting an independent crown to the pope.

The ambitious soul of Philip could not resist so noble an offer, but he determined to act with caution. The pope's legate exerted all his influence to render the negotiation abortive. He threatened Philip with the thunder of the Vatican, if he attacked the patrimony of St. Peter. But the dread of the papal censures was not sufficient to deter the French monarch from procuring that crown for his son, which he himself had some time since accepted from the hands of the pontiff. He, however, exacted twenty-five hostages from the barons, as a security for their fidelity; and, on their being delivered, he sent over his son at the head of a formidable army.

The arrival of Lewis put a final period to John's success. The greater part of his foreign troops, who were chiefly natives of France, now deserted him, declaring that they could not fight against the heir of their lawful sovereign. John was encamped near Dover when Lewis landed in the isle of Thanet; but instead of endeavouring to attack the enemy, before the French forces could be joined by the barons, he retreated to Winchester. Conscious guilt and jealous distrust benumbed all the faculties of his soul, and disarmed him at the very instant he stood in need of more than common resolution.

The unmanly fears of John acted more powerfully in favour of Lewis than a numerous army; so that he marched to the capital without meeting with any opposition. He entered the city amidst the acclamations of the people; and the barons and citizens immediately swore fealty to him; while the prince, in return, solemnly promised to restore all their estates, and confirm the ancient privileges of the kingdom.

Though Lewis was master of the capital, and at the head of a numerous army, innumerable difficulties still remained to be surmounted, before he could make himself master of England. Most of the maritime places were in the interest of John, who had favoured the sea-ports with many valuable privileges, and made many excellent regulations with regard to the marine. This was an alarming circumstance to Lewis, who considered his being master of some convenient harbour as a matter of the last importance. Destitute of that advantage, his receiving reinforcements from the continent would be rendered very precarious; nor would even his own retreat, in case of a reverse of fortune, be secure. He therefore attempted to make himself master of Dover; but his enterprize was rendered abortive; the castle defied his power. He therefore carried his arms into the inland parts of Kent and Sussex, which he reduced with great facility. But William de Coldingham, at the head of a thousand archers, retiring into the wilds and fastnesses of that country, supported himself against all the power of the French army.

John was not idle. He fortified and furnished with provisions several sea-ports; flattering himself that the bolt of papal thunder, which was now ready to be launched against Philip and his son, would defeat all their schemes, and restore him to the quiet possession of the English crown. He was mistaken. Innocent, indeed, fulminated the sentence of excommunication against both, but the effect fell far short of John's sanguinary expectations. The French bishops declared the excommunication of Philip void, void, and Lewis paid little regard to the papal censure.

He was more desirous of procuring a proper support than of guarding against the effects of Innocent's sentence. He therefore once more led his army to Dover, and invested that important fortress. But Lewis found the attempt more difficult than he imagined. Hubert de Burgh, the governor, was a brave and vigilant officer, and being at the head of a resolute garrison, made such furious sallies upon the French army, that Lewis was obliged to remove his camp to a considerable distance, and turn the siege into a blockade.

This miscarriage alarmed Lewis, especially as the barons appeared less active in his service: but he was too haughty to conciliate their esteem by caresses, and wanted prudence to foresee the consequences of his neglect. He did not even endeavour to conceal his disgust; he excluded them from his councils and confidence; and instead of restoring the nobility to their honours and estates, he bestowed all his favours upon his own countrymen. The barons now saw their error, in calling in a foreign force to their assistance; the people complained of the oppressions exercised by their new masters; and every thing wore the appearance of fresh disturbances. About the same time it was rumoured, that the viscount of Melun, one of Lewis's courtiers, fell dangerously ill, and perceiving himself tottering on the brink of eternity, he sent for some of his friends among the English barons, to warn them of their danger. He told them that Lewis had formed the detestable design of exterminating them with all their families, and bestowing their estates and titles on his foreign favourites. This report, whether true or false, acted powerfully on the English barons, and was of infinite prejudice to Lewis. The earl of Salisbury, and several others of the principal nobility determined, if possible, to elude the force of the storm which threatened their destruction. They sent private information to John of their intention of joining his army, and obtained a promise of a free pardon.

Animated with the hopes of being joined by his nobility, John exerted himself in collecting an army, and determined to bring on a decisive battle with the invader of his country. But in marching over the washes from Lynn into Lincolnshire, at an improper time of tide, the sea rushed in upon him with such violence and rapidity, that he lost the greater part of his forces, together with all his treasure, baggage and regalia, he himself escaping with difficulty. He reached Swinehead-abbey, but the great fatigues he had undergone, and the constant hurry and perturbation of his spirits, added to the affliction he felt at his late irreparable misfortune, threw him into a violent fever. He was carried in a litter to Newark castle, where he paid the debt of nature on the eighteenth of October, in the fifty-first year of his age and the eighteenth of his reign.

The character of this prince, when painted by the pencil of truth, will perhaps appear more odious, than when drawn even by the pen of envy. He was deeply practised in almost every vice, and a stranger to almost every virtue. The murder of his nephew, the infringement of public property, and the violation of private honour and domestic peace, have consigned his memory to eternal ignominy. Insolent in prosperity, and rash in adversity, pusillanimous in war, and tyrannical in peace, this prince was never beloved by his people; he could hardly boast of having made a friend. But his reign, however wicked, gave occasion to those excellent charters which form the basis of the English constitution. His tyranny first prompted the barons to assert, and his sloth and indolence enabled them to obtain those inestimable rights and privileges which are at once the glory and security of Englishmen.

Literature made very little progress during this period. No discoveries were made in the sciences; the arts had no patrons among the great. The little learning that subsisted was confined to the cloister, which was at once the habitation of the studious, and the repository of their writings. Nor were even the monks remarkable for their learning. A few of them indeed wrote with some degree of eloquence, but none equalled William of Malmesbury, who has been already mentioned in a former period. The following are the most eminent for their writings, and perhaps the only persons of learning whose names deserve to be handed down to posterity.

Earlred, Æthelred, or Aldred, surnamed Rievallensis, was abbot of Rievaulx, or Rievelsbury, in Lincolnshire; and greatly esteemed by the most respectable persons of his time. He wrote the life of Edward the Confessor, the history of the battle of the standard, and the genealogy of the kings of England. He died in 1166.

William, a monk of Newburgh, generally called Gulielmus Neubrigenfis, was no elegant writer, if the times in which he lived be considered. In his history, which ends with the year 1197, he fully proved that Geoffrey of Monmouth's history, which had till then been looked upon with a kind of barbarous reverence, is no better than an idle romance. The time of his death is uncertain.

John, prior of Hexham, wrote a continuation of the history of Simeon of Durham, and brought it down to the year 1154. He appears to have been a much better historian than Simeon himself, and to have wrote from a clearer evidence. He flourished in the reign of Richard I. but the time of his death is not known.

Roger Hoveden, was chaplain to Henry II. He wrote a book of Annals which commenced in 732, and was carried down as low as the reign of king John. These annals are written in a very pleasing style, and abound with valuable materials for the civil as well as the ecclesiastical history of those times. We have no account of the time of his death; but it is believed to have happened soon after the conclusion of his annals.

Ralph de Diceto, dean of St. Pauls, flourished in the reign of king John. He wrote a chronicle of the British kings from Bute to Cadwallader, and from Hengist to Harold. He was also the author of the Chronological Abbreviations. They relate chiefly to ecclesiastical affairs, and end at the conquest. Besides these he wrote a book entitled Imagines Historiarum, or Images of History. This work consists chiefly of short historical anecdotes, with a wild uninteresting digression upon the wars that happened between parents and children in all ages, occasioned by the difference between Henry II. and his sons. He died about the year 1205.

John Brompton, abbot of Sorewall, in Yorkshire, wrote a chronicle of the English transactions from the year 588 to 1198. This work is valuable only for containing a large collection of Anglo-Saxon history, faithfully extracted, and agreeing perfectly with our most authentic records. There is, indeed, a mixture of romance and improbability in many of the facts he relates; but this should be attributed rather to the false taste of the age than of the writer. He died in the year 1210.

John Wallingford, supposed to have been abbot of St. Albans, wrote a short chronicle of the progress of the Saxons and Danes in England. This work is still preserved in the British Museum, but wretchedly mutilated and defaced.

Gervase, a monk of Canterbury, flourished in the reign of king John, and is said to have been a very learned antiquarian. He wrote a large history of the Britons, Saxons, and Normans, from their origin to the reign of king John; together with an account of the divisions of Old Britain, its monasteries and episcopal seats. The greater part of this work is lost; but the parts that still remain, which include the reigns of Stephen, Henry II. and Richard I. sufficiently prove the whole to have been a very valuable performance.

These are the principal writers that flourished in the reigns of Henry II. Stephen, Richard I. and John; a period very remarkable, and great part of it devoted to war and tumult. The torch of discord was lighted up at the death of Henry II. and continued to disseminate its baleful influence till the death of king John. It is no wonder, therefore, that the sciences were little cultivated during that period. When the peace of a kingdom is destroyed, it is in vain to expect the produce of tranquil retirement.

The commerce of England was also at a low ebb during this period. It is well known, that the Flemings and Italians were in possession of the two most important branches. Flanders was the grand market of Europe for all woollen manufactures, and Italy for silk; and it is highly probable, that with the habits, manners, customs, and language of the Normans, we likewise imported their manufactures; for the English were too much engaged in civil wars, and so often called off from attending to the arts of peace, by their lords, to whom they owed military service, that nothing but wars and tumults, civil discord, and unnatural rebellions, engaged their attention. Coaches were, however, first introduced during the reign of Henry II. but not the art of constructing them; and the Jews first practised that grand article of commerce, so well known by the appellation of bills of exchange. Necessity seems to have been the mother of that noble invention. The Jews being, at this period, driven from one state to another, as avarice or enthusiasm directed, found out this method of secreting their riches, and of transporting them with ease from one country to another, as soon as they found the impositions of any prince, under whom they lived, too heavy for them to support; and it was the vice of the times to oppress these miserable wanderers, and to seize at once their persons and effects on the most frivolous pretences.

The Normans, flushed with victory, fought only how to pass away their time in mirth and rustic festivity; and employed almost all their intervals of leisure in hunting, feasting, and women. Nor is their excessive licentiousness in this respect at all surprising, for the very laws tended to promote incontinence. Every violation of chastity had its fixed price, which was not beyond the reach of a substantial yeoman. The lewd lives of the clergy, who cohabited publicly with concubines, tended still farther to debase the age. Sometimes the archbishops, at other times the sovereigns, endeavoured to reform the clergy, but without effect. It was impossible to correct the enormities of ecclesiastics, while superstition blinded the eyes of the people, and induced them to believe, that what constituted a crime in a layman, was a virtue in a priest.

From the accession of Henry III. to the death of Edward II.

HENRY III. furnamed of WINDSOR.

A.D. 1216. ON the death of king John, the crown fell, by lineal succession, to his eldest son Henry, then only nine years of age; and, consequently, unable to hold the reins of government at a time when the utmost steadiness, intrepidity, and precaution, were absolutely necessary. Lewis, from this circumstance, prognosticated the success of his enterprize. But he was mistaken: what he considered as a misfortune to the royal party, proved the most favourable accident that could possibly have happened. The fidelity, prudence, and courage of Pembroke, earl-marshal of England, nobly stemmed the current of misfortune, and delivered the kingdom from becoming a province to France. He was invested with the military command in consequence of his post, and seemed born to support the languishing constitution of his country. He seized the helm of government, and held it with such virtues and abilities, that he weathered the tempest, and at last restored tranquillity to the state. He well knew that no success could be expected till a mutual confidence between the king and his barons was restored: this was, therefore, his first care; and this was greatly facilitated by the tyrannical behaviour of Lewis, who had sufficiently exasperated the barons, and they now wanted only a pretence to desert his service.

This was too favourable an opportunity to be lost, and Pembroke accordingly summoned a council of the barons at Gloucester. The meeting was very numerous; and the marshal, as soon as the members were seated, entered the assembly, leading young

Henry by the hand. The barons were pleased at the sight of the prince: Pembroke perceived it, and cried out, "Behold your king!" A pause succeeded; and the earl thus addressed the assembly:

"My dear friends and countrymen, though we justly opposed the father of this young prince, on account of his wicked and mistaken conduct; yet this child is guiltless of his father's errors; and as the punishment of offences ought only to be inflicted on their authors, it would be unjust for us to make the son bear the iniquity of his father. It is our duty and interest to forget our animosities, and in compassion to his tender years, unite to support him on the throne of his ancestors. Let us exert our utmost efforts to drive Lewis and all his followers out of this oppressed country. By this noble, this generous action, we shall save our kingdom from becoming the reproach of its neighbours, and break the yoke of a debasing and foreign slavery."

This address carried conviction to the hearts of the barons. They had for some time bewailed the miseries of their country, and readily joined in support of their liberty and independence. An universal acclamation of joy broke out in the assembly; the members cried out with one voice, "Let Henry be made king!"

The ceremony of the coronation was accordingly performed, in presence of the pope's legate, and Henry swore fealty to the pontiff, and renewed that homage, to which his father had already subjected the kingdom. The barons were persuaded that this precaution was then necessary; the assistance of the pope tion by which John had restrained himself from buying aids and scutages, without the consent of the great council of the nation, was also omitted in this instrument. The barons perceived that no aids, unless they were evidently reasonable, could be levied upon men who had arms in their hands, and who were able to repel any acts of violence. Nor did he content himself with granting anew the privileges that had been enjoyed in the preceding reign; he caused writs, in the king's name, to be issued to the sheriffs of the different counties, commanding them to lay open all forests, agreeable to the intension of the charter granted for that purpose by king John; and some time after, he sent the chief justiciary of the forests on a circuit through the kingdom, to see that the orders were fully executed, and the bounds of the forests distinctly marked. At the same time, orders were given to demolish all the new castles that had been erected since the beginning of the disputes between the late king and his barons.

A.D. 1219. But while the Protector was thus exerting all his abilities to render the nation happy, death put a final period to his labours and his life. The nation suffered an irreparable loss in the death of this great man, whose valour, integrity, and prudence, had broke the yoke of foreign slavery, and restored the liberties of Englishmen. He was succeeded by William de Roches, bishop of Winchester; and Hubert de Burgh, the gallant defender of Dover castle, was created chief justiciary of the kingdom. The counsels of the latter were conformable to his character, that of a great, a prudent, and a virtuous man. They were for some time followed; and had he possessed the authority of Pembroke, the nation would not have so greatly regretted the loss of that eminent patriot. But his power was not sufficient to repress the licentiousness of the barons, who were too strong to be restrained by laws under a minority; and whose rapacity induced them to usurp the demerits of the crown, as well as the possessions of their weaker neighbours. Hence revolts were multiplied; and the government was perpetually employed in reducing insurrections, or executing criminals.

A.D. 1222. A wrestling match between the citizens of London and Westminster occasioned a violent riot. It seems that the Londoners came off victorious; which so exasperated the steward of Westminster, that he determined to revenge the affront; but in order to conceal his intention, proposed a second trial. The Londoners accepted the offer, and came to the field to decide the contest; but instead of a fair trial, they were attacked by the steward and his followers, armed with clubs and other offensive weapons, and obliged to retreat into the city. Exasperated at this treatment, the Londoners, headed by one Constantine Fitz Arnulph, a bold, factious citizen, repaired to Westminster, where they committed many dreadful outrages, and demolished several houses belonging to the abbot and steward. Hubert, in order to put a stop to such riotous proceedings, ventured to punish the leaders, without bringing them to a trial. This step, which was a direct infringement of the great charter, excited the clamours of the populace, who, with justice, conceived themselves injured, and they demanded a new confirmation of the great charter. A general council was called, and this demand of the people taken into consideration. During the debates, one of the council of the regency asserted, that no regard ought to be paid to the great charter, because it was extorted by violence. But Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, severely reprimanded the speaker for his indiscretion, as his assertion had a direct tendency to raise a rebellion in the nation; affirming, at the same time, that the demand of the people was founded on justice; and that the government could not, without the most palpable injustice, dispense with any article in the charter. His opinion was adopted; and the parliament having granted a subsidy, the king issued orders for a new charter of confirmation. At length the bishops, by the terror of ecclesiastical censures, obliged the barons to deliver up the fortresses belonging to the crown, of which they had forcibly taken possession.

A.D. 1226. The domestic peace of the kingdom was hardly settled, before the ministry thought it expedient to summon a parliament, in order to deliberate on an extraordinary demand made by the court of Rome. The pope had sent over a legate, under pretence of removing a reproach that had long been thrown upon the court of the Vatican. The pontiff observed, that the holy see having long been accused of selling her favours for money, it was the duty of all good Christians to assist in removing the cause of such a scandalous imputation, which flowed intirely from the extreme indigence of the Roman church. He therefore demanded, that two prebends in every cathedral, and two cells in every convent in England, should be granted to the church of Rome, by an authentic deed, confirmed by an act of the great council of the nation. Such assistance, it was added, would enable the popes to dispense indulgences with generosity and moderation.

This demand was treated with contempt by the English parliament; no answer was returned to Rome. But the archbishop of Canterbury, who was more immediately interested, wrote to the pope, informing him, "That when the Roman see had procured the same assistance from other nations, England would follow their example; but would never establish the precedent."

The character of Henry now began to unfold itself, and shewed too many symptoms of an administration feeble and tempestuous. He was naturally of a mild and timid disposition, and possessed neither vigour of mind nor political discernment. His resentments were violent and transitory; his attachments sudden and desultory: the one excited no apprehensions; the other was not consolidated into friendship. At the same time, his irresolution was blended with the principles of avarice, tyranny, and oppression. Little expectations of happiness could therefore be formed from his government. The dreadful sword of civil discord seemed ready to be drawn, and spread desolation over this devoted country.

A.D. 1227. The administration of Henry was, therefore, never popular; and his actions soon deprived him of the affections of his subjects. On his obtaining the age of majority, he summoned a parliament at Oxford, and declared his intention of taking into his own hands the reins of government; adding, that as the great charter, and that of the forests, had been obtained by an act of rebellion, and confirmed in his minority, he could not consider himself as legally bound by any acts or promises during his infancy. The members were astonished at this declaration; and the assembly broke up in a manner that sufficiently indicated, that the storm of resentment would soon exert its baleful power.

Richard, earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, returning from France, where he had for some time headed an army in Guienne, found one of his manors possessed by a German officer, who claimed it as a gift from king John. Richard insisted, that his pretended right should be determined by his peers, and immediately dispossessed the German. But instead of having recourse to the laws of England, he posted to court, and complained to the king of the injustice done him by the earl of Cornwall. Henry, without giving himself any trouble to examine into the truth of his allegations, ordered him a writ under the royal sign manual, commanding a restitution of the estate. Exasperated at such treatment, the earl refused obedience, and repaired to court to defend his property. The king, highly offended at Richard's obstinacy, told him, that he should either restore the manor in question within a limited time, or depart the kingdom. So palpable an exertion of arbitrary power in his brother roused the passions of Richard, who boldly replied, that he would appeal to the laws of his country, repeating, that the judgment of his peers only should oblige him either to part with his property, or to quit the kingdom.

Henry, whose anger as well as friendship was momentary, soon forgot the offence, and fearing the power of Richard, who was greatly beloved by the barons, he submitted to petition a reconciliation, and offered to settle upon him the dower of the late queen, and augment his appenage with the lands of Boulogne. The terms were accepted, and both the cause and the offence buried in oblivion.

A. D. 1232. The pusillanimous and tyrannical conduct of Henry had so highly exasperated the barons, that they refused to grant him the subsidies required. The court of Rome had taken advantage of the king's weakness, and pursued the most unjust and unpopular measures. Many of the principal benefices in England were possessed by Italian priests, and one of the king's chaplains is said to have held seven-hundred livings. The prelates and lay patrons were inhibited from presenting natives, till all the foreign clergy were sufficiently provided for. It is no wonder, that so shameful a practice raised a general clamour in the kingdom. It was considered as a national insult, and several associations were formed for delivering the realm from such shameful oppressions. The principal leader of these confederates was Robert de Twenge, a knight in the north of England. He had long beheld the tyrannical proceedings of the pope with detestation, but on being deprived by his holiness of the patronage of a church, he determined to take ample revenge on the foreign priests. He assumed the name of William Witham, and encouraged his followers to strip the houses of the Italian clergy, and dispose of their effects. They continued this practice for some time without opposition, and the foreign ecclesiastics, not daring to appear, took refuge in the convents. Informed of these violent proceedings, the pope wrote in a very lofty stile to Henry, commanding him, under pain of excommunication, to chastise the insolence of his subjects, and restore the Italian clergy to their benefices. The pusillanimous soul of Henry was alarmed at these menaces of the holy father; he dreaded the effects of a papal censure. He ordered a strict inquisition to be made in the several parts of the kingdom, where those riots had prevailed; and had the mortification to find, that they had been supported and encouraged by men of all ranks; Hubert de Burgh, the chief justiciary, did not escape suspicion. At last Robert de Twenge, who scorned to disown an action, which he thought justifiable, or to let any innocent person suffer on his account, appeared in the royal presence, attended by five knights, and boldly declared himself the leader of the confederates, who had stripped the houses of the foreign priests; alledging, that the injuries he had received were the sole motives for his proceedings. Pleased with the ingenuous confession, and intrepid behaviour of this resolute knight, who disdained to suffer tamely an injury, though inflicted by the holy father himself, the king gave him a free pardon, and procured a restitution of his right to the patronage in question.

But though Hubert was cleared from all suspicion by the voluntary confession of Twenge, yet the inconstancy of Henry furnished his enemies with an opportunity of procuring his ruin. Excited by the remonstrances of the bishop of Winchester, who hated Hubert, because he had been active in opposing his destructive councils, this weak prince, insensible to all his services, persecuted him with so much fury, that he was obliged to take sanctuary in a church; whence he afterwards escaped out of the kingdom. He was accused, among other crimes, of having had recourse to magic in order to gain an ascendancy over Henry, and of having stolen from the royal treasury an enchanted ring, which had the virtue of rendering the wearer invulnerable. These accusations, however ridiculous and absurd they may appear at present, were entirely conformable to the strange prejudices which then prevailed in every part of Europe.

A. D. 1233. The disgrace of Hubert, put Peter de Roches, bishop of Winchester, a Poitevin by birth, in possession of the supreme authority, which he employed to the worst of purposes. His temper was proud and tyrannical, and the prepossession he entertained in favour of his own countrymen alarmed the English. The court was filled with these strangers, and he conferred on them every office and every command in the disposal of the crown. These proceedings soon produced a general spirit of discontent, which Henry considered only as a confirmation of that rebellious spirit which Winchester had represented to be the characteristic of the English nobility. They were denied all access to the king; and treated by the minister with contempt. But these preposterous methods served only to increase the flame: all the arts of the court were insufficient to erase from the minds of the English, the remembrance of the great charter of liberties.

Their patience was at last exhausted, by the insults and injuries they received from these insolent strangers. They formed themselves into a body, and deputed the earl marshal to lay their grievances before Henry. He accordingly demanded an audience, and, with the noble spirit of an Englishman, laid the complaints of the nation before the king: he besought him not to continue lavishing his favours upon foreigners, to the utter neglect of his natural subjects. Adding, that if he continued to treat their remonstrance with neglect, both himself and the other nobility, would think it their duty to withdraw themselves from his councils, where they had no power to support the welfare of their country.

The bishop of Winchester, who was present at this audience, without giving the king time to reply, answered the earl with unparalleled effrontery; "That it was the highest degree of insolence in the earl, or any other subject, to pretend to dictate to his majesty, on whom he ought to confer his favours: that both the king and his father had been so ill treated by the English, that the only expedient of procuring his own safety was that of trusting to foreigners; and that if their number in the kingdom was not already sufficient to reduce his rebellious subjects to their duty, large reinforcements should be procured."

The earl was astonished; he retired without returning an answer, and joined in the confederacy for checking the despotic power, which the king, by the violent counsels of his worthless minister, seemed desirous to assume. Henry was alarmed, and the bishop, to gain time, advised him to call a parliament at London. The barons refused to attend, and even threatened to deprive Henry of his crown, if the Poitevins were not banished the kingdom. Another parliament was called, and the barons presented themselves dressed in armour, and attended by their followers. Henry now saw his danger, and was desirous of a reconciliation; but the artful prelate found means to remove his fears by sowing dissensions among them, and gaining the earls of Cornwall and Chester over to the royal party. The estates of several of the confederates were confiscated, without any trial by their peers; and, by a very impolitic liberality, bestowed upon the Poitevins, before so odious to the English. But the time was approaching, when these wicked ministers, who had insulted the nation, and threatened the people with the most dreadful slavery, should feel the weight of English resentment; and be stripped of the authority they had so basely applied.

A. D. 1234. Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, followed by his suffragans, repaired to the palace and demanded an audience, which could not be refused. At this interview the prelate described, in the most pathetic manner, the dreadful effects of those ruinous measures, which he had pursued by the instigation of his ministers. He formally accused Peter, bishop of Winchester, as the author of these pernicious counsels, which had diffused a spirit of discontent through the whole nation; and after making a long detail of the grievances of the people, insisted that the king should remove from his councils, a minister so odious to all his subjects; adding, that if so reasonable a request was refused, he would excommunicate both him, and all who opposed so necessary a reformation.

This spirited remonstrance, and the threatening at the close of it, produced the desired effect. Henry perceived his error. The bishop of Winchester was stripped of all his employments, and the insolent Poitevins banished the kingdom. The religion of those times, notwithstanding the superstition with which it was debased, was sometimes of the utmost service of the state; it affected offending ministers, basking in the sun-shine of royalty, beyond the reach of temporal remonstrances, and made them feel the weight of national resentment.

A. D. 1236. Happy had it been for the king and happy for his people, had Henry learned wisdom from former miscarriages; but there are men, whom vice or indolence has rendered incorrigible. Henry seems to have been of this number. The remonstrance of the archbishop had, in all appearance, convinced him of his error in cherishing foreigners in preference to his English subjects. But this conviction was temporary; Henry soon forgot both his danger and his interest. He married Eleanor the daughter of the count of Provence; and threw himself again into the arms of foreigners. William de Savoy, bishop of Valence, and uncle to the new queen, became his principal favourite. He took every occasion of giving him a remarkable preference over the greatest, and most faithful of his own subjects, and committed to his sole direction all the affairs of the state.

The English nobility were immediately alarmed. They dreaded a revival of the late times of ministerial insolence and oppression, and determined to exert all their power to put a stop to the career of this foreign minion. They began with presenting dutiful addresses to the king, at the same time remonstrating with a becoming spirit, against those measures, which they apprehended to be destructive of the public interest, and that union which should always subsist between an English king and his subjects. But they succeeded not in their attempts. Valence supported his power, and foreign influence grew every day more prevalent at court. The minister, who was offended with the English barons for their late spirited remonstrances, spared no pains to render them suspected by the king, and to remove the most active among them from his person and government. The seals were demanded from the bishop of Chichester, who had filled the high office of chancellor with the most unblemished integrity; but the prelate, on receiving the king's message, nobly replied, "That having received the seals by the order of the parliament, he would resign them by order of that assembly only."

A. D. 1237. Henry was, however, so infatuated, that this answer of the chancellor had no effect on his conduct. He adhered to his foreign ministers, and listened not to the complaints of his people. But the wants of his needy courtiers, soon exhausted his revenues, and he was obliged to call a parliament to procure a supply. The session was very full, some important business being expected to be laid before them. But they were told, "That the chief reason for their being called together, was to desire them to grant an aid, which should be collected and disposed of, for the necessary uses of the state, by such persons as they themselves should think proper to commission for that purpose."

Henry had so often broke his promises, that the parliament were no longer to be deceived; and returned for answer, "That they had often granted the king aids, without receiving any marks of his affection: that since his accession to the throne, his dominions were considerably lessened, though he had frequently exacted from his subjects very large sums, which had been wholly lavished away upon foreign favourites, to the impoverishment of the state, and the disgrace of his character." To this vigorous reply, Henry pleaded the expences of his own and his sister's marriage, which had entirely exhausted his treasury; but if they would grant him a thirtieth part of their moveables, he promised upon his honour, never to injure or oppress any baron of the realm. In order to facilitate their compliance, he disavowed the pope's bull, which his ministry had lately obtained for the resumption of grants; declared he would inviolably observe the articles of the Great Charter; and ordered a sentence of excommunication to be solemnly denounced against all persons, himself not excepted, who should dare to violate that sacred constitution.

Mollified by these assurances, and pleased with the admission of several English noblemen into his council, the parliament complied with his demand. But ordered the money arising from this tax to be deposited in certain abbeys, churches and castles, as a fund sacred to the necessities of the state; and the following express condition annexed to the grant for levying it, "That the king should no longer hearken to the suggestions of foreigners, who had already oppressed and impoverished the nation, but be governed for the future by his own natural born subjects."

But Henry was not to be reclaimed. He had no sooner obtained the supply he had requested, than he returned to his former measures, shewed as much fondness for foreigners as ever, and to secure himself a party sufficient to oppose the power of his barons, he, with a meanness never to be forgiven, made application to the pope, for a legate to be sent into England, under whose protection he thought he might securely violate his recent engagements, which necessity had compelled him to enter into with his people. The English were alarmed, and the archbishop of Canterbury warmly expostulated with him on his conduct for suffering a legate to come into the kingdom without any apparent necessity, and without the knowledge of the parliament and clergy. But Henry regarded not the remonstrances of the prelate, the censures of the church were no longer terrible; he knew the authority of the pope to be superior to that of the archbishop. He seized the money deposited in the churches and convents by the parliament for the use of the state, and squandered it with the utmost profusion upon strangers and favourites. His brother, the earl of Cornwall, saw this destructive conduct with regret, and putting himself at the head of the nobility, demanded an audience, where he openly upbraided Henry with this shameful breach of faith and honour.

But though Henry relied entirely on the power of the pope for support against the resentment of his barons and clergy, the inconsistency of his conduct was so amazing, that he sent a body of troops to the assistance of the emperor Frederic II. then at open war with the court of Rome. Gregory IX. who then filled the papal chair, was highly offended at what he termed the insolence of his vassal, and ordered the legate to make the most severe remonstrances. The pusillanimous monarch was alarmed, and to avert the censure of the vatican, he suffered the sentence of excommunication against Frederic to be published in all the churches of England; though that prince had lately married the princess Isabella, Henry's sister.

A. D. 1242. Henry had now wholly lost the love of his subjects. His strange conduct had rendered him an object of contempt. The barons were justly incensed against the rapacious foreigners, who wasted the royal treasure, governed the kingdom, and treated the laws of England with contempt. The parliament therefore refused to grant their exhausted monarch any supplies, and the king had recourse to the most most illegal methods and dangerous expedients for supplying his necessities. He exacted loans; he demanded benevolences; he usurped a power of dispensing with the laws, because the pope scrupled not to dispense with the canons of the church, whenever the interests of the holy see required it. The people complained loudly; the barons formed associations for their defence; and the judges were alarmed at the illegal proceedings of the king. "Alas!" exclaimed one of them upon the bench, "in what a corrupt age do we live! The civil court is vitiated in imitation of the ecclesiastical; and the river is poisoned from that fountain."

Henry was desirous of assisting the count de la Marche, who had married his mother Isabella, against Lewis IX. of France. The count had given Henry the strongest assurances of success; promising, that all the old tenants of his family in France would immediately join his standards, together with the king of Arragon, and the count of Thoulouse. Charmed with the prospect of recovering his old dominions on the continent, and wresting from Lewis the territories which Philip had taken from his father, Henry summoned a parliament, in order to procure the supplies necessary for carrying his arms into France. But he had soon the mortification to find his request denied; the parliament absolutely refused to grant him any assistance for carrying on the war. Henry, however, found means of raising the necessary sums at exorbitant interest, and passed over to the continent at the head of a considerable body of troops. But this prince was equally destitute of military and civil talents. His army was defeated at Tillebourg; he abandoned the port of Poictou which belonged to him, and returned to England covered with disgrace.

A. D. 1244. For some time past the whole kingdom had resounded with complaints against the enterprizes of the pope of Rome: but his holiness was not to be intimidated; he determined to proceed, and even to increase his destructive exactions. Accordingly he sent over one Martin as his nuncio, to demand a thousand marks from the clergy, to assist him in the war he was carrying on against the emperor. This nuncio was invested with more ample powers than any of his predecessors, and his oppression and insolence exceeded every thing that had yet been experienced from that proud and venal court. The nation was alarmed; and the barons resolved to lay before the general council, then assembled at Lyons, the intolerable oppressions of the holy see.

The methods made use of by Martin to extort money from the clergy exasperated the nation; and it was concluded on, in an assembly of the barons, to drive him out of the kingdom by force, if persuasions could not prevail upon him to depart peaceably. They assembled in arms, under pretence of holding a tournament; and chose Fulk Fitz Warren as their messenger, to carry their resolutions to the nuncio. They could not have made a more proper choice. He had himself severely suffered by papal exactions, and thoroughly hated every partisan of Rome.

Fitz Warren set out immediately to execute his commission, with determined resolution to terrify the nuncio, and induce him to abandon the kingdom. On being introduced into Martin's presence, he told him, with a stern and resolute air, that he must instantly prepare for his departure from England. The nuncio, little accustomed to such disrespectful addresses, asked him by whose authority he dared to speak to him in so insolent a manner? "By the authority of a body of English knights now in arms," answered Fulk, "who ordered me to tell you, that if either you yourself, or any of your followers, remain in England more than three days, every one of you shall be cut to pieces. Act as you please; but remember it is an English knight that delivers you this message." Martin was sufficiently intimidated. He was too well acquainted with the character of the English to condemn a menace so peremptorily delivered. He immediately complained to Henry, and desired his protection. But the king, who had for some time beheld the exactions of the pope with concern, told him, that his robberies and oppressions had raised such a spirit of resentment in every part of the kingdom, that he was hardly able to protect himself against his own subjects, who were thoroughly incensed against him for having countenanced his rapacious proceedings. Martin was now convinced of his dangerous situation, and determined to abandon a kingdom where his life was in the utmost danger. He accordingly demanded a passport, and embarked directly for the continent.

A. D. 1245. The English ambassadors, on their arrival at Lyons, laid their complaints before the council, where the pope himself presided in person. They represented, that the benefices enjoyed by the Italian clergy in England amounted to sixty thousand marks a year, a sum that exceeded the annual revenue of the crown. They accused the pope of frequently cancelling his own acts by clauses of non obstante inserted in his bulls; a clause absolutely destructive of all the rights of patrons, and of all the liberties of the English church. They expatiated on the perpetual extortions of the nuncios and legates, and various other oppressions to which the British clergy had been so long exposed. The pope was confounded, and gave an elusive answer. He feared the power of the council, and was willing to soothe the English agents. He promised them redress; and caused two bulls for that purpose to be published. And the resignation of the superiority of England by king John to the holy see having been mentioned, the earl of Norfolk insisted, that neither that prince, nor any other, had the least right, without the consent of his barons, to subject the kingdom to a foreign servitude. This noble opposition convinced the court of Rome, that it was in vain to urge a pretension which was untenable from the distance of the English, and the independent spirit of that people.

A. D. 1246. But the promises of the pontiff lasted no longer than his fears. The council of Lyons was no sooner broke up, than he renewed all his exactions. The English were exasperated; and a parliament was summoned at London for redressing this public grievance. A state of the hardships suffered by the nation from papal tyranny was drawn up; and, after being signed by the king, bishops and temporal lords, sent to the court of Rome, and satisfaction demanded from the pontiff. This instrument produced not the desired effect. The ambassadors were treated with contempt, and even threatened to proceed to the same extremities against Henry, as he had lately done against the emperor. The king immediately prohibited any farther payments to the pope. But Henry wanted firmness to support a measure so agreeable to his subjects; he relapsed into his former indolence, and suffered the pope to proceed in his extortions.

A. D. 1253. Innocent IV. was one of the most implacable pontiffs that ever filled the papal chair. The hatred he had conceived against the emperor Frederic did not die with that monarch; it devolved on his grandson, Conrad, the lawful heir of the crown of Sicily, but whose succession was set aside by the perfidious arts of his uncle Mainfroy. Innocent soon perceived that his own force was far from being sufficient to dispossess the latter from the Italian dominions of Frederic; and therefore sent a nuncio into England, to offer the Sicilian crown to Richard, earl of Cornwall. That nobleman, though extremely fond of power, had prudence sufficient to perceive, that the sole design of the court of Rome was nothing more than the acquisition of a large sum of money, and prudently declined the offer. But Henry had not the sagacity of his brother; he accepted it for his his second son, Edmund, and gave the pope unlimited credit for expending the sums necessary for the reduction of Sicily. Edmund was accordingly treated with the honours of royalty; and no means of extortion or oppression were omitted by the pope, in conjunction with Henry, to obtain money from the English, under pretence of establishing prince Edmund in his new kingdom.

A.D. 1255. The papal army began the war with some success; but Manfred, determined to risk his crown on the event of one decisive action, advanced against the Roman forces. A battle ensued; the army of Innocent was totally defeated, and he himself threatened with being besieged in his capital. His haughty soul could not bear this reverse of fortune; the violence of his passion threw him into a fever, which, in a short time, put a period to his life. He was succeeded in the papal chair by Alexander IV. who pursued the same measures with his predecessor, and undertook to place Edmund on the throne of Sicily.

A.D. 1256. Henry, who, in order to grasp this phantom of sovereignty for his son, had subjected himself to all the demands of the pontiff, soon found himself more embarrassed than ever. The parliament refused to grant the necessary supplies for carrying this ridiculous project into execution; and the whole weight fell upon the clergy. This was not, however, effected, without a noble struggle from the ecclesiastics. For when Rustan, the pope's nuncio, assembled the prelates, and proposed their signing obligatory notes proportioned to the benefices of each individual, the bishop of London declared, he would sooner lose his head than submit to so shameful an act of tyranny. He was seconded by the bishop of Worcester; and the whole assembly unanimously declared, that the clergy of England would not submit to be enslaved by the pope. The nuncio complained of this refusal to Henry, who threatened the bishop of London with his resentment; but the prelate, far from being intimidated, replied, with a noble intrepidity, "That he knew the king and the pope were his superiors; but if they deprived him of his mitre, he would supply its place with a helmet." This generous stand in support of the liberties of the English church, exasperated the haughty Rustan; who finding it would be impossible to prevail on them in a body, determined to wreak his vengeance on each in particular. He accordingly commenced prosecutions against individuals for pretended faults, and obliged them to make an atonement, by paying very considerable sums. The prelates appealed to the pope; and Alexander, dreading the consequences of driving the English clergy to despair, ordered his nuncio to desist from his prosecutions.

During these disputes between the nuncio and the clergy, Henry was determined to make another attempt to procure a subsidy from his barons. A parliament was called for that purpose; and the archbishop of Messina was sent with letters from the pope, pressing the nobility, in the most earnest manner, to comply with the request of their sovereign. But all attempts were in vain: the parliament, after mature deliberation, unanimously refused to grant the subsidy.

Rustan, finding all their hopes of procuring a supply from the parliament abortive, declared, in an assembly of the prelates, that the demands of the pope upon Henry amounted to above one hundred and fifty thousand marks; and that if the clergy still refused to comply with his request, he would immediately make a demand of the whole debt, and lay the kingdom under an interdict till it was paid. Could the bishops have depended on Henry for support, they would, doubtless, have treated this menace with the contempt it deserved; but they knew his weakness, and the shameful concessions he had already made: they knew that an interdict on the kingdom would expose both the church and state to the most imminent danger. These considerations induced them to submit. In the mean time, the conquest of Sicily advanced so very slowly, that Henry, finding it would be impossible to raise the sums necessary to satisfy the avarice of the holy father, renounced all pretensions to the crown of Sicily.

A.D. 1257. Though Richard, earl of Cornwall, had wisely refused the offers of the pope with regard to the crown of Sicily, he was far from being proof against ambition. He had amassed immense riches by frugality, and was considered as the most wealthy prince in Europe. The German electors, desiring to share in the treasures of this powerful Englishman, offered to elect him king of the Romans. Charmed with this addition of dignity and power, he passed over into Germany, attended by a great number of the English nobility, and was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. He flattered himself with being able to obtain the imperial crown; but he found himself deceived. The German electors abandoned his interest the moment he had dissipated his wealth.

A.D. 1258. A parliament being summoned to meet at London, Harlat, the new nuncio, produced a bull from the pope, enjoining the bishops to pay the tenths granted to the king by his holiness, under pain of excommunication. The king seconded the demand of the nuncio, and pressed the barons to assist him with a supply. Had he really intended to provoke the members, he could hardly have mentioned any thing more likely to produce that effect. The intolerable acts of papal tyranny and oppression, and such complicated scenes of royal fraud and deceit, as the nation had for some time unhappily experienced, could not fail of rousing the indignation of a people not wholly lost to all sense of freedom and independence. Far from granting his request, they reproached him with his acts of rapine and injustice, and with his hatred of the English nation, from whom, they said, he ought to blush to require any aid or subsidies, while he preferred strangers to them, and made them groan under the most dreadful oppressions. Four of their brethren were deputed by the bishops to make warm remonstrances with regard to his conduct in general, and the uncanonical elections which had been made to vacant dignities in particular. Henry acknowledged that their complaints were well founded; adding, that as each of them had attained his benefice in that irregular manner, it was proper that their dignities should be vacated by resignation, in order to have them disposed of according to the methods prescribed by the canons of the church. But the remonstrances of the barons were not to be answered. They insisted on a ratification of the great charter, though they themselves daily violated it, in the articles relative to their own vassals. It was in vain for the king to oppose the whole power of the kingdom. His brother Richard, whose power was very extensive, was absent in Germany, and the barons defied all the censures of the Vatican. Henry therefore submitted to necessity, and the great charter was ratified with the most religious ostentation. Henry swore to observe inviolably all its articles, as a man, as a christian, as a knight, and as a king.

But Henry did not long observe the oaths he had taken; the same indolence, the same insatiation for foreigners again returned, and the articles of the great charter were forgot; they were violated whenever the interest of the court, or the ambition of his minions required it.

A.D. 1259. Enraged at this strange behaviour in the king, whom neither oaths nor promises could bind, the barons determined to have recourse to the same expedient that was used with regard to his father. They formed an association; and a parliament being called at Oxford, they came to the assembly, attended by their military tenants, well appointed, and properly armed. Simon de Montford, earl of Leicester, was at the head of this association. That nobleman, who was at once both haughty and ambitious, tious, had been greatly caressed by Henry, who had given him his sister in marriage, and made him governor of Guienne. But the inconstancy of the monarch, and the unbounded ambition of the earl, soon produced an open breach between them; and Leicester, who imputed his disgrace to the insinuations of the foreign minions, determined to take an ample revenge. He was a perfect master of intrigue; and his violent remonstrances against the government, his apparent zeal for the liberties of the nation, and the privileges of the church, obtained him at once the affections of the people, and the friendship of the prelates and barons.

Henry was terrified at this military appearance; and, on his entering the assembly, asked, with some emotion, whether he was their prisoner? The earl marshal replied, that he was not their prisoner, but that it was the determined resolution of the whole assembly to banish his foreign favourites from the kingdom, and redress the grievances of the nation. Adding, that if he would agree to these reasonable demands, and give authority for that purpose to persons of character and capacity, they would grant the supplies necessary for giving weight and dignity to the state. Henry perceived it would be in vain to oppose the power of his barons, and therefore made no objections to the proposal: he promised to submit to any regulations they should think fit to enact. Having thus obtained the king's consent, they constituted a council of twenty-four barons, whom they invested with an unlimited authority for reforming the state; and Simon Montfort was elected president. Henry himself took a solemn oath to maintain the ordinances they should issue for that salutary purpose. The plan of government had been digested in a previous meeting of the principal barons; so that a set of regulations soon appeared; and these, conformable to the practice of all usurpers, were favourable to the people. They were in substance as follows:

1. That the king should confirm the great charter, which he had so often sworn to observe, and so often violated.

2. The important office of chief justiciary should be bestowed upon a person of talents and integrity, who should administer justice to the poor and the rich without favour or partiality.

3. That the chancellor, treasurer, judges, and other public ministers, should be annually chosen by the council of twenty-four.

4. That the custody of the king's castles should be committed to the care of that council, who should entrust them to such persons as were well affected to the state.

5. That any person, of what degree or order soever, who should oppose, directly or indirectly, what should be decreed by the council of twenty-four, should be punishable with death.

6. That three sessions of parliament should be regularly held every year, to enact such laws as should from time to time be found necessary for the good of the people.

These articles, which, from the place where they were drawn up, were called the Statutes, or Provisions of Oxford, were approved by the parliament, and confirmed by the assent of the king, who swore to observe, and cause them to be observed, to the utmost of his power.

But Leicester never intended to submit his actions to the examination of the parliament; he aspired to the government, and the king soon perceived that he was no more than a cypher in the administration. He expected that the parliament would grant him a large subsidy, pursuant to their promise, when he signed the Oxford Constitutions: he was deceived; the consideration of the supplies was postponed; and his two uterine brothers, the sons of the count de la Marche, and the queen Isabella, were stripped of their wealth, and banished the kingdom, as the principal authors of the public calamities. Nor was the council satisfied with banishing these foreigners; even the officers of the household were removed, and their places filled with persons in the interest of the council. At the same time, they obliged every individual in the kingdom to take an oath to obey them; even young Edward, Henry's eldest son, was not excepted.

Determined to support their power against all opposition; and fearful that the great credit of the king of the Romans might check their progress, they dispatched the bishop of Worcester to the continent, to inform him that he would not be suffered to land in England, unless he would promise to take an oath to observe the Statutes of Oxford. At the same time, they required to know on what account he was coming to England; and how long he proposed to continue in that kingdom.

Incensed at their infolence, and exasperated at the degrading treatment of his brother, he swore he would never take the oath they wanted to impose upon him; and that he would visit England when, and as often as he pleased, without submitting to give them any reasons for his actions. He was, however, soon after informed, that the barons had taken such precautions, by marching troops to the sea-coasts, and fitting out a powerful fleet, that it would be impossible for him to land in England without their consent. Richard therefore thought it more prudent to submit to the necessity of the times, than engage in a fruitless opposition. He agreed to take the oath required, and the barons suffered him to return to England without opposition.

Among several innovations introduced by the council, the most important was the establishment of a committee, consisting of twelve persons, who, during the recess of parliament, were invested with its authority, and were to attend the person of the king in all his motions. Thus the whole constitution of England was overturned, and the kingdom governed by a committee of nobles.

But it was not reasonable to imagine that a government of this kind could be permanent. It was soon perceived, that the good of the people engaged not the attention of the council: the state was oppressed by a confederacy of the nobles. The people were no longer deceived; they complained loudly of their tyranny; and the knights of the shires not only joined in the complaint, but implored the assistance of prince Edward to undertake the defence of the rights of the crown, and the liberties of the people. The prince accordingly sent a message to the barons, insisting on their finishing, without delay, the reformation they had undertaken; otherwise he should think himself obliged to exert all his power to procure redress for an injured people. This spirited remonstrance alarmed the barons, and a new code of laws was published: but it soon appeared that the whole was nothing more than the common laws of England, with some trifling alterations.

So glaring an imposition exasperated the people; and the animosities which now broke out between the barons themselves, gave them hopes that their tyranny would soon have an end. The earls of Leicester and Gloucester, the two most powerful barons in the whole confederacy, became professed enemies to each other. These divisions greatly weakened the strength of the barons; and Leicester retired into France, under pretence of abandoning entirely the administration; but he had very different views. He hoped, by his retreat, to increase the power of his party, by gaining the French monarch over to his interest.

Fortunately for England, the throne of France was filled by a monarch who delighted not in the distress of other nations. He was desirous of healing, not of increasing, the wounds which the English constitution had lately received. Lewis IX: generally called St. Lewis, was endowed with all the piety of an anchorite, as well as the virtues of a king:

His liberality was not in the least inconsistent with the wisest œconomy. He knew how to reconcile a profound policy with an exact justice. He was prudent and firm in council, intrepid but cool in war, and as compassionate as if he had always been unhappy. From a prince of this character England had nothing to fear; he desired not to usurp the territories of his neighbours, and was so far from taking advantage of the troubles of England, that he laboured to establish peace and harmony among the contending parties, whose divisions threatened the kingdom with destruction. He even entertained a doubt with regard to the justice of the sentence passed against John in the court of peers in France; and had formed a design of restoring to Henry all the provinces that had been wrested from his father. The tranquillity of his own country at last diverted him from this resolution; but he made a treaty with Henry which abundantly proved, that a love of justice, rather than power, was the ruling passion of his soul. By this treaty, he yielded to him the Limousin, Perigord, Querci, and Agenois; and only required in return, that Henry should make a final cession of Normandy and the other provinces.

A. D. 1261. The council of the barons had now been three years absolute masters of the kingdom, under pretence of reforming the state. Henry, careless and indolent as he was, could not but feel and resent the mortifications he daily received. The quarrel between Leicester and Gloucester gave him hopes that his misfortunes were drawing to a close; and perceiving that the dispositions of the people had taken a turn in his favour, he determined to make one struggle for recovering his authority. In order to this, he applied to the pope to absolve him from the oath he had taken with regard to the Oxford provisions. The pontiff, who was highly exasperated at the barons for having stopped the revenues of foreign beneficed priests, readily granted the desired dispensation.

This difficulty being surmounted, Henry determined to declare publicly the resolutions he had formed; and having assembled a parliament at London, he told them, "That as they had not on their parts performed their promise with regard to paying his debts, and augmenting his revenues, when he signed the provisions of Oxford, he did not think himself obliged to keep the oath he had taken on that occasion; that he was determined no longer to remain in the hands of a faction who had treated him more like a slave than their king, but would immediately free himself from such inglorious fetters, and assert the dignity of his own prerogative." The assembly was astonished at this unexpected declaration; and the king, without giving them time to reply, retired immediately to the tower; seized all the money in the mint; published a proclamation for removing the sheriffs and other officers appointed by the council of twenty-four; and acted with such vigour as seemed to be the effect of a fixed resolution to support his own independence. He informed his subjects that he had resumed the reins of government, and that he would inviolably observe the two charters, notwithstanding any false reports to the contrary; nominated a chancellor, chief justiciary, and officers of his household, in the room of those who had been appointed by the council. He found means to repel the attempts of the barons, and obliged them to promise obedience for the future. But the gaining any advantage, or even the total defeat of an army, was of very little consequence in these times of national debility and division. New forces suddenly sprung up, and suddenly dispersed; to-day one leader remained master of the field, and to-morrow was obliged to take refuge in some place of safety. Henry was again defeated, and again obliged to confirm the statutes of Oxford.

Prince Edward, who had hitherto scrupled to break the oath he had taken to submit to the council, perceiving that the barons, with Leicester at their head, were determined to render their tyranny perpetual, undertook the defence of his country. He was soon at the head of a powerful army, and joined by several of the barons, who thought they could not, as true Englishmen, continue any longer with Leicester and his party. The two armies were in sight of each other, and a decisive battle was every moment expected, when several of the most prudent persons interposed their good offices to prevent the effusion of human blood. But it soon appeared that the claims of the contending parties were not to be adjusted, and it was agreed to refer the decision to St. Lewis, in whose wisdom and equity both parties placed an equal confidence. The reference was confirmed by the oaths of the king, the prince and the barons. Lewis accepted the office of arbitrator, and having heard, with the utmost attention, the whole cause fairly debated, together with the allegations of both parties in an assembly of the states at Amiens, delivered the following award.

A. D. 1264. "That the statutes of Oxford, with all the proceedings that followed in consequence of those acts, should be annulled: That the king should enjoy all the rights and prerogatives, which were invested in the crown, before those statutes were enacted: That all the castles which the king had ceded to the barons as a security for the performance of his promise, should be restored; and that he should enjoy the privilege of appointing his great officers of state and government, equally from foreigners or natives." But, at the same time, he declared that his award was not meant to derogate from the privileges and liberties of the English, nor from the charters which had been granted them.

The barons were highly exasperated at a sentence so contrary to what they expected; and it is never difficult for men thus circumstanced, to find pretences for eluding justice. They asserted, that the saving clause was utterly contradictory to the other part of the sentence. Because the latter ratified Magna Charta, and the former condemned the statutes of Oxford, which were calculated to support that charter. The negotiation was therefore entirely broke off, and each party prepared to decide the contest by the sword.

The royal army headed by the king in person, the king of the Romans, and prince Edward, encamped at Lewes in Suffex. Leicester, being reinforced by a body of fifteen thousand Londoners, marched immediately to Lewes, resolved to hazard a decisive engagement. The battle was begun by prince Edward, who charged the van of the rebel army with such impetuosity, that the troops gave way, and a dreadful carnage ensued. He then fell upon the Londoners, routed them with great slaughter, and pursued them near four miles with the utmost fury. This temerity lost the battle. Had he, instead of pursuing a body of unexperienced troops, fallen, in conjunction with the rest of the royal army, upon the remaining forces of the enemy, a complete victory must have been obtained. But the absence of the prince, afforded Leicester an opportunity of changing the fortune of the day. He attacked the second body of the king's forces, cut the greatest part of them in pieces, and took the king of the Romans prisoner. The third body, commanded by Henry in person, made so noble a stand, that it was not broke till the evening; but the king's horse being killed under him, and he himself slightly wounded, he retired to the priory of Lewes, with part of his followers, while others took refuge in the castle.

The prince returning from the pursuit of the Londoners, was surprized to see the field of battle covered with dead bodies; and several of his principal followers were so intimidated at the fatal event, that they fled with seven hundred of their best troops to Pevensey, and passed over to France. The prince himself, who was a stranger to fear, thought only of retrieving the misfortune. He immediately attacked the barons; but night prevented a general engagement;

ment. Uncertain of the consequence, and solicitous for the fate of his father, the prince went round both the town and castle, but without effect. At last he found him at the priory, which was now attacked by the rebels. The royal party made a noble defence, and Montfort's forces were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

Young Edward now exerted all his abilities to rally and collect his scattered forces; and having still the advantage of some excellent officers about his person, he determined to try the fortune of another battle. Leicester had lost near half his army. The Londoners had been so totally broken, that they made no attempt to rejoin his army. He was therefore desirous of avoiding a fresh engagement with a body of resolute troops, more experienced than his own. He knew that a defeat must be fatal, and that he could expect no mercy if he fell into the hands of the enraged monarch. Under pretence, therefore, of preventing the farther effusion of human blood, he sent mediators next morning to the prince, to propose a cessation of arms, in order to terminate this destructive war by an equitable peace; offering to submit his demands to such arbitrators as the king should approve; but, at the same time, insisted, that prince Edward, and young Henry, son to the king of the Romans, should be delivered as hostages for the king's performance of the conditions. This demand was absolutely rejected by the king as insolent and unreasonable; it concealed, under the mask of a desire of peace, a treacherous design of making himself absolute master of the kingdom. Leicester, fearful of another engagement, had recourse to menaces; he threatened to strike off the head of the king of the Romans, together with those of all the prisoners of note in his hands, if the prince made any attack upon his army.

The character of Montfort was too well known, to doubt of his carrying his threat into execution. The prince feared the consequence; and before he could determine, the earl had rallied his forces. There was now a necessity for coming to an accommodation, which was dictated by Leicester, on the following conditions:

"That prince Edward, and Henry, son to the king of the Romans, should surrender themselves prisoners, as pledges in the place of the two kings: that all other prisoners on both sides should be released; and that, in order to settle fully the terms of agreement, application should be made to the king of France, that he should name six Frenchmen, three prelates, and three barons. These six to chuse two others of their own countrymen; and these two to chuse one Englishman, who, in conjunction with themselves, were to be invested by both parties with full powers to make what regulations they thought proper for the settlement of the kingdom."

Such was the convention generally called the Mise of Lewes; and which was signed by the king, the prince, and all the chiefs of both parties. The king immediately sent orders for the prisoners taken by his forces to be set at liberty. But Leicester never intended to perform his part of the agreement: for after sending the prince and young Henry to Dover-castle, he refused to set his prisoners at liberty; both the king and his brother were retained in custody. He sent no ambassadors to Lewis; the pretended arbitration was forgotten. He disposed of offices, without even consulting the king; and had recourse to every method in his power to raise money for strengthening his party, and directed all the measures of government according to his own pleasure.

He now proceeded to settle a form of government he had projected, by which he became in reality the sole master of the kingdom. He summoned a parliament of his own partisans, in order to rivet the chains of slavery he had imposed upon the nation. In that assembly it was enacted, that every act of royal power should be exercised by nine persons, who were to be chosen and removed by the authority of three others; namely, Leicester himself, the earl of Gloucester; and the bishop of Chichester. By this establishment, Leicester obtained, in reality, the sceptre of England: for as the bishop of Chichester was entirely at his devotion; he directed all the resolutions taken by the council of three; and they could discard every member of the supreme council at pleasure.

But this ill-cemented plan of government could not long continue; the least incident was sufficient to shake its very foundation. The queen, who had been some time in France, raised a considerable army; and Lewis himself, who beheld with detestation the perjuries of Leicester, favoured her enterprize. The ambitious earl was alarmed; and troops were sent to guard the coast; but little could be expected from men who were exasperated at his behaviour, and Leicester owed his security more to unfavourable winds, which rendered the attempt abortive, than to any defence that could have been made against the French, had they landed in England.

The pope, who still favoured Henry, and was highly exasperated at the behaviour of the barons, dispatched cardinal Guido, as legate, to excommunicate the earls of Leicester, Gloucester, and Norfolk, by name, and all others in general who joined in the oppression and captivity of their sovereign. But Leicester took an effectual method to prevent the consequences of the papal censures: he threatened the legate with immediate death the moment he landed in the kingdom. Guido was so greatly intimidated, that the sentence was never pronounced. This opposition to the holy see increased the popularity of Leicester. The English had so severely felt the tyrannical oppressions of the Roman pontiffs, that they wished to be relieved from a yoke which was become so heavy to be borne:

A. D. 1265. But Leicester soon perceived that his ambitious projects roused the attention of the barons. Gloucester himself was alarmed; and remonstrated sharply with him on his behaviour. The nobles, still in the interest of Henry, retired into the marches of Wales, and received protection from the earl of Gloucester. The people complained loudly of the shameful breach of the convention made at Lewes; and demanded that prince Edward, and the other prisoners, should be set at liberty, conformable to the articles of that treaty. Leicester perceived that it would be impossible to divert the gathering storm, without having recourse to some artifice to deceive the English. He ordered a parliament to meet at London, but fixed that assembly on a more republican basis than any that had ever been summoned since the foundation of the English monarchy. Besides many barons and ecclesiastics who were not immediate tenants of the crown, he ordered the sheriffs to return two knights from every shire, and the same number of deputies from every borough. The meeting of this parliament, which happened on the twentieth of January, is generally esteemed the epoch of the House of Commons in England. It is certain that this is the first time any mention is made by our ancient historians of any representatives being sent by the boroughs to parliament. Indeed they had always, in former ages, been esteemed of too low a rank to be allowed a place in the great council of the nation.

In this numerous assembly the active and intrepid prince Edward, who had languished in prison ever since the fatal battle of Lewes, was declared free and at full liberty, after stipulating to deliver up all the castles possessed by the barons in the interest of the royal party; and neither to depart the kingdom during three years, nor introduce any foreign troops. But Leicester never intended to set the prince at liberty; he was strictly guarded by the emissaries of that nobleman, and continued only a prisoner at large. The barons now saw that there were no hopes of restoring tranquillity to the nation: the tyranny of Leicester was more dreaded than that of Henry.

The

The earl of Gloucester perceived his own danger; for every thing that opposed the despotism of Montfort was sacrificed at the altar of his ambition. He therefore retired for safety to his estates on the borders of Wales; and Leicester followed him to Hereford at the head of an army, carrying with him both the king and the prince. Gloucester found means to open a negotiation with young Edward, and a plan was formed for the prince's escape. A horse of extraordinary swiftness was procured by Gloucester, and conveyed to Edward by means of a trusty servant, and Edward Mortimer, at the head of a small party, waited in a wood not far from Leicester's camp, in order to receive the prince, and convey him to a place of safety. Every thing being thus prepared, the prince, pretending to take the air with some of Leicester's retinue, made matches between their horses, and rode several of them himself. When by this stratagem he had sufficiently tired and blown their horses, he mounted the steed sent him by Gloucester, and calling to his attendants, bade them adieu, and effected his escape. They pursued him till he was received by Mortimer at the head of his party.

The escape of the prince filled the people with joy; they flocked to his standard from all parts of the country, so that Edward soon found himself at the head of a powerful army. He immediately took the field, and in order to prevent Leicester from retreating back to the capital, he broke down all the bridges upon the Severn. Leicester saw his danger, and dispatched an express to his son to hasten from London with an army to his relief. But Edward was too vigilant, and too well informed of young Montfort's motions, to suffer him to join his father. As soon as he heard that he was advanced to Kenilworth, Edward marched to meet him, surprised him in his camp, and totally dissipated his army. The absence of the prince furnished Leicester with an opportunity of crossing the Severne in boats; and being entirely ignorant of his son's misfortune, advanced to Evesham, expecting every hour to be joined by the forces from London.

Edward had divided his army into three bodies, one of which advanced along the road to Kenilworth, carrying before them the banners which had been taken from young Montfort's army; while he himself, at the head of the second division, made a circuit, in order to attack Leicester's army in another quarter. This stratagem for some time deceived Montfort; he took the first division for his friends; but perceiving his mistake, and observing the excellent disposition of Edward's troops, he exclaimed, "They have learned from me their military order! The Lord have mercy upon our souls, for I see our bodies are the prince's." The greater part of the army of Leicester made but a feeble resistance; the Welsh, who formed the van, unable to support the furious attack of Edward, fled with the utmost precipitation, while Gloucester at the head of another division, charged the main body with equal fury. Leicester, however, maintained the battle with amazing intrepidity, till his horse being killed under him, he demanded quarter, which was refused, and he fell among the slain, together with his son Henry. His troops, deprived of their two principal leaders, threw down their arms, and begged for quarter.

Thus fell the famous Simon Montfort, earl of Leicester, an intrepid general, and a consummate statesman. He was bold, resolute, enterprising, insinuating, artful and persuasive. But hurried away by his ambition, he made himself odious by endeavouring to render himself despotic. He constantly covered his dangerous enterprises under the appearance of piety; and the people, who are easily deceived, regarded him as a saint. And though excommunicated by the Roman pontiff, the people were so prejudiced in his favour, that many miracles were said to be wrought upon his tomb.

The victory of Evesham was complete; the king of the Romans, his son and all the barons of the royal party were immediately set at liberty; and Edward easily subdued the remains of the rebel party; and the far greater part of the castles garrisoned by the rebels delayed not to make their submission, and open their gates to the king. Adam Gourdon, a courageous baron, maintained himself for some time in the forest of Hampshire, and committed depredations in the neighbourhood. Edward led a body of forces against him, and attacked the camp of the rebels with the utmost fury. The two valiant leaders met, and a single combat ensued between them. The victory was long doubtful; but at last ended in favour of Edward. Gourdon was wounded, thrown from his horse and taken prisoner. But Edward knew how to estimate valour, even in an enemy. He procured his pardon, granted him his friendship, and Gourdon served him faithfully till his death.

Greater moderation was perhaps never shewn upon a similar occasion. No sacrifices of national liberty was made on this occasion, the great charter continued inviolate. No blood shed upon the scaffold; those who had borne arms against the king were punished only by pecuniary compositions, and even these were exacted with great moderation. The city of London had merited the most rigorous chastisement, but this was greatly mitigated; its privileges were indeed taken away, but they were restored after a short interval of time.

A. D. 1268. The peace of the kingdom being now restored, the king summoned a parliament, where the pope's legate assisted, who informed the assembly that the pontiff had resolved to publish a crusade in every state that professed the Christian religion; exhorting the English to support an enterprise calculated to promote the glory of the church. The English had not yet learned wisdom from past misfortunes; enthusiasm prevailed and the recovery of the Holy Land was considered as more meritorious than the strictest exercise of all the christian virtues. Prince Edward, his brother Edmund, and their cousin Henry received the cross from the hands of the legate; and their example was followed by the earls of Gloucester, Warrenne, and Pembroke, one hundred and twenty knights, and great numbers of inferior orders.

A. D. 1270. Lewis of France, who had also engaged in the crusade, and made the most pressing solicitations to Edward to hasten his departure, sailed some time before the English forces were ready, and landed near the ruins of Carthage, in order to reduce the city of Tunis. Edward reached his camp, but had the misfortune to find that great prince already dead from the intemperance of the climate, and the great fatigues he had undergone. The devotion of Lewis was destructive to France; and is a proof that the excess of a good quality may be criminal. He was succeeded in the throne by Philip, surnamed the Hardy, a prince of considerable merit, but much inferior to that of his father. The death of Lewis was not, however, sufficient to intimidate Edward. He continued his course to Palestine, where he signalized himself by the most astonishing acts of valour. He revived the glory of the English name in those parts, and struck the Saracens with such terror, that they had recourse to the infamous method of assassination. The villain employed to execute this inhuman design, was admitted several times into the prince's presence, under pretence of negotiating a treaty between Edward and the governor of Joppa. One day, finding the prince alone sitting on a couch undressed, he approached him, and offering him some letters, took the opportunity of drawing a concealed dagger, and endeavoured to sheathe it in the prince's breast; but Edward fortunately warded off the blow. He received indeed a considerable wound in the arm, but that misfortune did not prevent him from seizing the villain, and having wrested the dagger from his hand he plunged it into his heart. The wound was however dangerous, being made with a poisoned instrument, ment, and the prince's life was in the most imminent danger; but by the great skill and care of an English surgeon, a cure was effected in little more than a fortnight.

A. D. 1272. While Edward was gathering laurels in the fields of Palestine, England again experienced the oppressions of the barons and the disorders of anarchy. The populace of London returned to their usual licentiousness; and the old king, unable to support the weight of government, called aloud for his gallant son to return, and assist him in swaying that sceptre which was ready to drop from his enfeebled hand. His cares and his fears were greatly increased by the death of his brother, the king of the Romans, who paid the debt of nature at Berkhamstead on the second of April. Henry survived this misfortune only seven months: he died at St. Edmondsbury on the sixteenth of November, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and the fifty-sixth of his reign, holding the sceptre longer than any other prince in the English annals.

The capital feature in the character of this prince is his incapacity for government. Though not naturally tyrannical, his extreme weakness often produced all the evils of despotism. Hence his negligences and breach of promises; for he scrupled not to sacrifice the lasting advantages arising from the trust and confidence of his people to present conveniences. He imitated, instead of reducing, the dangerous power of his barons; and permitted the arbitrary will of his ministers to be the rule of his actions. But if he had few public virtues, he had also few personal vices; he was neither addicted to debauchery, nor prone to cruelty. He was a great friend to religion, and his devotion is highly commended. Being once engaged in a dispute with Lewis of France, concerning the preference between sermons and masses, he very pertinently replied, in answer to what was urged in favour of the former, "I had rather have one hour's conversation with a friend, than hear twenty elaborate discourses pronounced in his praise."

Henry left two sons, Edward, who succeeded him in the throne; and Edmund, earl of Lancaster: and two daughters; Margaret, queen of Scotland; and Beatrix, dutchess of Britany.

A very remarkable dispute happened during this reign, between the prelates and the barons, with regard to bastardy. According to the common laws of England, all who were born before the marriage of their parents were declared bastards; but the canon law considered them as legitimate. Hence the bishops and judges never agreed; and the civil courts, whenever they applied to the spiritual to enquire into the legitimacy of the person in question, proposed only this simple fact, whether he was born before or after marriage. The prelates complained of this practice to the parliament assembled at Merton in 1236; and requested, that the civil law might be rendered conformable to the ecclesiastical; but the barons returned this memorable answer, "We will not change the laws of England."

Every species of oppression was made use of, during this reign, to supply the profuse liberality of the king to foreign favourites. The example of the court authorised rapine and plunder; so that every quarter of the kingdom was full of robbers. In the year 1249, two merchants of Brabant complained to the king that they had been robbed of all their goods by certain banditti whom they knew, because they saw them every day in his court. On being questioned with regard to their behaviour, they urged in their defence, that they received no wages from the king, and were obliged to rob for a maintenance.

The court of Rome perceiving, that the power of the holy see began to decline in England, pope Gregory IX. had recourse to an expedient highly worthy of that ignorant age, for supporting the tottering authority of the pontifical chair. He published a work called the Decretals, containing a pretended collection of the decrees of popes in the first centuries, but in reality a heap of the grossest forgeries. In this dark and ignorant age, they passed, indeed, for some time, as undoubted facts, and were very favourable to that venal court; but something more was wanting to engage the attention of a rude people. This was effected by establishing the mendicant orders, particularly the Dominicans and Franciscans. These, by maintaining a perpetual rivalry with each other, in promoting their lucrative trade of superstition, exerted all their abilities to gain the necessary ascendancy over the minds of men, and inspire them with a firm belief of the infallibility and spiritual power of their founder and protector. To such wretched expedients was the Roman see reduced, to support the mighty structure of superstition, which had been reared by the hand of enthusiastic ignorance.

A. D. 1272. THOUGH Edward was abroad at the time of his father's death, yet no attempts to wrest the sceptre from his hand were made in England. The highest opinion was entertained of his merit, and all ranks and orders of men in the kingdom wished earnestly to see him on the throne of his ancestors. The council of state proclaimed him king immediately on the decease of his father; all the estates of the kingdom swore fealty to him; and even the earl of Gloucester himself was among the first to give proofs of his submission.

Edward, some time before the death of his father, was convinced that it would be impossible, with his handful of men, to oppose, with any hopes of success, the numerous armies of the Saracens: he therefore listened to the offers of peace tendered him by the sultan of Babylon, and concluded a truce for ten years, ten months, and ten days. After signing this treaty, he embarked the remains of his little army, and passed over to Sicily, where he received the news of the death of his father, and also of that of his eldest son. Edward appeared more sensibly affected with the former than the latter; and the king of Sicily expressing a surprise at so singular a circumstance, the prince told him, "That the death of a son was a loss he might hope to repair; but the death of a father was a loss irreparable."

A. D. 1273. After paying the tribute of grief and duty to the memory of his father, Edward set out for England, and passing through Chalons, he was invited by the prince of that province to a tournament he was preparing to celebrate. Edward was too ambitious of glory to omit so favourable an opportunity of signalizing his courage and address in arms; but the glory he acquired excited envy. Foiled in every attempt, the French knights were exasperated, and made a serious attack upon the English. Fortune, however, still favoured Edward; the French were repulsed, but not without a considerable effusion of blood. Some historians have called this encounter the petty battle of Chalons.

Edward having received advice that the peace of England was firmly established, determined to settle some affairs on the continent before he visited his native

tive country. He accordingly repaired to the court of France, in order to do homage to Philip the Hardy, for his territories in France, and was received with every possible mark of politeness and regard. He afterwards repaired to Guienne, and put an end to the troubles that had for some time disturbed the peace of that province. He, however, continued some time longer in France at the earnest request of pope Gregory IX. who having summoned a general council to meet at Lyons, was apprehensive that Edward's return to England would prevent many of the bishops of that kingdom from attending.

A. D. 1274. Having settled all affairs on the continent he passed over into England, where he was received with the most joyful acclamations by his subjects, and solemnly crowned at Westminster on the nineteenth of August, by Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Britany, and all the English peers. We are told by some of our English historians, that Edward, to heighten the magnificence of the ceremony, gave orders for letting loose five hundred beautiful Turkish horses he had brought with him from the continent, and which were to be the property of those that could catch them.

But ceremonies, however magnificent, could not long divert the attention of Edward from the affairs of government; and his subjects were soon convinced that the happiness and glory of a state, are the consequences of the assiduity, wisdom and capacity of the sovereign. He made the great charter the rule of his conduct; and obliged the barons to observe it with regard to their vassals. The licentiousness of the nobles had long been the source of various calamities, both with respect to the crown and people. He therefore took care to curtail their power, and, without invading their real privileges, rendered them obedient to the laws of their country.

A. D. 1275. The nation had long been oppressed by numerous bands of robbers, who set the power of the magistrate at defiance. To remove these disorders, a severe execution of justice was necessary; and Edward applied himself to effect it with the utmost assiduity. He appointed judges who were able to enforce the execution of the laws; and entrusted them with an authority sufficient to intimidate these troops of banditti. But the ordinary ministers of justice not being sufficient to carry the laws into execution in the western counties, he appointed commissioners who were to make regular circuits through different parts of the kingdom, in order to take cognizance of crimes, and punish offenders. These itinerant dispensers of justice executed their commission with the utmost severity; they did not sometimes make the proper distinction between innocence and guilt; the smallest accusation was sufficient for a trial, and too often for very heavy punishments. By this method of suppressing delinquents, every quarter of the kingdom was filled with terror. Edward perceived the commissioners exceeded the bounds he had set to their power, and therefore continued their office no longer than was absolutely necessary to suppress the various kinds of malefactors, murderers, robbers, incendiaries, ravishers and plunderers, that disturbed the public tranquillity. This being effected, he prudently annulled their commission.

A. D. 1276. Llewellyn, prince of Wales, who had been closely connected with the Montfort family, now refused to repair to the court of Edward and pay him homage. This exasperated the haughty spirit of the English monarch, and he determined to reduce his refractory vassal. Llewellyn well knew the power and great abilities of Edward, and endeavoured to strengthen himself by a strict alliance with the remains of the Montfort family. He accordingly demanded Eleanor, daughter to the late earl of Leicester in marriage. The young lady was then at the court of France, where she had taken refuge on the death of her father. The request of Llewellyn was, however, readily complied with, and Eleanor embarked for Wales, under the care of her brother Aumerli; but the vessel being taken at sea, the betrothed princess was sent to the court of Edward, where she was detained as a prisoner of state; but her brother was committed to Corf-castle. Deputies soon after arrived from Llewellyn, offering to ransom the princess, whom he asserted to be detained against the law of nations. But Edward refused to set Eleanor at liberty, unless Llewellyn would engage to repair all the devastations committed on the borders of England, and restore all the castles he had taken during the late wars. Llewellyn refused the conditions, and hostilities immediately commenced between them; but the operations of the first campaign were of little consequence, neither Edward nor Llewellyn heading their troops in person.

A. D. 1277. As soon as the spring was sufficiently advanced, Edward led his army into Wales; and Llewellyn, perceiving it would be madness to meet the English in the open field, retreated to his woods and inaccessible mountains, in order to harass the English troops; but Edward was not to be surprized. He cut a capacious road for his forces through a tract of woods extending from the marches on the borders of Cheshire to Caernarvonshire, by which means his forces penetrated with ease into the heart of the country. Llewellyn retreated to Snowdon, the usual place of refuge when attacked by the English. But their fastnesses were now of very little consequence. Edward seized all the passes, and prevented any provisions from being carried to Llewellyn's army. Famine soon reduced the Welsh prince to sue for peace, and a treaty was concluded at Aberconway, on the following conditions; "That Llewellyn should pay fifty thousand pounds sterling, as a satisfaction for damages; that he should quit forever a tract of land containing the whole country between Chester and the river Conway; and that he should repair to the court of Edward and perform his homage." Edward, however, thought proper to remit the payment of the fifty thousand pounds, and brought Llewellyn with him to London, where he did homage and swore fealty in the presence of a great number of the prelates and nobility of England. The ceremony being over, Edward delivered Eleanor to him, and caused their nuptials to be celebrated with great magnificence.

A. D. 1278. A parliament being summoned at Gloucester, several excellent statutes were made for securing the rights and liberties of the subject, and providing for the better administration of justice. But among the many excellent regulations made by Edward for the advantage and happiness of his people, he took one step that again threatened the nation with all the miseries of a civil war. He issued commissions to enquire into all the encroachments made on the royal demesnes; and all persons were summoned to produce the titles by which they held their estates. The barons were sufficiently alarmed, and vigorously opposed the order, as cruel and oppressive. Among others, John, earl of Warenne and Surry, was cited before the king's commissioners for that purpose. He obeyed the summons, but on being called upon to produce his titles, drew a family sword he had brought with him for that purpose, and addressed the court in the following manner: "It was with this sword, that my ancestors, who came in with William the bastard, acquired their possessions; and by the same I will defend them: it was not for himself only that William conquered: it was not for him alone that my ancestors fought." This noble and spirited declaration, which was consonant to the sense of all the old English nobility, put an end to the enquiry. Edward soon saw his error, and immediately revoked the commission.

Among other grievances, the nation had for some time suffered exceedingly from the adulteration of the coin, which had raised the price of the necessaries of life to such an excessive height, that the foreign commerce of the kingdom was almost ruined. The Jews were suspected of being the authors of that destructive practice, and little proof was necessary to convict them of the offence. The prejudices entertained against that despised people were now so violent, that the laws of humanity were thought not to extend to them. No less than two hundred and eighty of them were hanged in one day at London, besides those that suffered in different parts of England. Multitudes of them were ruined by the confiscation of their houses and property; and though Edward ordered one half of the money which was raised in this cruel manner to be set apart for those who should embrace christianity, very few of them accepted the offer: they could not think of embracing a religion, which they unjustly considered as the source of the barbarities exercised by its professors.

A.D. 1281. Though Llewellyn had strictly observed the conditions of the treaty, yet the officers of Edward had committed so many acts of violence upon the Welsh, that they implored the protection of their prince against their insolent neighbours. Llewellyn made strong remonstrances to Edward, but without effect: the grievances still continued. Exasperated at such unjust treatment, the Welsh determined rather to encounter a force which they had already experienced to be so much superior to their own, than bear any longer the oppressions of the haughty victors. David, brother to Llewellyn, had long served the crown of England with the utmost fidelity; but exasperated at the unjust oppressions of his countrymen, he joined his brother, and offered to head the army, and venture his life to retrieve the liberties and independence of that ancient people. The generous proposal was joyfully accepted; the whole nation flew to arms, and joined the standard of David, who led them immediately against their oppressors. Several castles soon fell into their hands, and they severely retaliated on the English, the miseries they had so long suffered from their unprovoked cruelty.

Alarmed at the progress, and piqued at the success of the insurgents over his English subjects, Edward determined to crush for ever a people who had only taken up arms in defence of their liberties, and to procure that redress, they had so often solicited in vain. The archbishop of Canterbury, desirous of preventing the effusion of human blood, exerted all his interest to bring about an accommodation, and made several equitable proposals by the request of Llewellyn and his brother, for sheathing the sword of destruction, and preventing the horrid devastation that must ensue, if the bloody standard of war should be carried into the country of that distressed and injured people. But his labours were in vain. Edward was determined to put a final period to the government of Wales, and exterminate all the remains of its ancient independence.

A.D. 1282. This resolution being taken, Edward led his army into the enemy's country, without meeting any opposition, Llewellyn and his brother having retired to their fastnesses in Snowden, waiting for an opportunity of falling on the English when embarrassed among the woods, with which that part of the country was over-run.

Edward, who had learned experience from his former expedition, invested the enemy by securing all the avenues through which it was possible for them to escape, and threw a bridge of boats over the river Menay, opposite to Bangor. Before this work was entirely completed, three hundred men at arms, under the command of lord Latimer and Lucas de Thany, a Gascon, passed the river to amuse the enemy, while the main body of the army crossed the bridge. The Welsh, who were well acquainted with the nature of the river, and knew that the water would soon swell and cut off their retreat, did not for some time molest the English in their passage; but when about fifteen hundred of them were landed, they rushed down from their mountains with the most horrid cries, and fell upon the English with such fury and resolution, that they were immediately routed with the most dreadful slaughter, not a man escaping to carry the news of their misfortune, except lord Latimer, whose horse swam with him across the river.

This dreadful defeat so dispirited the English, that for some time their operations were suspended: they found it impossible to advance, and were ashamed to retire. The Welsh, on the other hand, flushed with their late success, and encouraged by the inactivity of the enemy, began to think themselves invincible; and their bards having persuaded them that the period was arrived for the accomplishment of the prophecy of the great Merlin, who had foretold, that one of the race of Llewellyn would ride through the streets of London with a crown on his head. This ridiculous notion, well adapted to the ignorance and superstition of the times, proved the destruction of Welsh army. It was resolved to commit the care of Snowden to David, while Llewellyn himself led the main body of the forces against the enemy.

This fatal resolution being taken, the prince advanced into Radnorshire, in order to join the remains of Montfort's party; but his little army was met at Pont Orewyn, a bridge which secures the passage over the Wye, by a detachment of the English, and totally defeated; and he himself, who had advanced some distance before his troops, killed by the hand of one Adam de Frampton, who carried his head to Edward, then encamped at Conway. Thus fell the famous Llewellyn, a prince descended from one of the most ancient royal families in Europe, and with him the small remains of Welsh liberty expired, after having been preserved in that little corner of the island above eighteen hundred years, against all the efforts of the English monarchy, though destitute both of foreign alliances, and a naval power.

The death of Llewellyn struck the Welsh with terror; they made no farther efforts to support the falling state of their country: the greater part of them submitted to the English. David himself retired to the woods and fastnesses of the mountains, where he continued for some time in the greatest distress; but was at last seized by his own countrymen in one of his retreats, and sent in chains to Edward. The captivity of David put a final period to all opposition: the Welsh nobility delivered up their castles, and the whole country submitted to the conqueror.

A.D. 1283. A parliament was summoned at Shrewsbury, to determine the fate of the unfortunate captive. The trial was, however, soon determined, and David, instead of being respected as the defender of the liberties of his country, was condemned to be hanged as a robber and a traitor. Such was still the ferocity of the greatest princes of this barbarous age! The bards, or Welsh poets, were also devoted to destruction. Edward well knew that nothing had a more powerful influence to keep alive the ideas of military valour and of ancient glory, than the traditional poetry of the people, when assisted by the power of music, and jollity of festivals. He therefore gathered together all the Welsh bards, and by a policy equally cruel and unjust, ordered them all to be put to death; so greatly did Edward dread the impression they might make on a people, jealous to excess of their ancient liberty. The following anecdote, which is very properly adapted to the taste of monkish writers, is related by several of our historians. "Edward, say they, assembling the Welsh, promised to give them a prince of unexceptionable manners, born in their own country, and one who could speak no other language. The favour was accepted with the greatest acclamations of joy, and promise of obedience; and he immediately bestowed the investiture of the principality on his son Edward, then then an infant, and born at Caernarvon." Since that period, the principality of Wales has given title to the eldest sons of the kings of England.

A.D. 1286. The tranquillity of the whole kingdom was now so firmly settled, that Edward passed over to the continent, in order to mediate a peace between Alphonso, king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately succeeded his father, Philip the Hardy, in the crown of France. He continued there near three years; and during the greater part of the time, was employed in this intricate negotiation, which was at last happily terminated by the labours of the English monarch, whose power was dreaded, and whose virtues were revered in every part of Europe.

A.D. 1290. But during his absence, great disorders had happened in the kingdom. The streams of justice were poisoned at their fountains by the corruption of the judges. Edward was determined to examine very strictly into their conduct; and accordingly summoned a parliament for that purpose, to meet at London; and before that assembly the judges were tried. Two only were found innocent: the proofs against the rest were so clear, that they made no defence, and were all deposed, and severely fined. The two judges who were found, on the strictest examination, to have administered justice with integrity, were John de Martingham, and Elias de Bokingham, both clergymen. In this parliament an act passed for banishing the Jews; and near fifteen thousand of that despised people, after being stripped of their property, except such sums as were necessary to pay their passage to the continent, were sent out of the kingdom. But many of them were not suffered to escape even with so small a pittance of their fortune: numbers were murdered by the seamen in their passage; and others, after being plundered of their little all, were left destitute on an inhospitable shore. Such are the dreadful effects of enthusiastic vengeance, when under no restraint from the laws of humanity. Nor did even this stretch of the common rights of nature and nations remove the complaint that gave rise to so cruel and imprudent a measure. It was thought that usury would be banished with the Jews; but this was a fatal mistake. The prohibitions against lending money, and the necessity in a trading nation for that practice to subsist, only increased the evil. The English themselves now became the usurers; but as both the canon and municipal laws permitted no Christian to receive interest, all transactions of this kind were clandestine, and consequently, the interest was greatly augmented, because none would lend money but on receiving a gratuity proportionable to the risk and infamy to which he was exposed for lending it.

While Edward was thus employed in what he thought a religious duty, he lost his beloved queen Eleanor, the fond partner in all his dangers and distresses in Palestine. She died at Hodefsby, in Lincolnshire, on the twenty-ninth of November, leaving the king overwhelmed with the most poignant grief. Her remains were carried to Westminster, and interred in the abbey with great funeral pomp: and at every place where her body rested, and where dirges were sung for the repose of her soul, Edward caused stone crosses, on which her arms were engraven, to be erected to her memory. Some of these monuments still remain, but greatly defaced.

It had always been lamented by the greatest statesmen, that England and Scotland were not united; and some attempts had been made to produce so desirable an event. Alexander III. king of Scotland, had been unfortunately killed by a fall from his horse in the year 1286, leaving no male issue. Margaret, daughter to Eric king of Norway, and grand-daughter to Alexander, was the only lineal descendant from the royal family of Scotland. This princess, then an infant, and known by the name of The Maid of Norway, was recognized successor by the states of Scotland. Edward, who was great-uncle to the Norwegian princefs, now flattered himself that an opportunity offered for uniting the two kingdoms; and accordingly proposed a marriage between his son, the prince of Wales, and the Maid of Norway. The friendship which had for some time prevailed between the two nations, greatly facilitated this project, so favourable to the grandeur and happiness of both kingdoms. The estates of Scotland were pleased with the offers of Edward, and the marriage was agreed to on the following conditions:

1. That the Scots shall enjoy all their privileges and immunities, both ecclesiastical and civil; saving the rights of the king of England, or any other person on the marches or elsewhere.

2. That if Edward and Margaret should die without issue of the body of Margaret, the kingdom shall revert, intire, free, absolute, and independent, to the next immediate heir.

3. That in case of the death of prince Edward without issue of the body of Margaret, her majesty's person shall be remitted in like manner free, and independent, to Scotland.

4. That no person, either of the clergy or laity, shall be compelled to go out of the kingdom, to ask leave either to elect, or present those they have elected; nor to do their homage, fealty and services; nor to prosecute law-suits; nor, in a word, to perform any thing usually done in Scotland.

5. That the kingdom of Scotland shall have its chancellor, officers of state, courts of judicature, &c. as before; and that a new seal shall be made and kept by the chancellor; but with the ordinary arms of Scotland, and the name of none but the queen of Scotland engraved upon it.

6. That all the papers, records, privileges, and other documents of the royal dignity of the crown and kingdom of Scotland, shall be lodged in some secure place within the kingdom, at the pleasure of the nobility, whose seals should be appended to them, and there kept till either the queen shall return to her own kingdom, or shall have heirs to succeed her.

7. That all parliaments, when called to treat of matters concerning the state or inhabitants of Scotland, shall be held within the limits of the kingdom.

8. That no duties, taxes, levies of men, &c. shall be exacted in Scotland, but such as, being usual in former times, shall consist with the common interest and good of the nation.

9. That the king of England shall oblige himself and his heirs, in a bond of one hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable to the church of Rome, and to be applied to support the crusades in the Holy Land, to make restitution of the kingdom in the cases aforesaid; and that he shall consent that the pope refrain him and his heirs, by excommunicating them, and interdicting their kingdom to both the above restrictions, and payment of the said sum of money, if he or they do not stand to the premises.

10. That Edward, at his own expence, shall procure the pope to confirm these articles, within a year after the consummation of the marriage; and also, that within the same time the bull of his holiness shall be delivered to the estates of the kingdom of Scotland.

These articles being ratified, the bishop of Durham was appointed queen's lieutenant in Scotland; and two of the Scottish commissioners, the earl of Warrenne, and the dean of York, embarked for Norway, to settle every thing relative to the marriage; but in their return with the young princefs, they were unfortunately overtaken by a dreadful storm, and driven into one of the Orkneys, where she died. Thus were all the hopes formed on this coalition suddenly destroyed, and Scotland involved in all the calamities that attend a disputed succession.

The principal competitors for the Scottish crown were Robert Bruce and John Baliol, both descended in the female line from the brother of that William who had been taken prisoner by Henry II. Bruce was the son of one of the younger daughters of the earl of Huntingdon, William's brother; and Baliol was the son of Devergilda, the only daughter of the eldest. The former was, therefore, one degree nearer the common stock; but the latter had a preferable title according to the law of primogeniture. The Scots, who were at this time a gross and ignorant people, were little qualified to discuss the claims of these competitors. The parliament was divided; and if they had determined the dispute by a plurality of voices, the competitors were so powerful, that there were little hopes of their submitting to their decision; the animosities of the parties would, in all probability, have been heightened, and the nation plunged into all the horrors of a civil war. It was therefore resolved to refer the contest to the king of England, who had already shewn himself so able and impartial an arbitrator in several contentions between different princes of Europe, and who was sufficiently powerful to compel the unsuccessful claimant to submit to his sentence.

A. D. 1291. Edward readily accepted the office; but they little thought he would abuse their confidence, in order to impose on their independence. He determined to establish a right of superiority over Scotland, a project he had some time since formed, though he had hitherto wished to obtain it rather by compact than claim; by the arts of policy and address, rather than by force of arms. He wished not to plant his standard of power in fields manured with the blood of their inhabitants. He fought, with the utmost diligence, for proofs in ancient histories; but the only circumstance he insisted on, which had the least appearance of plausibility, was the homage paid by William to Henry II. tho' Richard I. had renounced this homage. Furnished, however, with a number of uncertain testimonies, he advanced to Norham, a town on the northern banks of the Tweed, at the head of a powerful army, to give weight to the unexpected claim he intended to make. On his arrival, he invited the parliament of Scotland, and the competitors for the crown, to his camp; where the chief justiciary told the assembly, "That the king had taken the greatest pains to collect proofs from all the ancient records and chronicles, to determine this important truth, namely, That the kings of Scotland had been dependent on the English monarchs from time immemorial, and had accordingly done them homage, except when they had taken advantage of the intestine commotions of the nation, or the reign of a weak prince, to withdraw their allegiance. The king was, therefore, intitled to decide this dispute, not in virtue of the reference made to him, but in the quality of liege lord of the kingdom."

The assembly were astonished at so unexpected a declaration; but it was in vain to make any resistance. They, however, begged to have some time allowed them to give in their answer, as many of the prelates and nobility of Scotland were absent, whose advice was necessary in a point of so much importance. Edward consented to indulge them with three weeks for that purpose; and issued safe conducts for all the nobility of Scotland to repair to Norham on the day appointed for giving in their answer. No objection being made by the barons to Edward's claim, the king addressed himself to the several competitors, requiring their acknowledgement of his superiority. Bruce was the first to acknowledge it; while Baliol, afraid of giving offence to the Scottish nation, consented with more reluctance. Having gained this important acknowledgement, Edward demanded that the principal castles in that kingdom should be put into his hands; adding, that it would be in vain for him to pronounce any sentence, without having it in his power to enforce it. The demand was complied with; and Edward having named commissioners to inquire into the claims of the competitors, and promised to pronounce sentence the ensuing year, returned to England. The most celebrated lawyers of Europe were now consulted on this question; and the idea of a representation was so well understood, that their answers were unanimous in favour of Baliol.

A. D. 1293. After long debates, and several adjournments, Edward pronounced sentence in favour of Baliol; and he was immediately put in possession of the kingdom. All the English garrisons were withdrawn, and Baliol did homage, and swore fealty to Edward. He was also received as king of Scotland by all the nobility, and crowned at Scone with the usual formalities.

Some of the most bloody wars in Europe have arose from very trifling causes; but, perhaps, none from one of less importance than that which now threatened two powerful kingdoms with desolation. Two seamen, one belonging to a Norman, and the other to an English ship, having some dispute at a spring near Bayonne, with regard to the preference of filling their casks with water, the Norman attempted to stab the Englishman with a dagger he drew from his side. The latter perceived his design, grappled with him, threw his adversary on the ground, and the Norman was killed by falling on his own dagger. Exasperated at the death of their countryman, the Normans determined to take the severest revenge; and meeting with an English vessel, they hanged several of the crew at the yard-arm, together with some dogs; bidding the mariners inform their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. The English were not formed to bear so deliberate an insult: they made severe reprisals: the seas were covered with hostile fleets, while the kings of France and England seemed indifferent spectators of the dreadful outrages committed by their subjects. Fleets were fitted out for carrying on this new species of war, which now became truly alarming; and increased to such a degree, that in one of those naval engagements, the French lost near fifteen thousand men. Philip the Fair now demanded satisfaction from Edward; and being dissatisfied with his answer, cited him to appear before the peers of France, as duke of Guienne. Edward sent his brother Edmund into France, in order to accommodate the quarrel; and prevent, if possible, the ravages of a bloody war.

While these negotiations were carrying on at the court of France, an event happened which left the Scots no room to doubt of the absolute state of vassalage into which they were fallen. A burgher of Berwick, complaining of an injury he had received from some English commissioners sent into Scotland, Edward ordered the cause to be tried in England by his judges. The council of Scotland considering this order as a breach of promise in Edward, who had assured them, that any offences committed in their kingdom should be cognizable only in the Scottish courts, sent a remonstrance to the English monarch. But they obtained not redress: Edward declared, "That the cause should be tried in England; it belonged not to vassals to punish those that represented the person of their sovereign." But if the Scots were mortified at this instance of their dependency, they were much more so in the treatment of their new king, who was soon after obliged to appear personally before Edward, in his court at Westminster, to answer a complaint exhibited against him by the earl of Fife, for seizing certain estates of which he had been invested by Edward's particular order. At this trial Baliol was obliged to relinquish the seat of honour hitherto filled by the kings of Scotland in the English courts, and to plead his own cause at the bar as a common defendant. This pusillanimous submission rendered Baliol so contemptible to the Scottish nobility, that they chose a regency of twelve persons to direct the management of affairs. The Scottish monarch was alarmed; and notwithstanding the facility of his temper, determined to shake off so ignominious a dependence. He left the court of London without taking leave, and Edward seized all his estates in England. Baliol saw his danger, and concluded a treaty with Philip. An incident that gave rise to that strict union which continued so many ages between the French and Scottish nations.

Edward intended by these indignities to engage Baliol in rebellion; that he might have a pretence for making an entire conquest of Scotland; but the situation of affairs on the continent prevented him from carrying his designs into execution. The French monarch refused to listen to any accommodation, unless some expedient could be found for repairing his honour, which he pretended was wounded on account of his being the liege lord of Edward with regard to his possessions on the continent. It was therefore proposed that the English monarch should put Philip in possession of Guienne, as a reparation for the insult; and that the king of France should immediately restore it to Edward. Philip promised, on the word of a king, to perform his part of the treaty; and Edmund was commissioned to give him the satisfaction he desired. But the French king had no sooner obtained possession of the province, than he refused to fulfil his engagement, cited Edward to appear in the court of France, and on his refusing to obey the summons, the province of Guienne, by a formal sentence, was declared to be forfeited and annexed to the crown. Enraged at the shameful duplicity of Philip, Edward determined to take a severe revenge; while this infamous breach of faith awakened the highest resentment among the English, who resolved to support their monarch to the utmost of their power.

But large supplies were necessary for raising armies sufficient for attacking so formidable a power, and also keeping in awe the Welsh and Scots, both these people having given plain indications of embracing the first favourable opportunity of recovering their former independence. Edward had experienced the difficulties of raising money on the people without obtaining their consent, and therefore determined to pursue the method pointed out by Leicester during the late reign. He summoned two deputies from every every borough, in order to procure their leave to the levying of the necessary taxes on the people. "It is an excellent rule," said Edward in the preamble to this writ, "that what concerns all, should be approved by all; and that common dangers should be repelled by united efforts." A noble principle, and worthy of a more enlightened age! Nor did Edward stop here. He summoned also deputies from the inferior clergy, and these formed a lower house of convocation. They, however, refused to obey the king's writ, lest it should be construed as an acknowledgement of their having submitted to the authority of the temporal power. It was therefore agreed that the king should issue his writ to the archbishops, who should, in consequence, summon the clergy. The king intended that these deputies should, with the prelates, have formed one estate of the kingdom; but this expedient rendered it necessary for the ecclesiastics to meet in two houses of convocation, under their respective archbishops. The English parliament, for the assembly now properly deserved that name, being met, the barons and knights granted the king an eleventh of their moveables, the burgesses a seventh, and the clergy a tenth.

A. D. 1296. The war with France had for some time been carried on with various success; when pope Celestine, desirous of engaging the powers of Europe in another crusade, offered his mediation, and a truce was made between the belligerent powers. This cessation of hostilities with Philip enabled Edward to make preparations for repelling the attempts of the Scots, whom he knew were highly exasperated at the affront their king had lately received. While he was employed in raising an army necessary for that purpose, he received advice of the treaty secretly concluded between Baliol and Philip; but he was not intimidated by the close connection between these two powers. He summoned Baliol to perform the duty of a vassal, and cited him to appear before the English parliament; but he refused the citation, and having procured a dispensation from his oath of fealty, he renounced his homage and defied the English monarch. Exasperated at the conduct of Baliol, Edward marched to the northward at the head of thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The Scots army was more numerous, being composed of forty thousand infantry, and five hundred horse, but they wanted both discipline and experience; and, what was still of more consequence, dissensions prevailed among the leaders. From these alarming appearances, several of the Scottish nobility, among whom were Robert Bruce, the father and son, the earls of March and Angus, prognosticated the ruin of their country, and made their submission to Edward, who now passed the Tweed at Coldstream, without opposition. Berwick was taken by assault, and above seven thousand of the garrison put to the sword; the governor, Sir William Douglas, was taken prisoner. Earl Warrene was then dispatched, at the head of ten thousand men, to besiege the castle of Dunbar, defended by the flower of the Scottish nobility.

Baliol knew the importance of this fortress, and determined to venture a battle for its relief: and Warrene, informed of his intention, marched to meet him, when a dreadful battle ensued. The Scots, bad armed and disciplined, could not support the furious charge of the English; they were soon broke, and driven with great slaughter from the field of battle; above twenty thousand of them are said to have fallen by the swords of the English. The castle surrendered the next day to Edward, who then joined his army, and pursued his conquests without any farther opposition from Baliol's army. The castles of Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and Sterling submitted after a feeble resistance; and all the southern parts of the kingdom were immediately subdued by the English. The timid Baliol, instead of retreating to the mountainous parts of the country, where he might have supported himself against all the attempts of the English, hastened to make his submission. He expressed the deepest penitence for having disobeyed his liege lord, and made a solemn resignation of his crown into the hands of Edward, at Brechin, on the tenth of July. He was sent prisoner to the tower of London, and two years afterwards submitted to a voluntary banishment in France, where, without making any farther attempts for the recovery of his throne, he died in a private station.

Scotland being thus subdued, Edward sent to London the regalia, together with the famous fatidical marble stone, on which all the preceding kings of Scotland had, for many ages, been seated, when they received inauguration. The popular superstition of the Scots paid the highest veneration to this stone, which was regarded as the true palladium of their monarchy, and the ultimate resource in every national misfortune. The chief offices of the kingdom were entrusted to Englishmen. All the records and monuments of antiquity were destroyed; and the conqueror returned to England, persuaded that he had fully reduced the kingdom of Scotland to subjection.

But this expedition had drained his coffers, and he was obliged to have recourse to his parliament for a farther supply, in order to enable him to wrest the province of Guienne out of the hands of Philip, the truce with that monarch being now expired. The barons and burgesses very readily complied with his request, but he met with an opposition from the clergy, which was attended with some important consequences. Robert de Winchelsey, archbishop of Canterbury, had procured a bull from pope Boniface VIII. who had lately succeeded Celestine in the papal chair, prohibiting the princes of Christendom, under the penalty of excommunication, from levying, without his consent, any tax on the clergy; and restraining, under the same penalty, all ecclesiastics from submitting to such impositions. Edward, who knew nothing of this bull, was astonished when the clergy refused their assistance, and published the bull, as a reason for their conduct. But Edward was not formed to submit to insults; he, however, adjourned the parliament till the fourteenth of January, that they might have time to deliberate on his demand, and form their final resolution.

A. D. 1297. Edward hoped that a little reflection would have rendered the clergy more conformable to his demands; but he was mistaken; the archbishop of Canterbury, in the name of the whole body, answered, "That the clergy owed obedience to two sovereigns, their spiritual and temporal; but their duty bound them to a much stricter attachment to the former than the latter." Edward, though highly enraged, concealed his resentment; but told them, that as they refused to assist the civil power, it was unreasonable for them to expect any protection from the laws. With this answer the clergy were dismissed, and orders issued to the judges, to receive no cause brought before them by any ecclesiastic; to hear and decide all causes in which they were defendants; to do every man justice against them; but to do them justice against nobody; at the same time he locked up all their granaries, and barns, and prohibited any rent to be paid them. The clergy were astonished; they had never before experienced the proper resentment of an English monarch. The archbishop of York and his clergy complied with the king's request, and received the royal protection; but Winchelsea grew more obstinate from persecution. He ordered the pope's bull to be published in all the churches of his province, and convened a synod of his suffragans at St. Paul's in London. But Edward, aware of his intention, issued a writ, inhibiting him, under pain of imprisonment, from denouncing any ecclesiastical censure either against the king, his ministers, or subjects. At the same time, the archdeacon of Bath appealed, in the king's name, to the pope against all proceedings; an expedient which effectually suspended every operation of the synod.

The clergy now found themselves in the most dreadful situation. Their houses and convents might indeed have afforded them a safe retreat, but they were in want of subsistence; and whenever they ventured abroad, they were robbed and abused by every ruffian. The people, who had hitherto beheld them with a kind of religious awe, now looked upon them with contempt, and laughed at their sufferings. The archbishop himself was robbed of his equipage and furniture, and at last reduced to board himself with a single servant, in the house of a poor clergyman. This situation was not to be endured: experience convinced them, that a deprivation of the advantages of citizens was the greatest calamity; and they accordingly became solicitous to satisfy both the king and the state. But in order to avoid an open disobedience to the positive injunctions of Boniface, instead of granting the king a fifth of their movables, they agreed to deposit an equivalent sum of money in some church or convent; whence it was taken by the king's officers.

These supplies, tho' very considerable, were far from being sufficient to answer the designs formed by Edward for taking ample vengeance on Philip for his perfidy; so that he was obliged to have recourse to arbitrary measures, extremely oppressive to the people. He imposed a tax of forty shillings on every sack of wool exported; he seized, without consent of the owners, the cattle and other commodities necessary for the supply of his army; and required the attendance of every proprietor of land, possessed of twenty pounds a year, even though he was not a tenant of the crown, and therefore not obliged by the tenure of his estate to perform any such service. It is no wonder that despotic measures like these, occasioned great uneasiness in the kingdom. The nobility were alarmed; they gave countenance and authority to the complaints of the people, and Edward was soon convinced that he had pursued imprudent measures. An army was assembled on the sea coast, which Edward intended to embark for Guienne under the command of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, the constable, and Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, the marshal of England; while Edward himself, at the head of another army, attacked the French on the side of Flanders. This incident gave the two barons an opportunity of shewing their resentment at the arbitrary measures pursued by the king. They affirmed that their office obliged them only to attend his person in the wars, and therefore refused to lead the army. A violent altercation ensued; and the king, turning himself to the constable, exclaimed, "By God, Sir earl, you shall either go, or hang." "By God, Sir king," replied the constable, "I will neither go nor hang." And immediately left the army, with the marshal, and about thirty other barons of very considerable power.

Edward, however provoked by the refusal of the barons, was prudent enough to conceal his resentment, and laid aside his expedition into Guienne. He saw his error, and endeavoured, by pursuing conciliating methods, to get the better of this opposition. He caressed his nobility; he reconciled himself to the clergy; he made an apology for his conduct, which he imputed to the urgent necessities of the crown: and promised, on his return from his expedition, to redress all grievances, and restore the execution of the laws.

These political measures convinced the two earls, that it would be very imprudent to carry their resentments farther than they were warranted by the laws of their country. They accordingly contented themselves with drawing up a remonstrance, which was presented to the king at Winchelsea, when he was ready to embark for Flanders. Edward again promised them redress as soon as he returned to England, and added, that he hoped those nobles who had declined leading his army, would do no injury to his crown or kingdom during his absence. The barons were, however, far from being satisfied, and he had hardly landed on the continent, before the constable and marshal insisted on an authentic confirmation both of the great charter, and the charter of the forests. Edward was very desirous of putting it off till his return, but the parliament, which had been assembled at London by his order, joining with the two earls, and the charters being sent over to Flanders, he confirmed them in presence of all the prelates and nobility in his army.

A. D. 1298. Edward, though he lost no time by indolence, did not land in Flanders till the season was too far advanced for making any attempt of importance. The earl of Flanders, who had joined in a league with Edward, soon experienced the power and resentment of Philip. Lisle, St. Omer, Courtray, and Ypres were already wrested from him, and many more of the principal places in his dominions were threatened with the same fate. The arrival of Edward indeed put a stop to the success of Philip; but the two kings, instead of venturing a decisive action, agreed to a truce for two years; and engaged to submit their differences to the arbitration of pope Boniface. But as both these monarchs were jealous of the claims made on the most trivial pretences by the holy see, they took care to insert in their reference, that they did not submit their differences to his decision, from any right he might pretend by virtue of his pontifical character; but merely by their own consent, as a private person. The pope soon gave his sentence, which seemed to have been dictated by his passion rather than his judgment. He commanded not only a restitution of Guienne, but also the places which had been taken from the earl of Flanders. Philip was desirous of comprehending John Baliol and the Scots in this treaty; but this was absolutely refused by Edward. At last the two monarchs compromised their their differences, by making mutual sacrifices to each other. Edward abandoned his ally, the earl of Flanders; and Philip gave up the Scots. This is not the only time the interests of allies have been sacrificed at the altar of ambition. The sentence of Boniface was, however, regarded, and the treaty cemented by a double marriage; that of Edward himself with Margaret, Philip's sister; and that of the prince of Wales with Isabella, the daughter of that monarch.

During these transactions on the continent, the Scots made a successful effort for the recovery of their liberties. Edward had not been fortunate in his choice of persons to whom he had committed the administration of affairs in Scotland. Warrenne, earl of Surry, to whom the chief authority had been delegated, was, indeed, a man of prudence, virtue, and abilities; but his ill state of health obliged him to return to England. At his departure, the reins of government were intrusted to William de Ormesby, chief justiciary, and Cressingham, the treasurer. The former was distinguished by the rigour and severity of his temper, and the latter by his avarice. Persons of such characters were ill adapted to the task of reconciling the Scots to a yoke they bore with the utmost reluctance. Instead of making use of moderate and lenient measures, they treated them as a conquered people, and made them sensible of the servitude into which they were fallen. This exasperated the whole nation, and the Scots resolved to attempt the recovery of their ancient liberty.

Among those who had severely felt the hand of power, was one William Wallace, a person of small fortune, but descended from an ancient family. He saw the distresses of the people, and undertook the defence of his country. He was of a gigantic stature, prodigious strength, heroic courage, and disinterested magnanimity. He had retired to the woods, to avoid the vengeance of the government; and put himself at the head of a small body of men, who, like himself, had fled from the tyranny of the English. He planned his enterprizes with so much prudence, that he was always successful; and the fame of his exploits soon increased the number of his followers. He now determined to attack the governors, and accordingly advanced to Scone for that purpose. But Ormesby and Cressingham, apprized of his intention, fled into England, and were followed by all the other officers of that kingdom. Elated at this success, the Scots flew to arms; and some of the principal barons, among whom was Sir William Douglas, openly countenanced the party of Wallace.

The earl of Surry was now sufficiently alarmed, and endeavoured to recover by the celerity of his motions what he had lost by neglect. He entered Annandale, and came up with the Scottish army at Irvine before they were sufficiently formed. The nobility finding it would be in vain to oppose the English, made their submission, and obtained a pardon. Wallace, however, at the head of a chosen body of men, who had all bound themselves by an oath never to lay down their arms till they had effected the liberty of their country, retired before the capitulation was signed, and took post on a hill above the monastery of Cambuskenneth, in the neighbourhood of Stirling. Warrenne continued his march, and discovered the enemy on the opposite bank of Forth; but, at the same time, perceived the danger of attacking them in this advantageous situation, especially as the bridge over the Forth was so narrow, as hardly to admit two men abreast. Sir Richard Lundy, a Scotsman of birth and family, but a firm adherent to the English, desired a party of five hundred horse, and a proportional body of foot, might be put under his command; promising to pass the river at a ford a few miles above, and to fall on the rear of the enemy, in order to divert their attention while the main body of the army passed the bridge. This prudent design was, however, rendered abortive by the impatience of Cressingham, who being actuated, both by personal and national animosities, against the Scots, urged the general to attack them immediately; exclaiming loudly against all delays, as expensive, and dishonourable to the king. Surry, who considered these reflections as censures upon his own conduct, ordered the army to pass the bridge immediately. But he paid dearly for his temerity. Wallace let as many of them pass as he was confident he could conquer; and then attacked them with such fury, that they were all cut to pieces, or pushed into the river, where they perished. Near five thousand men fell in the action, and among the rest Cressingham himself, who being found among the slain, the Scots flayed his dead body, and made saddles and girths of his skin. The remainder of the English army were so dispirited at the destruction of their countrymen, whom they could not assist, that Warrenne thought it advisable to make no farther attempts against the enemy; and accordingly returned, with the remains of his army, into England.

The Scots now flocked from every part of the kingdom to join the standard of Wallace, who was immediately declared regent of the kingdom during the captivity of Baliol. His forces were greatly elated with their success; and he immediately led them towards the borders of England, where he was sure of finding subsistence; the disorders of war, added to unfavourable seasons, having occasioned a famine in Scotland. The castles of Berwick and Roxburgh made but a feeble resistance, and opened the Scots a free passage into Northumberland. Wallace first led his victorious troops against Carlisle; but not being able to take the city, he ravaged the country as far as Durham, and returned loaded with plunder.

During these disorders in the north, Edward arrived in England, and determined to wipe off this stain of national disgrace, and make the enemy pay dearly for their victory. But before he put himself at the head of his army, he prudently endeavoured to appease the murmurs of his people by concessions and promises. He assembled a parliament at York, and ordered the two charters, together with the additional statutes in favour of public liberty, to be read and published for the satisfaction of the common people. This was accordingly performed with great formality; and the bishop of Carlisle solemnly denounced the sentence of excommunication against all violators of these charters. The king then ordered a strict account of the quantity of corn, and other commodities, which had been violently seized before his departure, to be taken, in order that the owners might receive satisfaction; and returned to the citizens of London the privilege of choosing their own magistrates, which had been taken from them in the latter part of his father's reign.

These popular measures gained him the hearts of his subjects; they flocked to his standard, and he soon found himself at the head of an hundred thousand fighting men; a force abundantly sufficient to reduce the insurgents to subjection. On the other hand, that union, which alone can render an army powerful, was wanting among the Scots. Divisions and envy took place among that unhappy people. The noblemen descended from the royal family of Scotland, instead of looking upon the patriotic virtues of Wallace with admiration, and joining in a glorious emulation in the service of their country, threw the most ungenerous reflections upon his conduct, and even charged him with having formed a design of seizing the crown. They chose rather to behold their country groaning under the yoke of perpetual bondage, than see themselves eclipsed by a person of inferior birth. Wallace saw the fatal consequences that must attend these divisions, and generously resigned his authority, retaining only the command of a body of men who refused to follow any other leader. The liberty of his country, not a desire of power, had called him from his retreat, and he willingly sacrificed the latter to preserve the former. On the resignation of Wallace, the command mand of the army devolved upon the steward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenock, both eminent for their birth and fortune.

This contest being decided, the Scottish army marched to Falkirk, where they determined to wait the attack of the English. The army was drawn up in three bodies, the fronts of which were composed of pike-men, and the intervals filled with archers. But dreading the great superiority of the English cavalry, they endeavoured to secure their front with pallisades tied together with ropes.

Pleased with the hopes of terminating the war by one decisive action, Edward divided his army into three bodies, conformable to that of the enemy, and led them to the charge. The attack was begun by the English archers, who poured a dreadful shower of arrows upon the enemy. The Scottish bowmen, unable to support the fury of the English, were driven from the field of battle with great slaughter. The archers pursued their advantage; and pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, threw them into disorder, which was improved by the cavalry, and a general rout ensued, attended with the most dreadful carnage. It is impossible to fix, with any certainty, the number that fell in this remarkable battle. Some historians tell us, that no less than fifty or sixty thousand perished, while others have reduced their enormous account to twenty thousand. This, however, is certain, that the Scots never suffered a greater loss, nor ever experienced a defeat that seemed pregnant with more destructive consequences.

Wallace alone kept a considerable party of his troops together; and retiring behind the Carron, marched leisurely along the banks of that small river, which protected him from the enemy. Bruce followed him, appeared on the opposite bank, and desired a short conference. He began with reproaching the Scottish leader with madness, in taking up arms against Edward, one of the most powerful princes, and the best general of the age: at the same time insinuating, that Wallace himself had formed a design of seizing the crown. Wallace warmly disclaimed every ambitious intention; declaring, that the miseries of his country alone roused him to arms. Adding, that he had neither any right to expect, nor any inclination to seize the sceptre of Scotland. "To you" added he, "your country owes her afflictions. You left her overwhelmed with miseries, and I undertook the cause you so basely betrayed; a cause I mean to support while I have strength to wield a sword; nor shall I envy you a life of ease and pleasure in the court of a foreign tyrant. You, my lord, have, indeed, a just title to the crown, and might wear it with honour to yourself, and advantage to your country; but you seem to prefer the chains of servitude to freedom, and the smiles of despotism to the calls of honour."

Struck with the generous sentiments of Wallace, Bruce repented of his engagements with Edward. He saw his own conduct in a very different point of light, and determined to seize the first opportunity of joining those patriotic chiefs who had so nobly supported the cause of his country. Bruce now returned to the English army; and Wallace, at the head of the poor remains of the battle of Falkirk, retired into the northern parts of the kingdom, fully determined never to submit to the laws of the conqueror.

Unable to face the armies of the English, and desirous, if possible, to support the liberties of their country, the Scots implored in vain the protection of Lewis: he had abandoned them to the fury of the conqueror by his late treaty. But they were more successful in their application to Boniface; he undertook the defence of Scotland. That pontiff, who seemed determined to carry the power of the papal chair to the most extravagant height, wrote a letter to Edward; in which, after confuting the pretensions of that monarch to the superiority of Scotland, advanced claims still more absurd in their room. He asserted, with a singular degree of confidence, that the pope was the true liege lord of Scotland; that his right was full, entire, and derived from the most remote antiquity. Edward, both astonished and offended at this bold assertion, was at first inclined to treat the pontiff's letter with contempt; but fearing the superstitious bigotry of the people might occasion disorders in the nation, and prevent his maintaining the superiority he had acquired over Scotland, he wrote an answer to the pope's epistle, and advanced claims to the Scottish crown, at least as chimerical as those of his holiness. He deduced the superiority of England over Scotland from the time of Brutus the Trojan, who, he said, first founded the British monarchy, in the time of Eli and Samuel. He laid it down as a fact, confirmed by the records of antiquity, that the English monarchs had often made grants of Scotland to their subjects, and had dethroned those vassal kings when they proved unfaithful to them. He recited, with great ostentation, the homage which William had done to Henry II. but mentioned not the abolition of that extorted deed by Richard I. These pretensions, however absurd, were confirmed by one hundred and four barons assembled at Lincoln for that purpose. But though they signed those pretensions, and agreed to send them to Boniface, they took particular care to prevent this act from affording the least pretension for his holiness to make it the foundation of any claim to a superiority over England. They annexed a positive declaration, that though they were willing to submit these proofs to him as a man, they did not by any means receive him as a judge. "The crown of England" added they, "is free, nor will we suffer even the king himself to relinquish its independency."

A. D. 1303. The Scots, though their army had been so totally defeated at Falkirk, were not subdued: fresh forces had joined the remains of that army in the mountainous parts of the kingdom, and again attacked the districts possessed by the English. An army of ten thousand men was soon formed under Cummin, appointed regent on the resignation of Wallace, and advanced to Biggar, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. John de Segrave, whom Edward had left guardian of Scotland, assembled all the English forces in that kingdom to oppose the Scots; but perceiving that it would be difficult to procure the necessary quantity of provisions for their subsistence in a body, he separated them into three divisions: the first was commanded by himself in person, the second by his brother, and the third by Sir Robert Neville. Cummin determined to take advantage of this separation, and advanced, under covert of the night, to attack Segrave's division, which lay at Rossin, about sixteen miles from the Scottish camp. As soon as the dawn appeared, the English discovered Cummin's army marching to attack them, but it was too late to make the necessary preparations; the Scots fell upon them before they could form themselves in order of battle, and obtained an easy victory: a few only escaped, by flying to the second division, informing them at once of their misfortune, and the approach of the enemy. The commander immediately drew up his men, and led them on directly to revenge the death of their countrymen. A bloody contest ensued. The Scots, elated with success, charged with the utmost fury; while the English, animated with vengeance, made a noble resistance. The battle continued for some time doubtful, but at last terminated in favour of the Scots, and the English were obliged to retreat with considerable loss. By this time the third division, under the command of Sir Robert Neville, appeared; and the Scots, already exhausted with fatigue, and their ranks considerably thinned by the two former actions, would willingly have declined the engagement. They pleaded the excessive labours they had already undergone; they pointed to their wounds, and desired to retire while it was yet in their power. Cummin, who knew that a retreat was now impossible, reminded them of the cause for which they were fighting, the tyranny of the English, the glory of their ancestors, and the disgrace of slavery. His arguments prevailed, and having furnished the followers of their camp with the arms of the vanquished, and mounted the horses they had taken, stood the shock of a third engagement, and with the utmost difficulty obtained the victory. The event was not, however, wholly inglorious to Neville; he rescued Segrave, who had been taken prisoner in the first engagement, and retreated in excellent order. The Scots soon after made themselves masters of Stirling castle, and gave the command of that fortress to Oliphant, an officer celebrated both for his courage and capacity.

But these successes on the part of the Scots, proved only gleams of sunshine before a dreadful storm. Edward determined to revenge the disgrace of his forces, and appointed Roxburgh for the rendezvous of his army. Every precaution was taken to ensure the success of this expedition, and to prevent any want of provisions, a numerous fleet was fitted out with orders to sail along the coast, and attend the march of the army with proper supplies. The forces being assembled at Roxburgh, Edward advanced into the heart of Scotland, at the head of an army that would have rendered all opposition in the open field, a species of madness: the Scots had no other resource than to fly for safety to the woods and fastnesses of their country. The only opposition Edward met with was from two or three castles; the rest opened their gates on the first summons. In this manner he led his army from one extremity of Scotland to the other: his vigilance preserved his forces from surprise, and his fleet supplied them with plenty of provisions. Even the intrepid Wallace, though he followed the English armies, found few opportunities for displaying his valour. The conduct of Edward rendered all his attempts abortive.

A. D. 1305. Edward having entirely finished the conquest of Scotland, applied himself to settle the administration; and in order to render the Scots more submissive to his government, he conferred on several of the nobility particular marks of his favour. Ten persons, two from each order of bishops, abbots, earls and barons, and two for the community of the gentry, were chosen as deputies to the parliament summoned to meet at London, in order to settle the administration in a manner at once both permanent and advantageous to all parties. The conferences were accordingly opened, and after a consultation of twenty days, the civil establishment of Scotland was fixed in the following manner: "Eight justices were to be appointed to regulate the affairs of government; the natives of both kingdoms were rendered equally capable of filling the posts of power and trust in Scotland. John, earl of Britany, was appointed guardian of that kingdom, and the offices of chancellor, chamberlain, and judges, were filled partly by English and partly by Scotsmen."

It was also agreed, "That the Scottish laws and customs should be abolished; and that a parliament should be summoned, on the guardian's arrival in Scotland, in which the laws of king David should be revived, together with the amendments and additions made to them by succeeding kings: that the guardian, with the concurrence of his council, should have full power to make such alterations and amendments, as should seem most consistent with the good of the kingdom, and the safety of the subject, without consulting the king: but if any difficulty should arise, which required a more mature deliberation to remove, the whole should be properly stated, and sent by the deputies from the states of Scotland to the English parliament, where the question should be finally determined."

At the breaking up of the parliament, Edward issued a general pardon to all the Scottish nobility who had carried arms against him. Wallace, however, was excepted; the king insisting that he should surrender himself at discretion. That chief still continued in arms, at the head of a few followers, and still cherished the expiring sparks of Scottish liberty. But the publication of Edward's pardon caused a very considerable desertion in his little party, and he was obliged to wander from one part of the country to another, in order to keep himself concealed from the vigilant eyes of his enemies. He continued this itinerant course of life for some time; but was at last betrayed by Sir John Monteith, his former friend, and sent prisoner to London. Edward, whose natural bravery should have induced him to cherish similar qualities in an enemy, was so enraged at some violences committed by Wallace during the fury of the war, that he ordered him to be tried as a rebel and traitor, and executed on Tower-hill.

A. D. 1306. Exasperated at this barbarous policy, the Scots, before disgusted at the many innovations introduced into the laws of their country by the sword of a conqueror, meditated a severe revenge; they wanted only a chief of determined resolution to lead them against the enemy. Nor was it long before a general of the greatest merit appeared. Robert Bruce, descended from the royal family of Scotland, determined to seize the sceptre of his ancestors. He well knew, that after the submissions he had made to Edward, he should never be able to appear with any advantage, while the illustrious Wallace, then the idol of the common people, survived; but the death of that chief removed the only obstacle to his ambition. John Baliol, the competitor with Bruce's father for the Scottish crown, died also about the same time. This incident united the two parties, which had before divided Scotland, and greatly encouraged Bruce to attempt the deliverance of his country from the yoke of slavery. He was now at the court of Edward, and opened his mind to Cummin, who approved of his design, and promised his assistance; but by reflecting coolly on the enterprize, he changed his opinion, and informed Edward of Bruce's intentions; the king, who suspected that the discovery of Cummin proceeded from envy, omitted to secure the person of Bruce, till he was convinced of the truth from concurring circumstances.

The doubts of Edward saved Bruce from imprisonment; but his friends soon perceived the dangers to which he was exposed; and the earl of Gloucester, thinking it would be imprudent either to converse with Bruce, or give him the necessary information in a letter, sent him, by a servant, a pair of gilt spurs and a purse of gold, which he pretended he had borrowed from him. Bruce soon perceived the meaning of the ænigmatical present, and immediately effected his escape. Soon after his arrival in his native country, he presented himself at a meeting of the Scottish nobles, discovered to them his designs, and exhorted them to join in the noble attempt to break the chains of servitude, and revenge the insulted rights of their fellow citizens. They listened to his remonstrances, and declared their resolution of seconding his patriotic designs and asserting the undoubted rights of the nation, against their common oppressors. Cummin alone opposed this general determination. He represented the attempt as pregnant with destruction; he told them it was madness to oppose the power of the English, while that power was in the hands of a prince of such uncommon vigour and abilities. He added, that nothing but the most rigorous punishments could be expected, if they again broke their oaths of fealty, and shook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward. Bruce, who plainly foresaw the failure of all his ambitious projects from the opposition of Cummin, followed him, on the dissolution of the assembly, to the cloisters of the Grey Friars, and running him through the body, left him for dead. Sir Thomas Kilpatrick, one of Bruce's friends, asked him if the traitor was slain. "I believe so," replied Bruce. "And is that a matter," cried Kilpatrick, "to be left to conjecture? I will secure him." He immediately ran to Cummin, and drawing his dagger, stabbed him to the heart. This act, so justly condemned condemned in the present age, was then considered as a noble achievement of patriotic virtue.

It was now too late to recede: no pardon could be expected from Edward; Bruce and his party had only the alternative to conquer or perish. No time was to be lost, and that martial leader improved every moment: he flew into different parts of the kingdom to rouse his countrymen to arms, and persuade them to shake off the galling yoke of slavery. The Scots embraced with ardour the pleasing hopes of recovering their liberty. Their courage was stimulated by oppression. The English were again driven out of the kingdom, except those who had taken refuge in places of strength; and Bruce received the crown of his ancestors in the abbey of Scone.

Edward was no sooner informed of this unexpected event, than he sent Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, at the head of a considerable body of forces, into Scotland, to check the progress of the insurgents. Bruce had collected a considerable number of forces, but they were raw and undisciplined, and consequently unable to withstand the attacks of veteran troops. They were encamped at Methven near Perth, without suspecting the approach of an enemy. Pembroke profitted by their ignorance; he attacked them in the night, and drove them from the field. Bruce behaved with the greatest intrepidity; was thrice dismounted from his horse and as often recovered himself: but all his efforts were in vain; he was obliged to submit to superior fortune, and seek his safety in a speedy flight. This dreadful disaster struck the Scots with terror: the greater part of them deserted their leader, and Bruce was obliged to fly for shelter to the Western Isles.

A few days after this defeat, Edward himself arrived in Scotland, and divided his army into two bodies, one of which he sent to the northward under the command of the prince of Wales, assisted by the earls of Lancaster and Hereford. The prince made himself master of the castle of Kildrommey, and soon after took the countess of Buchan, and the lady Mary Bruce, sister to the king, prisoners. These two ladies Edward, from a disingenuous motive of revenge, ordered to be shut up in wooden cages, and one of them to be hung over the battlements of Roxburgh, and the other over those of Berwick, as public spectacles to the insulting populace. After performing this successful expedition, the prince met his father at Perth: all Scotland was once more subdued by the forces of Edward, and that prince returned to Carlisle.

A. D. 1307. Bruce, who had hitherto concealed himself so effectually that it was generally believed he had perished in the wreck of his army, now appeared at the head of a small body of men, and committed the most dreadful ravages upon the peaceable inhabitants who were in the interest of the English. Edward, at once alarmed and exasperated at this sudden and unexpected interruption of the public tranquillity, dispatched the earl of Pembroke, at the head of a considerable body of forces, to attack the insurgent in his retreat; but Bruce, who was well acquainted with the nature of the country, led the earl into an ambuscade, and totally defeated his forces.

Edward now made preparations for invading Scotland with more fury than ever; he determined to make the rebels feel the weight of his resentment. But he lived not to execute his designs. He had for some time been afflicted with a dysentery, which had weakened him exceedingly; but his eagerness to finish the reduction of Scotland, suffered him not to continue at Carlisle. He set out at the head of his forces, but the fatigue of marching increased his distemper; and he died at Burgh on the Sands, on the seventh of July, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign.

Edward had many virtues and some vices; but the former were more than sufficient to balance the latter. His ambition, and a desire of increasing the power of his kingdom, seem to have formed the ruling passion of his soul. In pursuit of these, he scrupled not to pursue measures inconsistent with the liberty of his people. The equity of his enterprize against Scotland has been justly questioned; but when it is remembered, that the union of the two kingdoms must have been attended with the most solid advantages to both, we shall, perhaps, be more inclined to praise than censure his conduct. At the same time, it must be confessed, that if his character should be thought exceptionable in this particular, his country obtained the most permanent advantages from his activity, his courage, his policy and his prudence. He restored authority to the government, maintained the laws against all the efforts of his turbulent barons, and executed justice with severity on all who disturbed the domestic peace of the kingdom. His merit as a legislator was so great, that he is often called "The English Justinian;" because, in his reign, the laws acquired a great perfection, and justly deserved the name of Establishments. He settled the jurisdiction of the several courts; and he first established the office of justice of peace. His conduct with regard to the clergy was more politic; he saw their power, and was desirous of preventing its increase. Their possessions were unalienable, and perpetually augmenting: he therefore prohibited them from making new acquisitions, by passing the statute of mortmain. But the undertaking that will always render the name of this great legislator dear to the English, was his establishing the House of Commons, by summoning two deputies from every borough, conformable to the example of the earl of Leicester. By this means the boroughs became of importance in the state; and the mechanics and tradesmen, whom the feudal system had placed in a despicable point of light, acquired the honour of being one of the branches of the legislature; trade was encouraged, and men of property thought it no disgrace to engage in the commerce of their country. In a word, this great prince laid the foundation for that species of government which unites all the advantages of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, and which is still the glory and boast of this island.

EDWARD II. surnamed of CAERNARVON.

A. D. 1307. YOUNG Edward, who was twenty-three years of age on the death of his father, was remarkable for the gracefulness of his person, the majesty of his appearance, and the mildness of his disposition. But he was not inspired with the spirit of his father. He was born to obey minions and favourites; not to govern a great kingdom, and support the authority of the crown over a proud and turbulent nobility. The English had formed the most pleasing ideas of enjoying both happiness and tranquillity under his government; but they soon perceived that all their hopes were built on a chimerical foundation, and that the pleasing prospect was merely delusive; it vanished like the cloud of the morning. His father, on his death-bed, had charged him to pursue the war against Scotland with the utmost vigour. "Carry my ashes before you," said he to his son; "the rebels will never be able to support the sight of them." But young Edward had no talents for war. He marched, indeed, against Bruce,

Bruce, who now appeared at the head of a respectable army, but returned with precipitation; he seemed to dread the fatigues of victory.

Piers Gaveston, a gentleman of Guienne, possessed of a few talents, frivolous in themselves, but capable of attracting the regard of weak and inferior minds, engrossed the friendship and favour of Edward. His beauty, and his great address in all the genteel exercises, constituted his chief merit, while his vices threatened destruction to the state. Gaveston, however, gained so entire an ascendancy over the young Edward, that his father had banished this favourite from the kingdom, and made his son promise him, in his last moments, never to recall him. But young Edward paid no regard to his solemn asseveration: his heart was so strongly disposed to friendship and confidence, that one of the first acts of his reign was to send for this unworthy minion, who was already detested by the nation. He created him earl of Cornwall, married him to his own niece, and entrusted to him the government of the kingdom.

While Edward was thus lavishing power, honours, and estates, on a worthless favourite, the war in Scotland was neglected. Bruce, who had retired to his fastnesses on the approach of the former Edward, now appeared boldly in the plain, fell upon the county of Galloway, and reduced it to his obedience. The earl of Britany was sent, at the head of a powerful army, to stop the career of the Scots; and Bruce perceiving that it would be in vain to contend with a force so far superior to his own, once more retired to the mountains and morasses of that country.

A.D. 1308. Edward, after passing over to the continent, and consummating his marriage with Isabella, daughter of Philip the Fair, was crowned, with his new queen, at Westminster, on the twenty-fifth of February. But a difficulty arose, previous to the performance of the ceremony, which greatly alarmed the monarch. The barons, exasperated at the insolence of Gaveston, who affected to treat them with the most mortifying contempt, refused to assist at the coronation, unless Gaveston was banished the kingdom. Edward promised to redress all their grievances, provided they would not force him to delay the ceremony; and the barons, in return, agreed to suspend their resentment. But Gaveston was so far from profiting by these national marks of disgust to his person and conduct, that he appeared, with the most fastidious pomp, in the procession, in which he carried the crown of St. Edward before the king. One of the barons was so highly provoked at his assuming behaviour, that he was, with some difficulty, prevented from sacrificing the insulting favourite to his resentment.

A party was now formed against the insolent Gaveston, at the head of which was Thomas earl of Lancaster, cousin-german to the king, and once the most opulent and powerful subject in England. The confederated barons bound themselves, by a solemn oath, never to desert each other till the detested favourite was banished the kingdom. Favoured by the opposition of the nobility, the people paid no longer any submission to the laws: robberies, murders, and other alarming disorders, the constant preludes to civil war, were committed in every part of the kingdom. Gaveston still despised the threatening storm, and even treated the young queen with contempt.

A parliament was now called to remove these disorders, and restore the domestic tranquillity of the kingdom. The barons, determined not to miss so favourable an opportunity of effectually humbling the favourite, came to Westminster attended by a numerous armed retinue, required the banishment of Gaveston, and prevailed upon the bishops to threaten him with excommunication. Edward found it would be madness to resist, and therefore complied with their demands; but instead of sending him out of the English dominions, as the barons expected, he appointed him lord lieutenant of Ireland, and accompanied him as far as Bristol when he set out for his new government.

A.D. 1309. Edward, deprived of the company of Gaveston, carested his nobles, and soon removed the bad impression made on their minds by the insolent behaviour of the favourite: they even consented to his being recalled, and all resentment seemed to be buried in the grave of forgetfulness. But Gaveston learnt not wisdom from experience: he forgot his former misfortunes, and resumed, on his return, the same insolence and ostentation which had before procured his exile. The barons were now more provoked than ever; they determined to put it out of the power of the king himself to protect so hated a minion. They again came to parliament, attended by an army of their retainers, and compelled the king to surrender his authority into the hands of twelve persons, whose ordinances were to have the force of statutes.

A.D. 1311. This junto governed the kingdom twelve months, and then produced a set of ordinances, which the king confirmed with the same facility he granted this unlimited commission to the barons. By these ordinances it was enacted, that the church should enjoy her privileges; that the peace of the kingdom should be kept; that the two charters should be observed; that the customs should be collected by natives, and paid into the exchequer, whence the money should be issued by the treasurer and chamberlains for the maintenance of the household, that the king might be supported by his own revenue, without being obliged to oppress the subject; that Emery Frenobalde, and his partners, by whom the customs had hitherto been farmed, should account for their receipts within a fortnight after Michaelmas, on pain of being arrested, stripped of their effects, and treated as public enemies. That no prizes should be taken by the king's officers without the owner's consent. That the duty of three shillings on every tun of wine should be no longer collected. That the jurisdiction of the steward and marshal of the king's court should be limited to causes respecting the officers of the household, and such as resided within the verge of the court. That it should be deemed felony for any person to take corn, goods, or merchandize, under a false pretence of purveyance for the king. That sheriffs should be appointed by the chancellor, treasurer, king's council, barons of the exchequer, and justices of the king's bench; and that none should be entrusted with the office but such as had lands of sufficient value to answer for their actions. That parliaments should be held once a year. That the coin of the kingdom should not be altered, but for very cogent reasons, and by consent of the baronage. That all persons prosecuted unjustly, and acquitted, should be entitled to damages. That none should be appealed maliciously, or outlawed in counties where they had no lands or tenements. That they should neither forfeit their estates, nor lose their lives, provided they surrendered themselves to the king's prison to stand trial. That pardons for robbery, and other felonies, should not be granted without good reason, but deemed void, unless agreeable to the king's oath, the course of law, and the custom of the kingdom. That all privy-seals for stopping law, or common right, on false pretences of being in the service of the crown, should be declared void, and the plaintiff recover damages on the discovery of the deceit. That the jurisdiction of the court of exchequer should be confined to such pleas as concerned the crown, the officers of the exchequer, and their menial servants. That acquittances should be given for debts paid, and accounts passed in the exchequer; or, if denied, the plaintiff should have redress in parliament. That all grants of lands, castles, towns, offices, wards, and escheats, in any part of the king's dominions, made since the sixteenth of May in the preceding year, should be resumed by the crown, and not renewed renewed to the same persons, without the advice of the barons, or consent of the parliament; and that all grants which should be made before the king's debts were paid, and his revenues improved, should be deemed null and void; and the procurers of such be punished by the award of the baronage. That all evil counsellors should be removed from the king's person, particularly Henry de Beaumont, and his sister the lady Vesey, who had obtained grants from the king dishonourable to the dignity, and prejudicial to the prerogatives of the crown. That whereas Piers Gaveston had given evil counsel to his majesty, removed all persons of integrity and abilities from the public offices; and supplied their places with his own weak and worthless creatures, embezzled the king's treasure, impoverished the realm; by obtaining unreasonable grants, and procuring blank charters, which he filled up according to his own pleasure; protected robbers, arrogated to himself the royal power and dignity, and formed associations inconsistent with the laws of the land; he should, for these misdemeanors, abjure the kingdom for ever before the first of November; and if found in any part of his majesty's dominions after that day, should be treated as a public enemy. That the king should not leave the realm, nor declare war against any prince or potentate, without the consent of the barons. That on his quitting the kingdom with their consent, a guardian of the realm should be appointed by the parliament, who should also nominate the chief officers of the state, of the household, of the revenue, and of justice; as well as the keepers of forests, the escheators on both sides the Trent, and, in a word, all persons employed under the crown in any part of his majesty's dominions. That all persons in office should take an oath to observe these ordinances; and that one bishop, two earls, and as many barons, should be chosen in every parliament, to receive complaints against the king's ministers, and others who should violate these ordinances, and to punish offenders at discretion.

Several of the above ordinances were truly laudable, and tended to the regular dispensation of justice, and the protection of the weak against the powerful; but others wholly deprived the king of his prerogative, and rendered him a mere cypher in government. Edward knew this; and therefore, when he signed them, he secretly determined to observe them no longer than he had an opportunity of declaring them void, and of no effect. For as the commission was granted solely for the purpose of making such ordinances as should be advantageous both to the king and his people, such articles as should be found prejudicial to either, could not be considered as ratified and confirmed. The parliament was therefore no sooner dissolved, than the king repaired to York, where he published a proclamation, repealing the article relative to the exile of Piers Gaveston, "as being unjust, and contrary to the oath taken by the king at his coronation."

A. D. 1312. Gaveston immediately obeyed the royal mandate, and was reinstated in all his former credit and authority. Exasperated at this conduct of the king, and dreading the resentment of the powerful minion, the barons flew to arms, and besieged Gaveston in Scarborough castle. The king exerted all his power in raising an army for the relief of his favourite; but his attempts were in vain; the people refused to join his standard. While the king was thus employed in endeavouring to raise a body of forces, Gaveston, sensible of the bad condition of his garrison, and the want of provisions, was obliged to capitulate; by which it was agreed, that he should surrender himself a prisoner for two months, during which time means should be used for bringing about an accommodation; but if the terms proposed by the barons should not be accepted, the castle should be restored to him in the same condition as when he surrendered it. Pembroke, who had conducted the siege of the castle, being now master of the favourite's person, conducted him to the castle of Dedington, near Banbury, where he left him, probably by consent of the others, with a feeble guard; under pretence of pressing business. But before he returned Gaveston was carried off by the earl of Warwick, who, together with the earls of Lancaster, Arundel, and Hereford, in violation of their engagements, and contrary to all laws human and divine, caused him to be beheaded by the hands of an executioner.

Edward was transported with rage when he was informed of the death of his favourite. He threatened to take the severest vengeance, and even to exterminate his whole nobility who were concerned in that detestable action. But he soon found that his threatenings were in vain. The more reasonable part of the nation could not indeed behold this bloody tragedy without horror, and dread the consequence of a reformation begun with murder and perjury; yet they did not think it advisable to plunge the nation into all the horrors of a civil war, and depopulate the kingdom to revenge a breach of the laws of humanity. Nor was Edward himself inexorable in his resentments: he soon listened to the terms of accommodation. It was stipulated, that the barons should ask him pardon publicly on their knees, and he was so pleased with these vain appearances of exterior submission, that he readily forgave them all their past offences.

A. D. 1314. The death of Gaveston having thus restored tranquillity between the king and his barons, it was now determined to send a powerful force against the Scots, who taking advantage of the troubles in England, had made inroads into the northern counties, and committed the most dreadful ravages. The whole military force of the kingdom was assembled; and Edward put himself at the head of a powerful army, which, according to the Scottish writers, amounted to an hundred thousand men. Bruce, whose army was inferior in numbers, endeavoured to supply by art, what he wanted in strength. Persuaded that this important contest was to decide the fate of his kingdom, he chose the field of battle with the utmost prudence, and made the necessary preparations for receiving the English. He posted himself at Bannock-burn, about two miles from Sterling; having a hill on his right flank, and a morass on his left. In the front of his camp ran a small rivulet, the banks of which, as well as the bed of the stream, he filled with sharp stakes; and caused deep pits to be dug a little beyond the opposite bank, into which sharp stakes were also planted, and the whole covered over with turf. The van of the English army reached the neighbourhood of the Scottish camp in the evening of the twenty-fourth of June, and a smart skirmish ensued between two parties of cavalry. The English were led by Henry de Bohun, a younger brother of the earl of Hereford, and the Scots by Bruce in person. The contest was very bloody; but was at last decided in favour of the Scots, by the valour of Bruce, who rode up to Bohun, and cleft his head with a battle-axe, in sight of both armies. The English, on the loss of their leader, retreated to the army; but had not night put a stop to the reinforcements which were marching to the relief of each party, the action had then become general.

As soon as the morning appeared, the English troops prepared for the dreadful conflict. The wings, composed of cavalry, were commanded by the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, and the king himself led the centre or main body. Bruce drew up his forces, consisting chiefly of foot, in three lines, and a body of reserve. The centre was commanded by himself, the right wing by his brother Edward, the left by Randolph, and the body of reserve by Sir James Douglas.

Just as the charge was going to be sounded, a dispute happened between the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, with regard to making the first attack upon the the enemy. The first claimed it by custom, as having always been enjoyed by his ancestors; and the latter as constable of England. The earl of Gloucester determined not to submit to his opponent, broke the rank, and impelled by all the ardour of youth, rushed on to the attack, and fell among the covered pits, by which means his whole squadron was thrown into confusion, and he himself perished. This imprudent folly of youth proved fatal to the English army. Several of the covered pits had been discovered during the skirmish in the evening; and the king, in order to prevent a similar misfortune, gave orders for a body of infantry to take a circuit round the morafs, and attack the main body of the Scottish army in flank; and during the confusion of that unexpected attack, the cavalry were to have forced the passage of the rivulet, and fallen sword in hand on the embarrassed enemy.

The fate of Gloucester was hardly determined, when the body of infantry having made the prescribed circuit, fell with the utmost fury on the wing commanded by Randolph, and galled them so severely with repeated showers of arrows, that they were thrown into disorder. Sir James Douglas perceived the confusion, and fell suddenly upon the rear of the English with such impetuosity, that they were routed with great slaughter. The main body of the English, however, marched up with great resolution to attack the enemy; when they observed on the heights towards their left, the appearance of another army marching leisurely to surround them. This formidable appearance was nothing more than a number of waggoners and sumpter boys, whom Bruce had supplied with military standards, which at a distance gave them the appearance of a numerous body of forces. The English were struck with a panic; they fled with the utmost precipitation, and Bruce obtained a complete victory. The booty acquired by the Scots was prodigious; besides which they took several persons of distinction prisoners, who paid largely for their ransom. Edward himself had scarce time to reach Dunbar castle, before Sir James Douglas appeared at the head of four hundred horse, hoping to intercept Edward if he attempted to escape to Berwick by land; but the king eluded his vigilance by passing to that town in a small vessel.

By this victory the independence of Scotland was secured, and Robert Bruce firmly seated on the throne of his ancestors. That intrepid general distinguished himself as much after the victory by his humanity and generosity, as he had done in the battle by his bravery and prudence. He treated all his prisoners with the greatest tenderness; he sent the bodies of the earl of Gloucester and lord Clifford to the English monarch at Berwick; he dismissed lord Monthermer, for whom he had a particular friendship, without ransom; he exchanged the earl of Hereford and other noblemen, for his wife, his daughter and sister, the earl of Mar and the bishop of Glasgow, who had remained prisoners in England ever since the battle of Methven; and he caused the dead bodies left on the field of battle to be decently interred.

A.D. 1315. Notwithstanding this alarming misfortune, which called for the united force of the whole kingdom to recover the loss sustained at Bannock-burn, the barons, who seemed regardless of the honour of their country, were not in the least affected, they even founded the hopes of their own future grandeur on the weakness and distresses of the crown. They no sooner saw the king return with disgrace, than they insisted on a renewal of their ordinances, and Lancaster was placed at the head of the ministry. Edward perceived his danger, and sensible of his own incapacity for holding the reins of government, attached himself to a new favourite. This was Hugh le Despenser, or Spencer, a young man of high rank, descended from a noble family, and an Englishman by birth. He possessed all the exterior accomplishments of person and address, necessary to engage the affections of Edward; but wanted that prudence and moderation which alone could have supported him in this dangerous pre-eminence, surrounded by such numbers of powerful enemies. Had the opposition of the barons, however, been founded on virtue, and directed only to support the honour of their country, these defects would have been considered as abundantly supplied by the talents and experience of the father of this new favourite, and who had also acquired a considerable share in the administration. He was a nobleman venerable for his age, and during his whole life had been respected for his wisdom, his valour and his intrepidity. But envy now obscured all his merits; his past services were forgotten; and he was, together with his son, devoted to destruction by the turbulent barons. They first indicated their displeasure by absenting themselves from parliament; but this not producing the desired effect, they determined to have recourse to more powerful methods for completing their designs.

It was not long before an opportunity offered which gave them a pretence for attacking the ministers. Edward, who had set no bounds to his bounty with regard to his favourites, had not only married the younger Spencer to his niece, one of the co-heiresses of the earl of Gloucester, slain at the fatal battle of Bannock-burn, but also given him a barony, which it was pretended had reverted to the crown. This transaction, which could be considered as nothing more than a proper subject for a law-suit, caused an insurrection in the kingdom. Lancaster, and several other barons, flew to arms, and peremptorily demanded the banishment of the two Spencers. The king refused to comply; upon which they marched to London, and presented to the parliament an accusation against the favourites. All resistance was in vain: the two Spencers were condemned to banishment without a single crime being proved against them. They, however, submitted to their sentence, and all disturbances seemed happily to subside.

A.D. 1321. Possibly Edward, in his circumstances, might have submitted to this encroachment made upon his prerogative, had not a fresh insult roused him from his indolence. The queen, having occasion to pass by the castle of Leeds in Kent, belonging to lord Badlesmere, one of the confederated barons, dispatched some of her servants to desire a night's lodging in the castle; the request was not only denied, but they were even refused admittance, and some of them killed. This outrageous behaviour to a princess who had joined the barons against the younger Spencer, was resented by all parties, and the king, levying an army, made himself master of the castle, and put the governor and several of the garrison to death. This seasonable act of justice was approved even by the turbulent barons themselves, and Edward, who saw the consequences of provoking that ferocious body, was determined to attempt the recovery of his prerogative. He ventured to recall the two Spencers, whose sentence he declared to be illegal and unjust, as being passed without the consent of the prelates, and extorted by violence from him and the barons assembled in parliament. He added, "That he was bound by the great charter to receive the petitions of the Spencers, because he was obliged not to deny justice to any man."

A.D. 1322. But neither reason nor the voice of humanity itself, had any force with the associated barons; they continued in arms, but their forces were not sufficient to meet those of the king in the open field. In this distressful situation, they had recourse to the Scottish monarch, with whom they concluded a treaty, promising to recognize his title to the crown of Scotland; and that prince in return, stipulated to assist them with a body of forces. Encouraged by the hopes of a powerful assistance, and joined by the earl of Hereford at the head of his retainers, Lancaster posted himself at Burton upon Trent, in order to defend the passage of the river. But he wanted intrepidity in the day of battle; he was intimidated at the approach of the royal army, and retreated towards towards Borough bridge, in order, if possible, to reach the borders of Scotland. Unfortunately for Lancaster, Sir Andrew Harcla, governor of Carlisle, suspecting his design, posted himself, at the head of a body of troops, to oppose his passage over the Eure, so that Lancaster found himself reduced to the wretched alternative of venturing an engagement, or surrender himself a prisoner to Harcla. He chose the former: but the earl of Hereford being slain in the first attack, the barons troops fled with great precipitation, and Lancaster was taken prisoner. Harcla conducted the earl to the king at Pomfret, where he was tried by a court martial, and condemned to death. Lancaster now experienced the same indignities which had before been practised upon Gaveston. He was dressed in mean apparel, placed upon a lean horse without a bridle, and a hood put upon his head. In this ignominious manner he was conducted to an eminence in the neighbourhood of Pomfret, amidst the scoffs of the rabble, and there beheaded. Thus fell Thomas earl of Lancaster, a prince of the blood, and one of the most powerful barons ever known in England; but whose turbulent temper hurried him into measures destructive at once of the peace of society, and the honour of his country. He sacrificed all the rules of justice and humanity to his revenge, and fell himself a victim at the altar of his own ambition.

But the sanguinary inquisition did not end with the death of Lancaster; about twenty other barons were afterwards tried and executed. Many made their escape into France, and others were thrown into prison. Opposition seemed to lie gasping at the feet of Edward. Harcla was rewarded for his services with a large estate and the earldom of Carlisle; but he did not long enjoy the royal bounty. He entered into a treasonable correspondence with the king of Scotland, and paid the forfeit of his life as an atonement for his folly.

The younger Spencer profitted not by former experience. Elated with success, and giddy with power, he inflamed still farther the hatred of the public against him, by new acts of violence. Fresh complaints were every day presented against his conduct, and the king, despairing of making a successful campaign against Scotland, while the nation was divided, concluded a truce with Robert for thirteen years; and the Scottish monarch, though his title to the crown was not acknowledged in the treaty, was satisfied with ensuring himself a quiet possession of it during so considerable a period.

A. D. 1325. But Edward did not long enjoy his triumph over the turbulent barons: calamities of a more violent kind now threatened the destruction of the English monarch. Charles the Fair, the third son, and the third successor of Philip the Fair, summoned Edward to do him homage for his province of Guienne. Spencer, who saw all the consequences that might attend his own authority during the king's absence, would not consent to his leaving the kingdom. The parliament was consulted, and it was the unanimous opinion of the whole assembly, that it was improper for the king to go abroad in person, but that ambassadors should be sent to the court of France, requesting that the homage might be delayed till a more convenient opportunity. Charles refused to postpone the ceremony, and sent a body of forces to attack Guienne. It was now thought proper to send the queen Isabella to her brother's court, in order, if possible, to bring about an accommodation; but all her attempts were in vain; Charles insisted on the homage being performed immediately by the king in person.

In this critical situation of affairs, the fertile imagination of Isabella, furnished her with an expedient for removing all difficulties, and putting it in her power to be revenged on the younger Spencer, whom she detested. She proposed that the king should resign the sovereignty of Guienne to his son, and that the prince should be sent to Paris to perform the duties of a vassal. This proposal concealed a snare which the English council never expected. Edward and Spencer were charmed with the contrivance, and the young prince soon after arrived at Paris. Isabella had now gained her principal point, and determined to make use of her good fortune, by procuring the destruction of her enemies.

Edward and his favourite were soon convinced of the egregious blunder they had committed, in trusting the person of the heir apparent to the crown in the hands of an ambitious woman. The queen, on her arrival in France, had found a great number of fugitives, the remains of the Lancastrian party; and their common hatred of Spencer soon cemented a secret friendship between them. Among the rest was Roger Mortimer, a powerful baron in the Welsh marches, and one of the leaders of the late rebellion. This young nobleman soon insinuated himself into her affections, and she sacrificed to a vicious passion all the sentiments of honour and fidelity she owed to her husband. It was in vain that Edward ordered her to return; she declared her resolution of continuing in France till the Spencers were banished England with infamy and disgrace.

A. D. 1326. Edward tried every gentle method to bring her to a sense of her duty, but in vain; she remained deaf to the lenient voice of intreaty. Recourse was therefore had to the pope, who readily engaged in the cause of the injured Edward. He wrote a very pressing letter to the king of France, insisting, even on the pain of excommunication, that the queen of England should be sent back to her husband. Charles was so affected by this menace of the pontiff, and much more by the shameful commerce carried on between Mortimer and his sister, that he determined to support her no longer. He accordingly shewed her the pope's letter, and desired that she would quit his dominions immediately.

Isabella had provided against this event, which she had for some time expected. She had affianced her son, the prince of Wales, to the daughter of William, count of Hainault and Holland; who, in return, promised her an asylum in his dominions, and to assist her with a body of troops to humble her enemies. She therefore retired directly into Hainault, where she was received with the greatest marks of kindness and respect. Every method was now used for raising an army to attend the queen and the young prince to England; and about three thousand men at arms were collected for this expedition, under the command of John de Hainault, the count's brother. But Isabella did not found her hopes of success on the number and valour of her troops in the intended invasion of her husband's dominions, but in the connections she had formed with the discontented nobles. All the old Lancastrian faction were ready to join her; and the families of about twenty of the nobility, who had suffered with the late earl of Lancaster, were the more zealous in their attachment, as they hoped, in consequence of her success, to be restored to the estates which had been forfeited in consequence of the rebellion of their relation. Besides these, others had joined the queen's party. The king's brothers, the archbishop of Canterbury, with other prelates, and several of the most powerful barons, approved her measures; so that nothing was wanting but the appearance of the queen and the prince, with such a body of foreign forces as was sufficient to protect them against immediate violence, to turn the whole force of the tempest against the unfortunate Edward.

The queen having collected her forces at Dorset, embarked with her son, and landed in Suffolk on the twenty-fourth of September. She was immediately joined by the princes of the blood, and other factious nobles. But to give her hostile appearance a still more favourable aspect, she renewed her declaration, that the sole motive of her enterprise was to deliver the nation from the tyranny of the Spencers, and of chancellor Baldock, their creature. This proclamation had the desired effect: the ardour of the English to join the standard of the queen was amazing; even Robert de Watteville, who had been sent by the king to oppose her progress in Suffolk, deserted to her with all his forces.

Edward now saw the consequences of his folly in parting with the young prince, whose presence secured the barons against forfeitures. The king was still at London, and applied to the citizens for assistance against the invaders of his kingdom; but he soon perceived that no reliance could be placed on their loyalty; they were also poisoned with the leaven of rebellion. Edward therefore set out for the western parts of England, hoping that his subjects in that corner of the kingdom would commiserate majesty in distress, and support their king against the unnatural rebellion of an implacable woman. But he was deceived; they flocked not to his standard; and that unfortunate prince formed a resolution of passing over into Ireland, leaving the elder Spencer to command in the castle of Bristol.

Edward had hardly left London, before the populace committed the most dreadful disorders. They plundered the houses, and murdered the persons of all who were obnoxious to them. Even the acknowledged virtues of the bishop of Exeter could not protect him from their rage. He was dragged, like a felon, to the great cross in Cheapside, where his head was severed from his body. The other cities followed the example of the capital; and taking advantage of the national confusion, committed every species of outrage with wantonness and impunity.

The earl of Kent, assisted by John de Hainault, at the head of his foreign mercenaries, pursued the king to Bristol, and invested the castle, where the elder Spencer had shut himself up, and would have defended the fortress to the last extremity, had not his garrison been infected with the disloyalty of the times; but they mutinied against their commander, and delivered him up to the enemy. No respect was paid to this venerable nobleman, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year. All his former services, as well as his virtues, were forgotten; and though they could alledge nothing against him but his loyalty to his master, he was condemned to death by the rebellious barons, and hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor. So dreadful is the passion of revenge in the breasts of a ferocious nobility; the common dictates of humanity, as well as the laws, both human and divine, are sacrificed at its altar!

The king, pursuant to his resolution, had embarked for Ireland; but being driven back by contrary winds, he endeavoured to conceal himself among the mountains of Wales. Isabella was alarmed when she heard her husband was still in his own dominions. She feared that the distresses of their sovereign might turn the tide of popular favour against her party; and it was determined to seize the royal person. The difficulty of discovering his retreat was soon removed, by bribing the Welsh; and the king was taken at Caerfilly, in Glamorganshire, with the younger Spencer, Baldock the chancellor, and a few domestics; all the rest of his courtiers having deserted him in his misfortunes. The king was committed to the care of the earl of Lancaster, and confined in Kenilworth castle. The younger Spencer, without any form of trial, was executed, with the most shocking circumstances of barbarity and insult. Baldock, the chancellor, being a priest, could not, with safety, be so suddenly and so illegally dispatched. He was conducted to London, where he was assaulted by the populace, who used him with the utmost cruelty, and threw him into Newgate, where he soon after expired.

A.D. 1327. But the measure of Isabella's wickedness was not yet full. It was not sufficient to have seized the person of the king; it was also necessary that he should resign his sceptre, and even that his life should fall a sacrifice to her safety. She made no scruple of convoking, in the name of her husband, a parliament, who were to dethrone him. A charge was accordingly exhibited against him; in which, though it was drawn by his most inveterate enemies, nothing but his confined genius or his misfortunes were objected to him; malice itself not being able to find any particular crime that could be objected against him. But this was of little weight in an assembly convoked for his destruction. The spirit of faction had annihilated justice. The parliament deposed the king with the same facility they would have banished a simple individual. Certain commissioners were immediately named for carrying to Edward the resolution of the parliament with regard to his deposition. This deputation consisted of three bishops, three earls, two abbots, and two knights for each county, together with Sir William Trussel, one of the judges, who was nominated the nation's particular procurator. They were instructed to use every argument in their power to prevail upon Edward to make a voluntary resignation of that power with which they were determined to trust him no longer.

The bishops of Hereford and Lincoln, two of his most inveterate enemies, were sent to converse with him before the deputies arrived, in order to prepare him for the approaching change of his condition. Edward was sufficiently convinced that his fate was determined when these two prelates appeared; and the manner in which they discharged their commission was perfectly similar to the rest of their conduct. Instead of pouring the balm of consolation into the breast of wounded royalty, they aggravated the pungent smart by a thousand malicious insinuations: and when they perceived Edward made the least struggle to maintain his dignity, by refusing to confer with the deputies; they told him, "that if he continued obstinate in refusing to resign, the parliament would involve his whole family in his guilt, exclude all his children from the succession, and place another person on the throne of his ancestors." This menace awakened all the fondness of a father in the soul of the unfortunate Edward: he paused; he dropped a tear to the remembrance of his fallen state; consented to admit the deputies to an audience, and retired to his chamber. As soon as he had recollected his spirits, he entered the chamber of audience dressed in a mourning habit; but after the articles of impeachment against him were read, and the commissioners had demanded his immediate resignation, he was unable to stand the shock; his spirits forsook him, and he had fallen to the ground, had not the bishop of Lincoln supported him in this dreadful moment of conflicting passions. As soon as he recovered, he proceeded to the ceremony of resignation, by delivering, with his own hands, to the commissioners, the crown, sceptre, and other ensigns of royalty, which had been brought thither for that purpose. And Sir William Trussel renounced, in the name of the parliament and people, all future allegiance and fealty.

The melancholy ceremony being finished, the commissioners returned to London, and young Edward was placed on his father's throne. But it was impossible to prevent these atrocious acts of violence from opening the eyes of a deluded people. The cruelty, the perfidy, and the infidelity of the queen, joined to her impudent hypocrisy, in publicly bewailing, with tears, the misfortunes of the king, who owed them all to her execrable conduct, could not fail of exciting the indignation of the English. Her infamous commerce with Mortimer increased the public odium, and she was looked upon with detestation by every friend to truth, to virtue, to fidelity. The current of popular favour was now changed; the queen was regarded with horror, while the fate of the unfortunate Edward was deplored. A scene of majesty in distress attracted the pity, the compassion, the tears of the people. The earl of Lancaster himself was touched with these generous sentiments:

ments: he treated his prisoner with the greatest kindness and respect; he is even said to have entertained more honourable intentions in his favour.

Isabella and Mortimer were alarmed; they well knew the consequence, if Edward should again be placed in the seat of power; and determined to add the guilt of murder to their long catalogue of crimes. The king was accordingly taken out of the hands of Lancaster, and delivered over to lord Berkley, and Mautravers and Gournay. Berkley himself behaved with great kindness to the royal captive; but the two others treated him with the utmost cruelty and insolence, though the goodness of Edward's constitution supported him under all these afflictions, till orders arrived from the queen and Mortimer to finish the inhuman tragedy. But even his death was to be attended with cruelty. These detested monsters in the human shape, threw the imprisoned monarch on his bed, held him down violently with a table, which they threw upon him; and thrust into his fundament a red-hot iron, inserting it through a horn, in order to prevent any external marks of violence upon his person. But the guards and servants were sufficiently apprized of the horrid deed; by the screams with which the king, in such unutterable agonies, filled the castle. These proclaimed to the world the infernal orders of an adulterous woman, and a perfidious nobleman. They cried to heaven for vengeance, nor did they long cry in vain.

Thus perished, by the hands of inhuman assassins, Edward II. a prince of the mildest disposition, though he experienced the fate of a tyrant. He was totally incapable of government in those ferocious times. The sceptre was too weighty for his feeble arm. He might, indeed, have reigned in tranquillity, had he placed his favours on deserving objects; and if the exorbitant power of the barons, in that age, would have submitted to the authority of a minister. But the nobles, whose turbulent disposition the great abilities of his father were scarce sufficient to restrain, overturned the constitution when the reins of government were held by a more feeble hand. They dreaded the valour and firmness of the one, and despised the slender abilities of the other. The laws wanted power to restrain the violences of the great, and the voice of justice was stifled amidst the din of arms. The king was accused of crimes committed by his enemies; and all the dreadful scenes of devastation, the natural consequences of civil discord, though they owed their rise to the turbulent ambition of his barons, were imputed to him. The people considered their monarch as the source of those misfortunes which flowed from the brutal manners of the great. His most inveterate enemies have not accused him of any crime; and perhaps it will be difficult to find, in the annals of history, a prince more innocent, or more inoffensive than Edward II. But the feudal constitution required a person of strength, of firmness, of valour, to hold the reins of government. Edward was destitute of these abilities; and fell a victim to vice and licentiousness in the forty-third year of his age, and the twentieth of his reign.

The king left four children, two sons and two daughters. Edward, his eldest son, who succeeded him in the throne; John, afterwards created earl of Cornwall, and died very young at Perth: Jane, afterwards married to Edward Bruce, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Reginald, count of Gueldres.

During this reign, the order of the Knights Templars was dissolved, by the barbarous injustice of Clement V. instigated by the cruel and vindictive spirit of Philip the Fair. This order owed its rise to the first fervour of the crusades; and by uniting valour with devotion, the two most popular qualities of that age, and employing both in the defence of the Holy Land, they soon made rapid advances to credit and authority. Hence they also acquired, from the piety of the faithful, very ample possessions in every country of Europe, especially in France.

But time having relaxed the severity of their original virtues, and convinced them of the inefficacy of those expeditions to the East, which had so long depopulated Europe, they chose rather to enjoy in their native countries those opulent estates, than expose themselves to incessant dangers against the infidels in the Holy Land. By this change of conduct they lost their popularity; while their riches tempted the avidity of several of the monarchs of Europe. But though they were no longer beheld with reverence by the people, they still maintained a considerable part of their former credit; the vindictive spirit of Philip the Fair alone proved the source of their destruction. They were accused, by two profligate and imprisoned knights of their own order, of crimes so repugnant to reason and policy, that their being mentioned was abundantly sufficient to destroy the credit of the witnesses. But Philip was implacable. All the Templars in France were seized and committed to prison in one day; above an hundred of them were put to the most cruel tortures; and fifty-nine burnt together near the abbey of St. Antoine, in Paris. Even the grand master of the order, John de Molay, and Guy, brother to the sovereign of Dauphiné, two of the principal noblemen in Europe, the one by his dignity, and the other by his birth, were committed alive to the flames before the church of Notre-dame. Clement V. one of Philip's creatures, and who then resided at Poitiers, abolished the whole order; by the plenitude of his apostolic power. Their conduct underwent the strictest scrutiny in several parts of Europe, but not the least trace of the crimes imputed to them by Philip was even pretended to be discovered. A very ample testimony of their piety and morals was sent to the pope by the English.

The Arts and Sciences made but a small progress in England during this period. But it often happens, that in the darkest nights of ignorance and error, some bright star of uncommon lustre darts the beams of genius amidst the dreadful gloom, and illuminates, for a season, some parts of the dull obscurity. Roger Bacon was a genius of this kind, and born for the instruction of the human species; but the age in which he lived knew not his merit. He was a Franciscan friar at Oxford, and styled Doctor Mirabilis for his great learning; but much more for his inventions, the genuine characteristic of genius. He discovered the telescope, burning-glass, camera obscura, gun-powder, the transmutation of metals, and several other particulars known only to himself. Future times, and future artists, have claimed the discoveries made by Bacon. A greater genius in mechanics had not then arose since the days of Archimedes. But all his merit could not protect him against the barbarous opinions of the age in which he lived. He was persecuted by an enthusiastic clergy, at a time when philosophy had made a less progress than any other branch of learning; and geometry and astronomy were branded with the odious name of necromancy. He died on the eleventh of June, 1292.

In the year 1237, water was first conveyed into the city of London, by means of leaden pipes from springs in the manor of Tyburn; but the infant artists of that age were forty-eight years in completing that useful work; the great conduit in Cheapside, built of stone, and furnished with cisterns lined with lead, not being finished till the year 1285.

The noble discovery of the mariner's compass was made about the year 1302; but the person to whom we owe that invaluable acquisition is not certainly known; though one Flavio de Givia, a native of Amalfi, in the kingdom of Naples, is said, by several, to have been the fortunate person. But though the English lay no claim to the discovery, they were the inventors of the box in which the magnetical needle is suspended, a contrivance by which it is always kept in an horizontal position.

When it is considered that all Europe was now involved involved in a night of superstitious ignorance, we shall not be surprized that so few discoveries were made during this period. The sciences were absorbed in mysteries of theology, and learning chiefly confined to the clergy, who generally employed their talents in usefess, and often in ridiculous speculations. Some indeed studied physic, but in so strange and imperfect a manner, that every epidemical distemper which resisted their injudicious method of practice became a real plague, and swept away multitudes of people. The physicians were too ignorant and too positive to admit of any innovations in the practice of the healing art; they knew not the art of adapting medicines to the nature of the disease, and the constitution of the patient.

Among other wild and ridiculous notions, which prevailed in this age of bigotry and superstition, it was imagined, that the persons afflicted with the leprosy, a disease then very common, had conspired with the Saracens to poison all the springs and fountains in several countries. This chimerical notion, which evidently sprung from the source of ignorance, drew on those unhappy persons the utmost severity of justice. The physicians were too ignorant to convince the people of the injustice of so ridiculous an accusation.

From the deposition of Edward II. to the death of Henry IV.

E D W A R D III. furnamed of W I N D S O R.

A. D. 1327. EDWARD, though placed in the seat of power on the resignation of his father, was too young to hold the reins of government; a council of regency was appointed by the parliament for directing the administration of affairs during his minority. This council consisted of twelve persons; five prelates, the archbishops of Canterbury and York, the bishops of Winchester, Worcester, and Hereford; and seven lay peers, the earls of Norfolk, Kent, and Surry, and the lords Wake, Ingham, Piercy, and Rofs. The earl of Lancaster was appointed guardian and protector of the king's person. But it could not be expected that the dreadful disorders which had so long desolated the kingdom, would subside during the minority of young Edward; especially as the reins of government were held by a faithless, passionate, headstrong woman, totally governed by an ambitious and unexperienced minister, who, though he possessed even more power than the younger Spencer, had neither his abilities nor his interest.

Bruce, who considered the truce as terminated by the resignation of the elder Edward, took advantage of the unsettled state of the kingdom, and made an attempt upon the castle of Norham, but the governor, Sir Robert Manners, having received intelligence of the design, made so furious a sally on the Scottish forces, that they were put to flight with great slaughter, and obliged to retire with precipitation into their own country. Bruce was not, however, intimidated, he collected an army on the frontiers, consisting of twenty-five thousand men, under the command of the earl of Murray and lord Douglas, and threatened to invade the northern counties. The Scots had been long trained to the desultory practices of war. The noble equipage of their troops consisted of a bag of oatmeal, which, as a supply in cases of necessity, each foldier carried behind him, together with a light plate of iron, on which he instantly baked the oatmeal into a cake in the open fields. But his chief subsistence was the cattle he seized; and his cookery was as expeditious as his other operations. After slaying the animal, he placed the skin hanging loose in the form of a bag, on some stakes driven into the ground for that purpose; he poured a sufficient quantity of water into this bag, kindled a fire below, and thus made it serve as a cauldron to boil his victuals. Soldiers like these, wholly unincumbered, and who dislodged themselves in a moment, could ravage provinces with impunity; and to this particular they chiefly owed the success they met with in their invasions of the northern counties.

The English ministry were averse to a war with Scotland, but it would have been fatal to their power had they suffered such insults to escape with impunity. Young Edward earnestly desired to lead his troops against the enemy, and chastise their insolence. No objection was made to his making the campaign in person, and he marched to the northward at the head of sixty thousand men. After the utmost difficulty he found the enemy encamped on the declivity of a hill, at the foot of which was the river Were. But however desirous Edward was of coming to an engagement, he soon perceived that he could not attack the enemy in their present situation, without exposing his army to the utmost danger. Incensed at being so near the enemy without being able to bring them to an engagement, Edward sent them a defiance, and challenged them to meet him in the open field, and terminate their quarrel by a decisive battle. Douglas was highly exasperated at this defiance, and advised to accept the challenge sent by the king of England; but the motion was over-ruled by Murray, who told Edward, that he never listened to the counsel of an enemy in any of his operations. But Douglas, tho' he could not prevail on Murray to bring on a general engagement with the English, determined not to continue idle in his camp. He put himself at the head of two hundred horse, passed the river in the night, and entering the English camp unperceived, advanced as far as the royal tent, with a design to surprise and carry off the king. But the attempt was rendered abortive by some of Edward's servants, who awaking in the critical moment, made a noble resistance, and sacrificed their lives in his defence. The king himself cut his way through the Scots, who had entered his tent, and escaped. The English were now alarmed, the greater part of the Scots were slain; but Douglas himself, with a few followers, found means to retreat to his own army. Soon after the Scots decamped during the night, and marched with such expedition, that it would be in vain for Edward to hope he should be able to overtake them.

A. D. 1328. The bad success of this expedition fell violently upon the infamous Mortimer, who had usurped the whole authority of the government. The king himself was highly incensed, and was determined to free himself from the power of a minister who seemed regardless of national honour. Mortimer saw his danger, and thought it necessary, on any terms, to make a peace with the Scots. Accordingly he entered into a negotiation with Bruce, whom he acknowledged as king of Scotland, renounced the English claim of superiority, and was contented in return with stipulating the payment of thirty thousand marks. Though the queen and Mortimer had sufficient interest to procure a confirmation of this treaty by the parliament, yet it was no sooner made public, than it excited an universal clamour throughout the kingdom; the people expressed their resentment in the most poignant terms. They declared openly, that this peace was neither honourable nor necessary; that those who concluded it had basely sacrificed both the blood and treasure of the nation to private views; that the queen, who under pretence of her husband's incapacity, had usurped his authority, had now sufficiently discovered how unable she herself was to hold the reins of government; and that all the errors committed by the elder Edward during the whole course of his reign, were nothing in comparison to what she had done in the very beginning of her administration.

Mortimer perceived that his treaty with Bruce had rendered him very unpopular, and he began to dread the consequences, especially when he was informed, that the earls of Kent, Norfolk, and Lancaster, the archbishops of Canterbury, the bishops of London and Winchester, and several powerful barons, had determined to impeach him before the parliament. He knew the consequence if a majority in that assembly should favour the complainants, and exerted all his power to bring about a reconciliation. He succeeded; and it was agreed that all grievances should be redressed in the ensuing parliament. In the mean time a general pardon passed the great seal, for all who had joined in the late confederacy.

A. D. 1329. But though Mortimer had been obliged to temporize, he was determined to have his revenge, and to single out an object that might strike his enemies with terror. The weakness of the earl of Kent promoted his criminal intentions. He caused a report to be spread, that Edward the second was yet alive and confined in Corfe castle. The earl, who had always retained a sincere affection for that unfortunate brother, though he had joined the queen's party to drive the two Spencer's from the kingdom, immediately formed a design of replacing him on the throne. But the treacherous Mortimer had no sooner procured sufficient proofs of his design, than he caused him to be seized, and committed to prison.

A. D. 1330. The parliament was immediately assembled, and the slavish though turbulent barons, condemned him to lose his life and fortune. The queen and Mortimer, apprehensive of young Edward's lenity towards his uncle, hurried on the execution, and he was beheaded the day after his sentence was pronounced. But though the barons wanted virtue and fortitude to oppose the designs of an insolent minister, the earl was so beloved by the people, that when he was brought upon the scaffold, the common executioner refused to perform his office; nor could any one be found to supply his place, till the evening, when the sentence was executed by a felon from the Marshalsea, who, as a reward for his service, received a free pardon for all the robberies he had committed. But crimes like these could not long remain unpunished by a prince who knew how to reign.

This inhuman action filled up the measure of Mortimer's crimes, and rendered him universally odious. All parties, forgetting their former animosities, conspired the destruction of this insolent and perfidious minister. Edward himself, now in his eighteenth year, was desirous of taking into his own hands the reins of government, and bringing to exemplary punishment, a man who made no scruple of sacrificing the honour of his country, and the lives of the nobility to his insatiable thirst of power. But it was absolutely necessary to use the utmost precaution. Mortimer had so entirely engrossed the administration of affairs, that the whole power of the kingdom was at his devotion; he was always upon his guard, was continually attended by one hundred and eighty armed knights and their followers, and had even surrounded the throne itself with his emissaries, who acted as spies on the behaviour of the king and his friends. A prince of less fortitude than Edward would have been deterred by so many difficulties; but Edward was a stranger to fear. He imparted his design to William lord Montacute, and several other noblemen, who all promised their assistance, and it was determined to seize Mortimer during the session of parliament which was summoned to meet at Nottingham.

In order to this it was proposed that the king should occupy the castle of Nottingham, which would enable them to carry on their designs with more safety and success; but on their arrival they found the castle already filled with the attendants of Isabella and Mortimer, one or two apartments only being left for the king and a few of his attendants. It was now sufficiently evident, that it would be impossible to execute their design without the assistance of Sir William Eland, the governor of the castle. Lord Montacute was therefore sent to gain him over to their party, which was effected with great facility, that gentleman joyfully embracing an opportunity of shewing at once his affection for the person of his sovereign, and his detestation of those, who by their infamous conduct, had brought their country to the brink of destruction. But at the same time, he informed Montacute that it would be impracticable for him to admit any assistance by the common entry, the castle being strictly guarded, the gates locked every evening, and the keys carried to the queen. He, however, recollected, that there was a subterraneous passage formerly contrived as a secret outlet to the fortress, but at present concealed by a heap of rubbish. Through this cavern therefore he undertook to conduct the confederates to Mortimer's apartment. The attempt succeeded; Mortimer was seized in an apartment adjoining to that of the queen, without the least resistance, and sent directly under a strong guard to the tower of London.

A parliament was immediately summoned to meet at Westminster for the trial of this tyrannical minister, and a proclamation was issued for all persons who had any complaints to prefer against him, to appear before that assembly, in order to obtain redress for all their just grievances. Nor was justice long deferred. The first business that engaged the attention of the national assembly was the impeachment of the tyrannical Mortimer. The accusation was immediately drawn up, and consisted of nine articles, which contained many high crimes and misdemeanours. Among others, he was accused of having usurped the regal power from the council of regency appointed by the parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conspiracy to restore that prince; of having solicited and obtained exorbitant grants of the royal demesnes; of having dissipated the public treasure; of secreting for his own use twenty thousand marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of having repaired to the parliament with an armed force, disturbed their deliberations, and threatened several of the members with death. These facts were all notorious. It was thought unnecessary to call witnesses: and Mortimer was condemned to suffer as a traitor, without being suffered to make his defence. The sentence was executed on the twenty-ninth of November, at the Elms, about a mile from London, where this once powerful nobleman was hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor. The queen was confined to her house at Risings in the neighbourhood of London, and her revenue reduced to four thousand pounds a year. The king constantly visited her once or twice a year, during the remainder of her life; but she never recovered the least degree of power or authority in the state.

A. D. 1331. Edward now published a proclamation, informing his subjects, that he had taken into his own hands the reins of government. He could not have diffeminated a more pleasing article of intelligence. The people were rejoiced at seeing on the throne a prince, of whose abilities for government they had already formed the most pleasing idea; and the first acts of his public administration tended to convince them that their hopes were not founded on a chimerical basis. He resumed all the grants that had been made of the royal demesnes during his minority, and rewarded those who had assisted him in seizing the ambitious Mortimer. He remitted the fines and confiscations that had been awarded against the barons who had opposed the destructive measures of that minister. He reversed the sentence of attainder against the earl of Kent, restored his son to the family estate and honours, and his widow to the enjoyment of her jointure. All the sheriffs that had been appointed by Mortimer, he displaced; dispatched orders to all the judges to administer strict justice to all persons without delay, notwithstanding any letters that might have been procured from the crown to the contrary; and pursued every measure that appeared conducive to establish the public peace, and introduce a frugal management of the national treasure.

Besides the disorders that had crept into the administration of public affairs, there were others that equally required the abilities and firmness of Edward to remove. The kingdom was infested with numerous bands of robbers, who, taking advantage of the late commotions, had set the power of the magistrates at defiance, and exercised, with impunity, their lawless depredations. They were even openly protected by the great barons, who employed them against their enemies. It was therefore previously necessary to destroy this alarming connection before the evil could be removed. Accordingly Edward exacted a solemn promise from his barons, assembled in parliament, to break off all connections with such malefactors, as a disgrace to nobility. He issued a proclamation, forbidding all jousts and tournaments, which served as a plausible pretence for assembling great numbers of armed men, to the disturbance of the public tranquillity, and the terror of the peaceable inhabitants. After taking these necessary measures, he marched in person against the robbers; and by his courage and activity, the more powerful troops were broken and dispersed; many were taken and executed, and great numbers flew to the continent for safety. The ministers of justice followed the royal example; they were indefatigable in discovering and pursuing, and strict in punishing criminals. By these salutary methods, the disease was removed, and travellers passed from one part of the kingdom to the other in safety.

A. D. 1332. While Edward was thus employed in promoting the happiness of his people, an accident happened which excited his ambition. Robert Bruce, who had recovered by arms the independency of his country, and shewn himself so worthy of a throne, died soon after the conclusion of the last peace, and left his son David, a minor, under the guardianship of the earl of Murray. Among other particulars in the late treaty, it was stipulated, that both the Scottish nobility, who enjoyed lands in England before the commencement of the war; and the English, who enjoyed estates in Scotland, should be restored to their respective possessions. Edward had scrupulously performed his part of the treaty; but Robert had refused to follow the example of the English monarch. It would have been in vain to attempt any other method for redress but that of petition, while Robert swayed the Scottish sceptre; but the feeble state of the kingdom under a minority induced them to enter into an association for recovering their rights. Lord Beaumont was at the head of this confederacy. He claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland; and proposed, as the most effectual method of obtaining justice, to invite Edward Baliol, son to John Baliol, to make an attempt for recovering his father's crown.

Baliol, who, ever since the death of his father, had lived on his patrimonial estate in Normandy, little thought of reviving the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland; but the proposal was too flattering to be refused. Young Baliol engaged in the enterprise, and joined the discontented barons in England. Edward was now applied to for assistance; but the English monarch was too prudent to engage openly in the attempt, though he secretly encouraged the undertaking of Baliol, and blew the sparks of civil discord into a flame. Scotland was at this time in a very feeble condition. Murray, who had so often led the Scots to victory, had lately paid the debt of nature; and lord Douglas, disdaining a life of indolence and ease, had passed over into Spain, and perished in a battle against the Moors.

Baliol and the discontented nobles did not meet with any great success in raising forces, but determined to try the fortune of a battle. They embarked at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire, and in a few days reached the coast of Fife. On their approaching the shore, they perceived a body of the militia, commanded by Sir Alexander Seaton, drawn up on the beach to oppose their landing; but the English charged the Scottish general with such resolution, that he was totally defeated; and himself, with near a thousand of his soldiers, slain on the spot. No further opposition was made to their landing; and they advanced to Dunfermling, where they seized a magazine of arms and provisions. Here Baliol, in reviewing his little army, found they fell short of three thousand men.

Donald, earl of Marre, who had succeeded Murray in the regency, was greatly inferior to his predecessor; he wanted his prudence, his intrepidity, his resources. He, however, soon collected an army of near forty thousand men, and advanced to meet the enemy; but all his motions were desultory; and he observed no order in the encampment of his army.

Baliol, who wanted neither valour nor activity, advanced into the heart of the country, hoping to be joined by the old partisans of his family; but he was deceived. He came at the head of an English army, and that circumstance alone was sufficient to render him obnoxious to the Scots. In the midst of this disappointment, he was informed, that the earl of Marre was encamped at Gladsmuir, on the opposite side of the river Erne. Baliol was not intimidated: he passed the stream at Duplin, and falling unexpectedly on the Scottish forces during the night, threw them into confusion, and drove them from their camp with great slaughter.

The English flattered themselves that they had obtained a complete victory; but some of the chiefs ascending an eminence to survey the country, perceived the Scottish army, now recovered from their panic, advancing towards them in three divisions. The English flew to arms; and posting themselves in a narrow defile, resolutely waited the approach of the enemy. The Scots, exasperated at their late defeat by a handful of men, advanced to the attack with the utmost precipitation, without regarding some broken ground which lay between them and the English. But they were soon convinced of their folly; their ranks were disordered; and the second division pressing upon the first, threw the whole into confusion, so that they became an easy prey to the English. Above twelve thousand of the Scots fell in the engagement: and among them the flower of their nobility, particularly the regent himself, Robert Bruce, a natural son of the late king: the earls of Athole and Montith; and the lords Hay, Keith, and Lindiey. Not above thirty men fell on the side of the English.

Animated by these repeated successes, Baliol advanced to Perth, which he entered without opposition, and immediately repaired the fortifications.

This

This necessary work was hardly finished, before the earl of Marche, and Sir Archibald Douglas, at the head of an army of forty thousand men, appeared, and invested the place by land, determined to reduce the English by famine. They also collected a few vessels, under the command of one John Crabbe, a Flemish sailor, in order to block up the place by water. But the English Squadron, which were lying at the mouth of the Tay to supply Baliol's army with provisions, soon drove Crabbe from his station, and took the greater part of his ships. The Scottish generals now perceived that it would be in vain to continue the blockade of Perth; they abandoned the enterprize; the army dispersed; and the kingdom was, in effect, subdued by an handful of men.

The usual consequences attended the good fortune of Baliol: the nobility and gentry flocked to make their submission. The young king, and his queen, sister to the king of England, were sent into France; and Baliol was crowned king of Scotland at Scone, on the twenty-seventh of September.

A. D. 1333. He did not, however, long enjoy the crown he had so easily obtained; for having imprudently dismissed the greater part of his English followers, he was driven out of the kingdom, and obliged to seek protection in England. Before this revolution happened, Baliol had perceived, that it would be impossible for him to keep possession of the throne without the assistance of the English monarch. Accordingly he sent a message to Edward, offering to renew the homage for his crown, acknowledge his superiority, and to marry his sister, if a dispensation from the pope could be obtained, as her nuptials with David Bruce had never been consummated. Ambitious of gaining what he had lost by the treachery of Mortimer, Edward entered into a treaty with Baliol; but that prince being now driven from his throne, there was a necessity for replating him in the seat of power.

If any excuse was wanting for the English monarch to break the peace lately concluded with Robert Bruce, the Scots themselves furnished one sufficient to rouse a less ambitious prince than Edward. Elated with their late success against Baliol, and allured by the hopes of plunder, the Scots broke into Cumberland, and laid great part of the country waste with fire and sword. Edward immediately sent orders to Sir Anthony Lacy to begin hostilities against the enemy. His commands were obeyed with the utmost alacrity; the invaders were defeated, and obliged to return into their own country with great precipitation.

Douglas, the regent, was alarmed at this breach of the treaty, and spared neither intreaties, excuses, nor submissions, to divert the gathering storm, that threatened the destruction of his country. But all his efforts were in vain; Edward listened only to the voice of ambition. The campaign was opened with the siege of Berwick, where Edward commanded in person. That place was considered by the Scots as the key of their country; and the regent had accordingly furnished it with a strong garrison, under the command of Sir William Keith; while he himself formed a numerous army on the frontiers, in order to penetrate into England, as soon as that fortress was invested by Edward.

The siege continued near two months; when great part of the fortifications being demolished, the garrison agreed to capitulate, if not relieved in five days. The terms were accepted; and a messenger dispatched to Sir Archibald Douglas, the regent, informing him of the conditions, and pressing him to march immediately to their relief. The great importance of Berwick, and the impatience of his forces to be led against the English, determined him to comply with the request of the garrison. He marched immediately to their relief, and drew up his forces at the foot of Halidown-hill, a little to the north of Berwick, in sight of the English camp. His army was divided into four bodies, and headed by the principal nobility of Scotland.

The English were also drawn up in four separate bodies, and both wings flanked with archers; and in this disposition Edward waited the attack of the enemy, who began to ascend the hill, with great impetuosity, about five in the afternoon; but the steepness of the ascent, the weight of their armour, the incessant showers of arrows discharged from the bows of the English; and the large stones rolled down upon them, soon checked their career. They halted; and their general being that moment transfixt with an arrow, fell lifeless to the ground. The utmost consternation now seized the Scottish army. Edward perceived their disorder, and commanded lord D'Arcy, at the head of a body of light-armed infantry, to charge them in flank, while he himself attacked their front with a detachment of veterans. The Scottish knights, in order to render the action more steady and desperate, had dismounted from their horses, but could not stand the shock of the English. The whole army fled with the utmost precipitation. Near thirty thousand of the Scots fell in the action, and all the chief nobility were either slain or taken prisoners. The English lost only one knight, one esquire, and thirteen private soldiers. The town and castle of Berwick immediately surrendered; and no farther assistance being apprehended, Edward, after leaving a considerable part of his army with Baliol, returned into England.

It was now impossible for the Scots to oppose the power of Baliol: the principal part of their nobility were lost, their army was dissipated, their king in France, and their regent slain. Submission was their only resource. Baliol accordingly marched through the whole country; and all the castles, except those of Dumbarton, Urquhart, and two or three others, which were deemed impregnable, opened their gates at the first summons.

A. D. 1334. A parliament was now summoned to meet at Edinburgh on the tenth of February, where Baliol was acknowledged king; the superiority of England was again recognized; many of the Scottish nobility swore fealty to him; and Berwick, Dunbar, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and all the south-east counties of Scotland, were declared to be forever annexed to the crown of England. Such shameful conditions could not fail of exasperating the Scots. They submitted to them indeed, but determined to observe the treaty no longer than they were not in a condition to break it.

An opportunity soon offered: the English troops returned to their own country, and the Scots immediately flew to arms. They renounced the fealty they had sworn to Baliol, and returned to their former allegiance under Bruce. At the same time they elected Sir Andrew Murray regent, and defeated Baliol in several small, but decisive actions. Edward now saw, that it was necessary for him to subdue that stubborn people a second time; and he accordingly made preparations for invading Scotland at the head of an army impossible for them to withstand.

A. D. 1335. The English monarch reached Berwick early in the spring, and pursued his march, without opposition, into the very heart of Scotland; the enemy having abandoned all the plains at his approach, and retired to the mountains and fastnesses of their country. Edward perceiving it would be in vain to traverse a wild, deserted, and barren country, returned to Perth. Several small skirmishes, however, happened between the Scots and the straggling parties of the English; in one of which Sir Andrew Murray, the regent, was taken prisoner.

While Edward continued at Perth, he detached a body of forces, under the command of his brother, John of Eltham, and Sir Anthony Lacy, to ravage the western counties, which were principally inhabited by the Bruce party. The Scots, who imagined themselves able to face a part of the English army, left their fastnesses, and presented themselves in order of battle. A bloody engagement ensued, and the victory was, for some time, doubtful, but at last declared in favour of the English. A great number of the Scots perished on the field of battle. The adherents of Bruce were so intimidated by this defeat, that they determined to submit to the terms Edward should think proper to impose; and a treaty was accordingly concluded, on the following terms: "That the Scottish noblemen should receive a free pardon for all former offences; that they should enjoy their lands, honours, and offices in Scotland; and be restored to their English possessions which had been forfeited: That all the privileges and franchises of the church and boroughs of Scotland should continue unaltered and inviolable: That none but natives should be put into the offices of that crown and kingdom, excepting in some particular cases, where their king, Edward Baliol, should make use of his prerogative in favour of persons of another nation." It was also soon after agreed by the rest of Bruce's party, who at first refused to sign the above treaty, "That Edward Baliol should enjoy the crown of Scotland during his natural life; and that at his death it should descend to David Bruce, who, in the mean time, should be honourably maintained at London."

Hostilities being thus terminated, Edward ordered the fortifications of Perth to be repaired, and the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling to be rebuilt. He also appointed the earl of Athol guardian of the northern parts of the kingdom; and returned to England, at the head of the greater part of his army. But though the Scots had again submitted to Edward, they were far from being reconciled to their condition, and only watched for a favourable opportunity of shaking off a yoke to which necessity alone had compelled them to submit. They did not wait long. The earl of Athol was not at all adapted to govern such turbulent people. Instead of soothing the Scots, and applying lenients to heal the wounds of their country, he treated them with rigour; and the castle of Kildrummy, in which the regent's wife had shut herself up, having still refused to open its gates to the English, the guardian imprudently besieged the fortrefs. This action awakened all the pride and anger of the Scots: the earl of Marche and Sir William Douglas hastened immediately to the relief of the fortrefs, attacked the besiegers with the utmost impetuosity, and routed them with great slaughter. The earl of Athol himself was among the slain. Animated with this success, they invested the castles of Coupar and Lochendoris. The standard of war was again displayed, and forces were collected in every part of the kingdom. But before any farther hostilities were commenced, the pope and the king of France interposed their good offices; and a truce till the ninth of May, in the ensuing year, was agreed to, in order to give time for concluding a general treaty of peace.

A.D. 1336. The conferences were accordingly opened at Newcastle early in the spring; but Philip de Valois, who now filled the throne of France, and found his interest in the dissensions between the Scots and English, gave such instructions to his envoys, that though they assumed the characters of mediators between the contending parties, they omitted no opportunity of embarrassing the negotiation, and rendering the intended treaty abortive. Philip had already afforded considerable assistance to the Scots; and his envoys now assured them, that their master would never abandon the cause of the unfortunate and injured David Bruce, but support him to the utmost of his power. Elated with these promises, and exasperated against the invaders of their country, the Scottish deputies insisted on such high terms, that Edward broke off the treaty in a transport of resentment, and both parties made preparations for deciding the contest by the sword.

Edward had always been very careful to conciliate the affections of his subjects by the most popular acts; and being now determined to reduce the refractory Scots to an absolute submission, which could not be executed without large supplies, he wisely passed several salutary laws for the preservation of the public tranquillity, and the more effectually securing the property and persons of individuals from the designs of secret or open enemies. Among others, were several acts for the freedom and extension of commerce, and the preservation of the weight and quality of the coin; for the more effectually bringing to justice the perpetrators of murders, robberies, and other species of felony; and for restraining his officers from committing excesses in the case of purveyance. By these, and other similar methods, he so endeared himself to his subjects, both clergy and laity, that they very readily granted him large subsidies for supporting the conquests he had made in Scotland, and finally reducing that nation under the English government.

Strengthened by these supplies, and fired with resentment against the Scots, Edward marched a fourth time into Scotland, and laid those countries waste which had declared against him. The lord Beaumont, who commanded a separate detachment, laid the town and castle of Aberdeen in ashes, to revenge the death of Sir Thomas Rosselin, whom the inhabitants had attacked and killed on his landing at Dunotter. Edward met with no opposition in his march; but still the nation itself was as far as ever from being broken and subdued. The Scots had retreated to their fastnesses; experience taught them prudence: they knew they were not able to meet the English in the open field, and wisely abandoned the low countries to the ravages of the enemy. The hopes of a war, which now seemed inevitable, between England and France, encouraged them to persevere in their opposition to Edward; they still flattered themselves with being able to recover their national liberty.

A.D. 1337. We have now reached that period of history, which produced a transaction that gave occasion to the most memorable events; and therefore it will be necessary to give some account of its springs and causes. After the death of Lewis X. of France, the public attention of that kingdom was engrossed by a question of the Salic law. That prince left only one daughter; and they had never examined in France, whether females were capable of inheriting the crown? Laws had been enacted only to serve the present occasion. They had no knowledge of the Salian code, the law of an ancient tribe among the Franks; the want of which had been supplied by the established customs, and these customs were continually changing in France. The parliament under Philip the Fair had adjudged the province of Artois to a female, in prejudice to the next male heir; and the succession of Champagne had, at some times, been settled upon the females, and at other times taken from them. Charles the Fair took possession of Champagne in right of his wife, to the exclusion of the princes. Right therefore varied with power: it was not a fundamental law of the state to exclude a daughter from her father's throne. Besides the article in the ancient Salian code, which deprives the females of the right of inheriting in the Salic country, seems to have been founded only on this particular, that every Salic lord was obliged to appear in arms at the public assemblies of the nation. But the queen is not obliged to bear arms; the nation does it for her. It may, therefore, be affirmed, that the Salic law, a regulation in other respects so little known, was relative to the otheriefs, and not to the crown. These arguments were, for some time, maintained by the duke of Burgundy, uncle to the princess, daughter of Lewis X. and by several princes of the blood. Lewis X. had two brothers, who, in a short space of time, succeeded him, one after the other. The elder was Philip the Long, and the younger Charles the Fair. Charles, at that time, not thinking himself so near the crown, attacked the Salic law, out of jealousy of his brother. Philip the Long took care to

to have it determined at a meeting of some barons, prelates, and burghers of Paris, that females ought to be excluded from the crown of France. Had the other party prevailed, the contrary would have been declared a fundamental law. Philip died, after a very short reign, and left no male issue. The Salic law was then confirmed a second time; and Charles the Fair, who had opposed it, succeeded to the crown, without any formal dispute, and excluded his brother's daughters. At the death of Charles the Fair, the same cause was again decided; his queen was pregnant at the time of his decease, and a regent was wanting for the kingdom.

Edward, as the son of Isabella, sister to Charles the Fair, claimed the regency; but it was conferred on Philip de Valois, as the first prince of the blood; and on the queen's being delivered of a daughter, ascended the throne with the consent of the nation. Edward, however, determined to maintain his right to the succession; a claim the more insupportable, as the three sons of Philip the Fair had left daughters who were still living, and whose rights were therefore preferable to that of Edward. The king of Navarre's claim was also better founded than that of Edward, as being descended from a daughter of Lewis Hutin, the immediate successor of Philip the Fair.

But notwithstanding these disadvantages, Edward determined to attack France, and wrest from the hand of Philip de Valois that sceptre which he imagined to belong to him, as the next in blood to the deceased king. He was greatly encouraged in this resolution by Robert d'Artois, a prince of the blood of France, who having been condemned in consequence of a forgery he had committed, took refuge in England. Inspired with the most implacable revenge against Philip, Robert omitted no arguments to induce the king to declare war against France, in favour of his title to that crown. Edward was the more inclined to listen to the arguments of Robert, because Philip had given protection to David Bruce, the exiled king of Scotland. Philip was no sooner informed of the counsel given by Robert d'Artois, than he issued a sentence of felony and forfeiture against him; and declared, that every vassal of the crown, whether within or without the kingdom, who gave countenance to that traitor, was involved in the same sentence. This menace was easily apprehended; it wanted no comment; and Edward made preparations for carrying the war into the heart of France, in order to prevent his provinces on the continent from falling into the hands of Philip.

In order to divert the arms of the French monarch from Guienne, and at the same time to make an effectual attack upon Philip's dominions, Edward endeavoured to form alliances in the Low Countries, and on the frontiers of Germany. The earl of Hainault, the duke of Brabant, the archbishop of Cologne, the duke of Gueldres, the marquis of Juliers, the count of Namur, the lords of Fauquemont and Banquet, were engaged to join the English. This confederacy was not, however, thought sufficiently formidable, without the accession of Flanders; but this required some address to accomplish. The Flemings, who, by their arts and manufactures, had acquired riches and some share of independence, had risen in tumults, insulted the nobility, and driven their earl into France; determined to free themselves from every species of tyranny. The leader of these popular insurrections was one Jacob Van Ardevelt, a rich brewer of Ghent, who governed the people in a more arbitrary manner than any of their lawful sovereigns. He never appeared in the streets without a guard of fourscore persons, who, from the least signal given by this demagogue, murdered any person who happened to fall under his displeasure. Whatever he thought proper to propose in the assembly of the states, was never contradicted, because every member feared his power. Edward courted the assistance of this ferocious leader, who refused to join in the alliance, unless Edward would assume the title of king of France, in order to remove the scruples of the Flemings, who hesitated on the right of invading the territories of their liege lord. Edward agreed to the condition, and Ardevelt invited him into Flanders. About the same time, Edward received from the emperor Lewis of Bavaria the title of "Vicar of the Empire," that he might appear to have a right to command the princes of Germany.

Every thing now portended an immediate rupture between the crowns of France and England. Philip invaded Guienne; and Edward ordered the duke of Brabant to demand, in his name, the crown of France; constituted him his lieutenant general of that kingdom; and issued a proclamation, commanding the French, whom he called his subjects, to pay him obedience. Provoked at Edward's assuming his crown, Philip assembled a considerable army to chastise the Flemings, and reinstate the earl of Flanders in the possession of that country. But Edward sent a large body of forces to join his new allies, under the command of the earls of Derby and Suffolk, in order to render the designs of Philip abortive. The English, on their arrival on the coast, were informed that Guy de Rickenbrough, natural brother to the earl of Flanders, had taken possession of the isle of Cadzant, in order to cut off all communication by sea to Bruges and Ghent. It was therefore resolved to drive him from that advantageous post. Guy, who was prepared for the attack, gave them a very warm reception; but the English, after an obstinate dispute, made good their landing, when a bloody battle ensued, in which the earl of Derby was thrown from his horse, and would, in all probability, have been killed or taken prisoner, had he not been rescued by Sir Walter Manny, a valiant knight of Hainault, who, at the head of a body of horse, charged the enemy with the utmost fury, and took Guy de Rickenbrough prisoner with his own hand. The loss of their leader struck the French with consternation; they immediately fell into confusion, and were routed with prodigious slaughter. This victory filled Ardevelt and his party with joy; and the Flemings sent a message to Edward, pressing him to come over without delay, and head the allied army in person. But the immense preparations for the ensuing campaign produced nothing decisive. The allies of Edward were weak in themselves; and having no other object than his money, which began to be exhausted, they were at once very slow in their motions, and very irresolute in their measures.

A.D. 1339. Edward at last took the field, at the head of an army of near fifty thousand men, and encamped between Marchiennes and Douay; but being informed that Philip was advancing with an army of near double his force, he left his camp, and crossed the Schelde to meet him, and terminate, by one decisive action, a war attended with so ruinous an expence. But both seemed to decline an engagement; and after facing each other for some days, Edward retired back into Flanders, and dispersed his army.

Though the English monarch had entered into engagements with the duke of Brabant to stay in the Low Countries till the war was finished, he found it impossible to keep his promise. His absence had already occasioned many disorders in England, where bands of robbers disturbed the peace of the nation; and the Brucean party had not only recovered what they had lost in Scotland, but also invaded the northern counties of England. These circumstances were considered as a sufficient reason for Edward's passing over into England; and the king having promised, on his word of honour, to return in person, the duke gave his consent to his departure.

A.D. 1340. As soon as Edward landed in England, he issued writs for assembling a parliament at Westminster. The assembly shewed an uncommon alacrity in assisting the monarch, and providing for the the security of the realm against all invaders. They granted the king a large supply; and orders were issued for fortifying Southampton and the Isle of Wight; for fitting out a fleet of one hundred and fifty sail, to protect the coasts; for sending supplies of provisions to the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling; and for raising a body of seven hundred and eighty-two men at arms, two thousand light-horse, and two thousand and ten archers, for defending the marches of Scotland. These tokens of affection deserved a grateful return, and accordingly Edward granted a full remission of all debts due to the crown, and of all prosecutions on forest-trepasses since his accession to the throne. To these he added a confirmation of the two charters, and of the franchises of the boroughs. But notwithstanding the remarkable harmony that prevailed among the branches of the legislature, the parliament declared, that they owed Edward no obedience as king of France, and that the two kingdoms should for ever remain distinct and independent. It was foreseen, that France, if subdued, would become the seat of government, and England be regarded only as a province of the monarchy.

While Edward was making preparations for returning into the Low Countries, advice arrived from the duke of Gueldres, that the French had assembled a powerful fleet to intercept him in his passage. Orders were therefore given for fitting out a sufficient number of ships for carrying the king, and a considerable body of forces, to the continent. The utmost expedition was used on this occasion; and Edward embarked at Orwell on the thirteenth of June, attended by the principal nobility of England. His fleet consisted of two hundred and fifty sail of ships, having on board a powerful body of men at arms, and archers. A few days after their departure, Edward discovered the French fleet in the harbour of Sluise, and immediately made preparations for fighting the enemy. Early the next morning, the French, who had left the harbour, appeared in three divisions; and about eleven the engagement began with the utmost fury. The English had taken care to get to windward of the enemy, and grappled their ships so firmly with those of the French, that they formed a firm compact body, and the men fought with the same firmness as on dry land. The French, whose number of vessels was much greater than that of the English, observing a ship carrying the royal standard of England, advanced to attack her with the utmost intrepidity; but all their efforts were in vain. The examples of the king and his gallant nobles animated to such a degree both the seamen and soldiers, that they every where maintained a superiority over the enemy. The French could not stand the shock of the English; many hundreds of them leaped overboard, and perished in the sea. In this critical moment, a reinforcement of Flemish ships joined the English, and determined the fortune of the day. Two hundred and thirty of the enemy's ships were taken; and thirty-two thousand Frenchmen were slain, with two of their admirals. The loss of the English was inconsiderable. Philip's courtiers were so astonished at this dreadful misfortune, that none dared to be the messenger of such alarming intelligence. His jester at last gave him a hint, by which the monarch discovered the loss he had sustained, and the triumph of the English.

This victory added a lustre to Edward's authority among his allies; and he soon marched at the head of an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, composed of English, Germans, Flemings and Gascons. The first attempt was the siege of Tournay; but the city was no sooner invested, than Edward detached fifty thousand men, under the command of Robert d'Artois, who posted himself near St. Omer's to favour the siege. Robert's troops were chiefly composed of tradesmen, who had never faced an enemy, and were wholly strangers to military discipline. From such troops very little could be expected; and accordingly they were totally routed by a sally from the garrison, notwithstanding the great abilities of their leader.

This defeat did not, however, intimidate Edward. He pushed the siege with the utmost vigour, and met every where with a noble resistance. Tournay was, at that time, one of the noblest cities in Flanders, and contained above sixty thousand inhabitants. It was defended by a garrison of fifteen thousand men, commanded by Robert Butraud and Matthew de la Trie, marshals of France; assisted by the counts of Eu, Guisnes, Foix, Narbonne, and other gallant noblemen, who were resolved to perish under the ruins of the city, rather than open their gates to the enemy.

At the end of ten weeks, the city was reduced to great distress; and Philip having collected a prodigious army, advanced within a few leagues of the English camp; not with a design to bring on a general engagement, but of being ready to assist the garrison whenever an opportunity offered. Edward, exasperated at the length of the siege, sent an herald to Philip, challenging him to decide their claims to the crown of France by single combat, or by an action of a hundred against a hundred, or by a general engagement. Philip replied, that a vassal was not entitled to challenge his liege lord; and that the duel was, besides, proposed on very unequal terms; but if Edward would increase the stake, and put also the kingdom of England on the issue of the combat, he would willingly accept the challenge. These bravadoes were in the true spirit of the times; but both these kings were too wise to think seriously of putting them in execution.

While the two armies continued in the neighbourhood of each other, and a battle was every day expected, the countess dowager of Hainault, mother-in-law to Edward, and sister to Philip, though she had retired to the convent of Fonteville after the death of her husband, left her retreat on this interesting occasion, to employ her good offices for bringing about a peace between persons so nearly related to her. Her zeal produced a short cessation of hostilities, and which the pope in vain endeavoured to convert into a peace; but the demands of Edward were too exorbitant to be admitted. He required that Philip should free Guienne from all claims of superiority, and entirely abandon the protection of Scotland. These conditions were accordingly rejected by Philip; a prolongation of the truce only was agreed to. The success of Edward certainly entitled him not to make such demands. His allies were never firmly attached to his interest: they were, indeed, desirous of his money, but never intended to weaken the power of France. Accordingly, when they found that his treasure was nearly exhausted, they abandoned the confederacy; and Edward being pressed by his impatient creditors, he was obliged to pass privately into England.

His embarrassment had chiefly arose from the nature of the subsidy granted by parliament. It consisted of corn and wool, on account of the scarcity of money; and these commodities could not be collected and disposed of soon enough to answer his exigencies. But though this was nothing more than might have been expected, Edward was determined to punish the sheriffs and officers of his revenue; for he considered them as guilty of negligence, which had, in some measure, occasioned the bad success of his expedition. The bishop of Chichester, chancellor; the bishop of Litchfield, treasurer; and the archbishop, prime minister, now felt the weight of his displeasure. The two former were imprisoned; but the primate, fearing the effects of Edward's anger, retired immediately to Canterbury, and determined to defend himself by the weapons of the prelacy. He accordingly convened a meeting of the clergy in that cathedral; and pronounced a general sentence of excommunication against all who had violated the immunities of the church.

A. D. 1341. A parliament being assembled, the primate, who had received no summons to attend, presented himself at the gate in his pontifical ornaments, and demanded admittance to his seat as the first and highest peer of the realm. He was, however, denied admittance for two days successively; but Edward, sensible of the dangerous consequences that might attend his quarrel with the clergy, prudently accepted of the concessions made by the churchman, and the primate was again received into favour.

This dispute with the archbishop, the immense debt Edward had contracted on the continent, and the arbitrary measures he had pursued with regard to the officers of his revenue, alarmed the parliament, and it was determined to set proper bounds to the royal prerogative. They required a new confirmation of the great charter; they passed a bill, whereby it was enacted, that no nobleman should be proceeded against or punished, but by the judgment of his peers assembled in parliament; that the more important offices of state should be filled by the king, with the consent of the council and barons; that every session these offices should be resumed by him, and the ministers who discharged them reduced to private persons; that they should, in that condition, answer, before the parliament, to any accusations brought against them; and that if they were any ways found guilty, they should finally be dispossessed of their dignities, and more sufficient persons be substituted in their place. Edward ratified these acts in full parliament, but never intended to make them the rule of his conduct.

By making these important concessions, the king obtained large supplies from the parliament, particularly a grant of twenty thousand sacks of wool, to be transported to Flanders before Michaelmas, with a prohibition to all other persons from sending thither any wool, till that period was elapsed. But though Edward had, by sacrificing some parts of the royal authority, extricated himself from his present difficulties, he did not seem desirous of continuing the war on the side of Flanders, in support of his title to the crown of France. An unforeseen accident renewed the hostilities between the two kingdoms. John III. duke of Brittany was desirous of leaving his duchy to a daughter of his brother the count de Ponthievre; but in order to prevent the calamities that always attend a disputed succession, he determined to marry her to some prince capable of repelling any attempts that might be made to disturb the tranquillity of his country. Charles de Blois, nephew to the king of France, appeared to him the most proper for this purpose. He consulted the states of Brittany, who approved of his choice: the marriage was concluded; and all the vassals swore fealty to Charles and his spouse, as their future sovereigns. The count de Montfort himself, one of John's brothers by a second marriage, acknowledged the rights of his niece, and made no difficulty of taking an oath of fealty to Charles. But he forgot both his concession and his oath on the death of John, and exerted himself in taking possession of the country. He engaged many of the most considerable barons to acknowledge his authority, and made himself master of Rennes, Nantes, Brest, Hennebonne, and most of the important fortresses of the duchy. He met with very little opposition in his attempts, Charles de Blois being engaged in soliciting, at the court of France, the investiture of the duchy.

But though Montfort had made these acquisitions, he was sensible he should not be able to support himself against the attempts of Charles de Blois, unless assisted by some powerful ally. He therefore determined to apply to the English monarch. Accordingly, under pretence of soliciting his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which had fallen to him by the death of his brother, he visited Edward; made that prince an offer of doing him homage, and of acknowledging his title to the crown of France, provided he would engage to assist him against Charles de Blois. Edward saw immediately all the advantages that might attend an alliance with Montfort; and being at the same time incited by the persuasions of Robert d'Artois, he agreed to the conditions, and a formal alliance was concluded between them.

Thinking his treaty with Edward was a profound secret, Montfort made no difficulty of repairing to Paris, in order to support his claim to the duchy of Brittany. But he was soon convinced both of his error and the imprudent step he had taken. Philip, at his first audience, told him plainly, that he had no right to Brittany, and at the same time reproached him with having done homage to Edward, and entered into an alliance with a prince, who was the professed enemy of France. Montfort acknowledged his having passed over to England, but denied the charge of having done homage to Edward; adding, that he was satisfied of the goodness of his claim, and was ready to submit to the judgment of his peers, with regard to Brittany. Philip immediately appointed a day for discussing his claim, but forbid him to stir out of Paris till after the sentence was pronounced.

Montfort was now sufficiently convinced that he had every thing to fear, and took a resolution to make his escape. He accordingly withdrew from Paris during the night in the disguise of a merchant, and reached Brittany in safety. Philip was no sooner informed of his escape, than, in a transport of rage and indignation, he instantly confiscated the earldom of Montfort, commanded the parliament of Paris, by his sole authority, even without summoning the peers of France, or exhibiting any formal process, to adjudge Brittany to Charles de Blois; and the more effectually to carry the sentence into execution, he supplied his nephew with a numerous army, under the command of his eldest son John, duke of Normandy. Montfort, who was unable to face the French army in the field, shut himself up in Nantes, which was soon besieged by the duke of Normandy. The city was strongly fortified, and capable of holding out a considerable time against the enemy; but by the treachery of the inhabitants the city was delivered up to the enemy, Montfort himself was taken prisoner, and committed to the castle of the Louvre.

A. D. 1342. The captivity of Montfort seemed to have determined the fate of Brittany. But the heroic virtues and conjugal fidelity of his wife supported the falling fortunes of his family. Jane of Flanders, countess of Montfort, one of the most extraordinary women of that age, no sooner heard of the imprisonment of her husband, than assembling the inhabitants of Rennes, where she then resided. She presented herself in the midst of the assembly with her infant son in her arms, and conjured them to preserve from destruction, the only remaining heir of that illustrious family, who had so long held the sceptre of Brittany. Deeply affected by her politic address, they promised to support her with their lives and fortunes. All the other fortified towns in the duchy embraced the same resolution; and the utmost expedition was used to furnish them with every thing necessary for making a noble defence against the enemy. The countess herself repaired to Hennebonne, the strongest fortress in Brittany, determined there to wait for the expected succours from Edward, and in the mean time sent her infant son to England, that he might not be exposed to the same unhappy fate with his father.

Persuaded that the reduction of Hennebonne, together with the captivity of the countess, would put a final period to all opposition, Charles de Blois invested the place with a numerous army, composed of French, Spaniards, Genoese, and some Britons. The siege was carried on with the utmost vigour, and the place defended with a bravery that would have done honour to the best general of the age. The French were repulsed in every attack, and perpetually harassed with soldiers from the garrison. The countess was foremost in every danger, and led her troops with the utmost prudence and intrepidity. Perceiving that the besiegers in making an assault upon one part of the town had neglected to secure a distant quarter of their camp, she sallied out at the head of two hundred horse, made a dreadful slaughter, and set fire to their tents, baggage and magazines. A detachment was immediately sent from the main body of the army, and Jane soon perceived that her retreat was cut off. A moment was sufficient to form her resolution; she ordered her men to disperse, and fly to Brest, where she would soon meet them. Her commands were obeyed, and Jane, having increased her escort to five hundred men, cut her way through part of the enemy's camp, and entered the town amidst the shouts and acclamations of the garrison.

But notwithstanding the noble defence made by the countess, the town was at last reduced to the last extremity. Several breaches were made in the walls, and the enemy was preparing for a general assault. It was now thought necessary to offer terms of capitulation, and the bishop of Leon was actually sent for that purpose to the camp of Charles de Blois; but the countess, who had mounted one of the towers of the fortress, discovering the English fleet coming to her assistance, immediately communicated the joyful tidings to the garrison, and the bishop of Leon was recalled. The French were confounded when they saw the English enter the harbour, and laid aside their design of making a general assault. This reinforcement consisted of a body of men at arms, and six thousand archers, commanded by Sir Walter Manny, one of the best captains of the age. The courage of the garrison was now revived; they readily joined the English in a sally, drove the besiegers from their posts, and obliged them to retire with precipitation.

This reinforcement was not, however, sufficient to enable the countess to take the field against the enemy, and she therefore determined to pass over into England to solicit in person more effectual succours from Edward. Her request was granted; a more numerous reinforcement was immediately embarked under the command of Robert d'Artois, and the earl of Northampton. The countess herself returned in this fleet, which was attacked in the passage, by a French squadron commanded by prince Lewis of Spain. The countess behaved with her usual intrepidity, and the action continued with great obstinacy till night put an end to the contest; and before the morning appeared a dreadful storm separated the two fleets; but the English reached the harbour of Hennebonne in safety.

The first attempt made by Robert was against Vannes, which he carried by assault, but was dangerously wounded, and during his confinement a party of the Britons, in the interest of Charles, attacked and took the place by surprise. Robert had the good fortune to escape; but died soon after in his passage to England. Edward was greatly affected at the loss of this nobleman, and swore he would revenge his death; an oath which he punctually observed. He assembled his army, embarked at Sandwich on the fifth of October, and after a passage of two days, landed at Brest. He formed three important sieges at the same time, and by attempting too much, miscarried in all. The duke of Normandy, at the head of forty thousand men, encamped in the neighbourhood of the English, and cut off their provisions. In this dangerous situation Edward listened to the mediation of the pope's legate, and a truce for three years was concluded on the following conditions:

I. That Vannes should be sequestered, till the expiration of the truce, in the hands of two cardinals, to be disposed of by them in such a manner as they should think proper.

II. That the Flemings should be absolved from the censures which the pope, at the instigation of the king of France, had denounced against them.

III. That the places taken on both sides should remain in the hands of the present possessors; and the prisoners set at liberty, on paying their ransoms.

IV. That the allies both of France and England should be included in this treaty, and that the two kings should exert their utmost endeavours to prevent hostilities in Guienne, France and Britany.

A. D. 1343. Soon after the ratification of these articles Edward returned to England; but neither of the monarchs seemed desirous of observing the truce; Philip was desirous of procuring the departure of Edward, and the motive of Edward was that of extricating himself from a very dangerous situation. It is therefore no wonder, that the least incident was laid hold of to break the truce, and recommence hostilities. Edward complained loudly of the execution of some Briton lords, whom Philip had put to death, under pretence of their being guilty of treason. He was even so incensed, when he first heard of the fate of these noblemen, that he gave orders for beheading all the prisoners of Philip's party, but was prevailed upon to recall the bloody sentence, by the remonstrances of Henry, earl of Lancaster. He, however, sent for one of the principal captives, and told him, with great emotion, that though the death of his countrymen beheaded at Paris, was a sufficient reason for retaliating the same punishment on him and his fellow prisoners, yet he would not stain his reputation by imitating so bad an example; he would not satiate his vengeance in the blood of the innocent; but, by the assistance of the Almighty, he would severely punish the author of such unparalleled treachery and barbarity. Nor were his threats in vain.

A. D. 1344. He dispatched Henry, earl of Derby, at the head of a considerable body of forces, to begin hostilities in Guienne. Derby was the son of Henry, earl of Lancaster, and one of the most accomplished noblemen of the English court. He was at once intrepid and humane, beloved by his friends, and dreaded by his enemies. For some time he was very successful in his invasions of the enemy's territories. He attacked the count de Laille, the French general encamped at Bergerac, drove him from his intrenchments, and made himself master of the place. This success animated the English; they proceeded in their conquests with great rapidity, till they had reduced the greater part of Perigord.

A. D. 1345. But while the earl of Derby was reducing the French towns, the count de Laille, having collected an army of twelve thousand men, invested Auberauche, which had lately fallen into the hands of the English. Derby hastened to relieve the place, and arriving near the camp of the enemy in the night, Sir Walter Manny proposed to attack the French immediately. His advice was followed with such secrecy and success, that the English entered one quarter of the French camp without resistance, and fell upon the enemy with such impetuosity, that the counts de Laille, Perigord, and Valentinois, were taken prisoners in their tents, before they had time to recover from their surprise; and their troops seized with such a panic, that they fled with the utmost precipitation. The confusion was not, however, general. While one quarter was filled with disorder, the other, where the count de Cominges commanded, fled to arms and advanced against the enemy. Elated with success the English attacked them with incredible fury, and the engagement became very bloody; when the garrison, alarmed by hearing the trumpets sound a general charge, and discovering by the light of the dawn the English ensigns, sallied out, attacked the French in flank, and put them to flight. Above seven thousand fell in the action, and twelve hundred were taken prisoners; among whom were nine counts, and above three hundred knights and gentlemen of distinction. Derby, having thus defeated and dispersed the the French army, made a very rapid progress in reducing the adjacent provinces. Montfegat, Montepesat, Villa Franche, Miremont, Tonnius, Damassen, Aiguillon, a fortress deemed impregnable, Angouleme, and Reole, fell successively into the hands of the English. He would have extended his conquests still farther, but the advanced season of the year obliged him to put his army into winter quarters.

A. D. 1346. Alarmed at the progress of the English, Philip collected a numerous army; under the command of his son, the duke of Normandy, assisted by the duke of Burgundy. It would have been madness for Derby to have met the French in the open field: he was therefore reduced to the necessity of acting on the defensive. He therefore furnished all the fortified places with good garrisons, large quantities of provisions and military stores; and then passed over to England, to inform Edward of the state of the provinces, and the danger to which they were now exposed. The duke of Normandy opened the campaign with the siege of Angouleme, the garrison of which made a noble defence; but were at last reduced to extremities. John lord Norwich, the governor, saw the impossibility of defending the place much longer; but being unwilling to surrender at discretion, had recourse to a stratagem, to save at once his own honour, and his soldiers from being made prisoners of war. He ascended the ramparts, and desired to speak with the duke of Normandy. His request was granted. The duke approached the walls; and Norwich begged a cessation of arms for the morrow, which was the feast of the Virgin, to whom the duke, as well as himself, paid great devotion. The duke very readily agreed to the proposal; and Norwich having ordered his forces to prepare their baggage, marched out of the town as soon as the morning appeared. Persuaded they were going to be attacked, the French flew to arms; but Norwich dispatched a messenger to the duke, reminding him of his engagement. "I see," exclaimed that prince, "the governor has outwitted me; but let us be contented with taking the place."

The report of Derby, with regard to the dangerous state of Guienne, quickened the motions of Edward, who had determined to head his army in person. He therefore summoned all his allies on the side of Flanders to furnish their contingents of troops, but they refused to fulfil their engagements. Edward had, indeed, lately lost his friend, Jacob Ardevelt, the demagogue of Ghent. That popular leader, desirous of transferring the government from the earl of Flanders to the prince of Wales, had proposed, in a meeting of the states, to insist that their count should renounce his alliance with Philip de Valois; and in case he persisted in maintaining that connection, that they should transfer their allegiance to young Edward: adding, that they had nothing to fear from the resentment of either their own sovereign or the king of France, as the English monarch was both able and willing to support them effectually. The states, astonished at this unexpected proposal, and afraid of contradicting that popular leader, desired time to consult their constituents, as they had no authority to determine a question of such importance without their consent. The request was too reasonable to be denied, and the assembly broke up in great confusion. His enemies laid hold of this attempt to ruin him: they charged him with having embezzled vast sums of the public money; and of having made large remittances to England, whither he intended to retire, in order to enjoy in tranquillity the riches he had procured by deceiving the people. The giddy multitude immediately changed their opinion. The idol they had so long worshipped was now devoted to destruction: they thirsted for the blood of a person, for whose preservation, but a few weeks before, they would willingly have shed their own. Ardevelt soon felt the effects of this fatal change in the sentiments of the people. They surrounded his house, forced the door, and dragged him into the street, where he was sacrificed to the resentment of an enraged and ferocious people.

Edward finding it would now be in vain to make any attempt on the side of Flanders, he embarked; with his forces, for Guienne; but contrary winds still prevented him from sailing. In this distressful situation, Geoffrey D'Harcourt, a Norman baron, prevailed upon Edward to change the destination of his enterprise. D'Harcourt was a nobleman highly esteemed both for his personal merit and valour; but having been persecuted by Philip, fled into England for protection. He displayed the advantages that must attend an expedition into Normandy, a province well cultivated, full of rich and flourishing cities, destitute of troops; and at a great distance from the French armies. Hence he very justly observed, that it would be much more advantageous for the English to land in Normandy than in Guienne. Edward was convinced of the justice of his remarks; and, as soon as the wind permitted, put to sea; and, after a passage of two days only, landed at La Hogue without opposition. Here Edward knighted his eldest son, the prince of Wales, a youth then only sixteen years of age. His army consisted of four thousand men at arms; ten thousand archers, ten thousand Welsh infantry, and six thousand Irish; a number in appearance not at all adapted to the purpose of invading France; though the success of the campaign far exceeded the most sanguine expectations. An universal consternation was immediately spread through the whole province of Normandy; where not the least apprehensions were entertained of an invasion. The ships were destroyed at La Hogue, Barfleur, and Cherbourg. The towns of Valognes, Carentan, and St. Lo, surrendered at discretion; and the English marched to Caen, the capital of Lower Normandy. This city was both rich and populous, but without fortifications. Persuaded that the wealth of Caen would induce the English to plunder the city, Philip dispatched the count d'Eu, constable of France, and the count de Tankerville, at the head of a considerable body of troops, for its defence. The English approached the suburbs; and the inhabitants, elated with the reinforcements they had received, sallied out upon the enemy, contrary to the advice of the constable. The consequence was what might naturally be expected when undisciplined multitudes attack a regular army; they were totally defeated, and the counts d'Eu and Tankerville taken prisoners. The English entered the city with the fugitives, and a dreadful massacre began: neither age, nor sex, nor condition, were spared; all fell a sacrifice to the sword of the English. Edward at last put a stop to the slaughter; the inhabitants laid down their arms, and the city was plundered with more deliberation. The booty was prodigious; and the whole was embarked, together with three hundred of the richest burghers, and all the prisoners of distinction, and sent to England.

The castle of Caen, however, still held out; and Edward, who thought the reduction of it would be of little consequence, marched through the bishoprics of Lisieux and Evreux towards Rouen, the capital of Normandy. In his route he took the towns of Louvere and Lisieux; but on advancing to the banks of the Seine, he found the bridge already broken down, and the French monarch posted on the opposite side of the river, at the head of a prodigious army. Edward did every thing in his power to provoke Philip to a battle. He laid the whole country waste, burnt the suburbs of Pont l'Arche, Vernon, and Mullien. The same fate attended the noble palace of St. Germain; and some of the light troops carried their ravages to the very gates of Paris. Edward made another attempt to pass the Seine at Poissy, but met with the same disappointment; the bridge was broken down, and Philip's army appeared on the opposite bank of the river. Some stratagem was therefore necessary to elude the vigilance lance of Philip. Accordingly the English monarch marched, with great rapidity, farther up the Seine; but by a sudden countermarch during the night, returned to Poissy, repaired the bridge, routed the militia left to guard the passage, crossed the river, and advanced, with quick marches, towards Flanders. In his route he burnt the suburbs of Beauvais; and defeated, with great slaughter, the inhabitants of Amiens, who were marching to reinforce their king's army. But he soon found himself in the same dangerous situation as before: all the bridges on the Somme were either broken down, or strongly guarded. The country was ruined. Philip was advancing against him at the head of an hundred thousand men; and Godemar de Faye stationed on the opposite side of the Somme, with a numerous army, to observe his motions. In this alarming crisis, he offered a reward to any person who could lead his army to a place where he might pass the Somme; and a peasant of Normandy, preferring riches to the safety of his country, pointed out a ford below Blanchetague, where the stream was not above a foot in depth at low water. This discovery revived the courage of the English; they decamped at midnight, and reached the ford about sun-rising the next morning, a little before the tide of flood made up the river. The place exactly answered the description given of it by the peasant; but the opposite bank was guarded by Godemar de Faye, at the head of twelve thousand men. This opposition was not, however, sufficient to intimidate Edward, who was always master of his passions, and maintained a remarkable coolness and presence of mind in the midst of the most furious battle. He plunged himself into the stream, calling out, "Let all who love me follow my example." Animated by the presence and example of their sovereign, the soldiers threw themselves into the river with the most amazing intrepidity. The French made a noble opposition; but nothing was capable of stopping the career of the English: they were not intimidated by any opposition; and after a bloody dispute, put the enemy to flight, and gained the opposite bank, just as the van of Philip's army, under the command of the king of Bohemia and John de Hainault, appeared. It is impossible to express the vexation of Philip, in being thus disappointed of his revenge. He had traced the English above fifty leagues by the smoking ruins left behind them, and now thought himself sure of overtaking the invaders. But it was in vain to repine; the tide of flood was made up the river, and rendered a passage impossible, while the English pursued their march with great tranquillity.

Though Edward had thus escaped the danger of being attacked in his late alarming situation, he was convinced it would be impossible for him to pursue his march over the extensive plains of Picardy, without exposing his van to inevitable destruction by the perpetual attacks of a numerous cavalry: he therefore determined to wait for the enemy, and venture a general engagement. He accordingly chose an advantageous spot of ground near the village of Crecy; and to secure his flank from the furious attacks of the French horse, he threw up a large entrenchment, and extended it round a small wood, where he deposited his baggage. Having taken these necessary precautions, he drew up his army on a small eminence, and divided it into three lines. The first was commanded by the prince of Wales, assisted by the earls of Warwick and Oxford, Geoffrey Harcourt of Normandy, the lords Stafford, Chandois, Delawar, Holland and Cobham, and several other persons of distinction. This line consisted of eight hundred men at arms, four thousand archers, and six thousand Welshmen. The second line was commanded by the earls of Arundel and Northampton, assisted by the lords Willoughby, Ros, Bassett of Sapcote, and Malton, and consisted of eight hundred men at arms, two thousand four hundred archers, and four thousand bill-men. He himself commanded the third line, which consisted of seven hundred men at arms, six thousand archers, and five thousand three hundred bill-men. In this position Edward waited, with great tranquillity, the approach of the enemy.

Philip, after passing the Somme at Abeville, pursued his march at the head of one hundred and twenty thousand men, determined to take the severest revenge on the English, who had laid his country waste, and insulted the standard of France. On his arrival in the neighbourhood of Crecy, he detached several of his officers to reconnoitre the position of the English. They readily obeyed, and faithfully described, at their return, the admirable order of Edward's forces. The count de Balche, one of the best foldiers in Philip's army, added, that there was not the least danger of Edward's declining a battle; and therefore he advised, that instead of attacking the English immediately, the engagement should be deferred till the next morning, that the troops might rest themselves after their fatiguing march. But this was over-ruled. The force of numbers was thought sufficient to balance every inconvenience, and it was determined to begin the action immediately.

The French were now in sight of the English; and Edward, that he might still farther animate his men, rode through the ranks, and urged every motive that had a tendency to raise their natural valour, and inspire them with the noble resolution of remaining conquerors, or falling in the glorious attempt. He told them, that the number of the enemy should be so far from intimidating, that it should inspire them with courage; that confusion would be the inevitable consequence of such multitudes of undisciplined forces; and that the order in which he had placed them, added to their own resolution, would be abundantly sufficient to repel all the attacks of the French army. Adding, "I request nothing from you, but that you imitate my example, and that of the prince of Wales." The troops caught the courage and noble intrepidity of their sovereign; they wished to be led against the enemy.

While Edward was employed in raising the ardour of his troops, Philip endeavoured to marshal his army; but this was impossible. He sent orders, indeed, for the lines to halt till they received farther instructions; but his commands were but imperfectly obeyed. His army being composed of a great number of princes and noblemen, jealous of each other's honour, and most of them strangers to military subordination, pressed forward to begin the attack; so that when the van halted, pursuant to the orders of Philip, the succeeding ranks continued to move forward with great impetuosity, till the whole became one enormous body moving towards Crecy in great confusion; nor was it in the power of Philip to remove the disorder till they came near the English army, when they stopped of themselves, and gave Philip an opportunity of drawing them up in some order. He divided his army into three lines, conformable to that of the English. The first was led by John de Luxembourg, king of Bohemia, and composed of three thousand men at arms, twenty-nine thousand infantry, and fifteen thousand Genoese cross-bowmen, under the command of Antonio Doria and Carolo Grimaldi. These were placed opposite to the English archers. Charles, count of Alençon, brother to Philip, led the second division, consisting of four thousand men at arms, and twenty thousand infantry. The third division was headed by Philip in person; and formed a body of reserve, amounting to twelve thousand men at arms, and fifty thousand foot.

The battle was begun by the Genoese cross-bowmen; but a sudden shower having fallen a little before the engagement, their bow-strings were relaxed, and their arrows fell short of the enemy. The same misfortune had not, however, attended the bows of the English archers: they were preserved in cases, whence they now drew them, and poured in such a dreadful dreadful shower of arrows; that the Genoese, unable to support the shock, were thrown into disorder, and fell back upon the duke d'Alençon's cavalry. Another discharge doubly increased the confusion; the whole vast body seemed to be composed of hurry, terror, and dismay.

At last the duke of Alençon disengaged himself from the flying Genoese; made a circuit with his cavalry, and fell upon the flank of the first battalion of English archers. The battle now became desperate and bloody. The French opened themselves a passage through the archers, and advanced against the prince of Wales, who received them with such firmness and resolution, that numbers of them were slain; but the prince himself was still in the greatest danger of being surrounded by the superior numbers of the enemy. The earls of Arundel and Northampton perceived his situation, and detached a body of troops to his assistance. Philip took advantage of this motion, and sent three squadrons of French and German knights to the aid of his brother. The prince was now attacked both in front and rear; and a messenger was dispatched by the earl of Warwick to the king, to inform him of the danger of his son, and desire him to order a body of troops to his assistance. "Is he dead or wounded?" said the king with great tranquillity. He was answered in the negative. "Return," added he, "and tell my son, that I reserve the honour of the day to him, and that I am confident he will shew himself worthy of the honour of knighthood." This answer being delivered to the prince in the hearing of his followers, they seemed to be inspired with fresh courage; they were more than a match for the increasing numbers of the enemy, who exerted all their efforts to break again the compacted phalanx of the English, who, in their turn, attacked the French with such impetuosity, that they were unable to stand the shock. The duke of Alençon was slain. A dreadful carnage ensued, princes, peers, generals, knights, and common soldiers, fell promiscuously, and formed a frightful heap of slain.

Enraged to see the two first lines of his army totally defeated, Philip advanced at the head of the body of reserve, which the confusion that reigned in the French army had hitherto prevented from engaging; but there was now no longer any equality in the action. Confounded at the sight of seeing such numbers of their countrymen slain, and the whole plain filled with fugitives, the troops answered not the courage of their leader, who gave signal proofs of his valour and capacity as a general, but it was too late. The French refused any longer to face the English, and a general flight ensued. Philip himself was wounded, and carried off the field of battle by John de Hainault. The standard of France was thrown down, and the whole army dispersed; but the slaughter did not cease till darkness put an end to the dispute. The victory being complete, the king flew into the arms of the prince of Wales and exclaimed, "My gallant son, heaven grant you may persevere in the glorious course you have begun! The heroic manner in which you have acquitted yourself to-day, sufficiently proves you deserve the crown you are born to wear."

Such was the issue of the famous battle of Crecy, fought on the twenty-fifth of August; when, by a moderate computation, there fell by the swords of the English twenty-four baronets, twelve hundred knights, fifteen hundred gentlemen, four thousand men at arms, and thirty thousand infantry; together with the principal nobility of France, among whom were the dukes of Lorraine and Bourbon, the earls of Alençon, Flanders, Blois, Reaumont, Harcourt, Auxerre, St. Pol, and Sancerre; with the kings of Bohemia and Majorca. The former had been long famous as a general, but age had now deprived him of his sight. He could not, however, be persuaded from engaging in the hottest part of the battle. He caused the reins of his bridle to be interlaced with those of two valiant knights, and rushed between those to the spot where young Edward fought in person, and with whom he exchanged two or three random strokes. But he was soon after parted from him, and, together with his valiant companions, fell among the slain. His crest was composed of three ostrich feathers, with this motto, ICH DIEN, I serve; and in memory of this celebrated victory it was assumed by the prince of Wales; and has been ever since resumed by his successors.

No quarter was given by the English at the battle of Crecy; probably owing to their peculiar situation; though others say it was in consequence of similar orders issued by Philip. But though mercy was refused to the living, the dead were treated with the greatest marks of humanity. Edward sent the body of the king of Bohemia to his family; caused the field of battle to be consecrated, attended in person the funerals of the noblemen who fell in the action, and ordered the common soldiers to be interred with the greatest decency.

This battle was almost as remarkable for the small loss of the English as for the prodigious slaughter of the French. Only one esquire, three knights, and a few private men fell in this remarkable action. So great is superiority of prudence and conduct over numbers and temerity. It is said that the English derived great advantages from some pieces of artillery in their army; an invention which had some years been known, and of which it is surprising that Philip neglected the advantage. But notwithstanding several authors of credit mention this particular, there is reason to believe that the whole is founded on mistake. It is not natural to think that Edward in so long, so laborious, and so dangerous a march and retreat, could carry about with him an unwieldy train of artillery, especially when it is considered that the cannon of that age were prodigiously clumsy, and consequently of much greater weight than ours. Besides, none of the historians who lived at that time, though they were very minute in describing his passage over the Somme, mention any thing of artillery, though it would have been of much greater use than his archers, who lined the banks of that river to cover his passage.

Edward drew the most solid advantages from the battle of Crecy. He had observed and regretted the great length of the voyage to Guienne, the only method by which he could send troops to defend his provinces, or attack the monarch of France. His great object was, therefore, to secure an easy passage into that kingdom; the death of Ardevelt having destroyed his authority in the Low Countries. He had now an opportunity of making himself master of some part on the French coast opposite to England, and Calais seemed the best adapted to answer his designs. Accordingly he led his victorious army thither, and invested the place on the third of September.

Few years are recorded in the annals of history more glorious to England than that at present under consideration: the armies of Edward were every where victorious. The duke of Normandy was recalled from Guienne, on the landing of Edward in Normandy; no army was left to oppose the progress of the earl of Derby; nor did that able general fail to improve so favourable an opportunity. He took Maribeu and Lusignan, by assault; Taillebourg, St. Jean d'Angeli, and Poitiers, opened their gates at the first summons. These acquisitions opened him a free passage into the adjacent provinces, and Derby extended his incursions to the banks of the Loire; spreading terror and desolation through all that part of the French dominions.

The war was still carried on in Britany, and the countess of Montford continued to display her heroic virtues. Charles de Blois, at the head of a numerous army invested the fortress of Roche de Rén, and pushed the siege with the utmost vigour. The place was of too much importance for the countess to suffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, without making one attempt for its relief. She put herself at the head of her little army, and having received a reinforcement of English troops under the command of Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked the French during the night, routed their whole army, and took Charles de Blois prisoner. This misfortune called another heroine from obscurity. The countess of Blois, in whose right her husband claimed the duchy of Brittany, seized the reins of government, and became a powerful rival to the countess of Montfort. She was her equal both in the field and the cabinet; the war was carried on with the same vigour as before the captivity of her husband.

The Scots had some time since recalled their king, David Bruce, from France; and at the instigation of Philip, took the opportunity of invading England during the absence of Edward, at the head of an army of fifty thousand men. David, whose sole intention was to ravage the country, levied the most oppressive contributions, and committed the most dreadful disorders in his march, which he extended to the gates of Durham. The distress of the people animated queen Philippa to march in person to their defence; and having collected an army of twelve thousand, led them against the Scottish invaders. Her army was divided into four bodies, the first was commanded by lord Piercy; the second by the archbishop of York and lord Neville; the third by the bishop of Lincoln and lord Mowbray; and the fourth by Baliol in person. In this order the English approached the army of Bruce encamped at Neville's Cross, near the city of Durham. Bruce drew up his army in three lines; the first, consisting of French auxiliaries and the flower of the Scottish nobility, was commanded by the king in person; the second by Robert, high-steward of Scotland and the earl of Marche; and the third by the earls of Murray and Douglas.

While both armies stood ready to engage, queen Philippa rode through the ranks of the English, exhorting every man to do his duty, and to take ample revenge on the barbarous ravagers of their country. The battle was begun by a troop of Genoese crossbowmen, who served in the division under Robert; but they were soon routed by the more experienced English archers. Robert perceived the superiority of the latter, and pressed on furiously with his men at arms, to begin a close fight with the detachment under lord Piercy. The English archers opened immediately to the right and left, to let the enemy pass, but closed again immediately, and galled them dreadfully with their arrows in flank, while they were engaged in front with the English infantry. Robert, however, maintained the fight with the greatest intrepidity; and it was for some time doubtful to which side Fortune would give the victory. Baliol saw the danger, and led up his division to the assistance of lord Piercy. The Scots were now struck with a panic, and immediately betook themselves to flight. Baliol, who was not deficient in military abilities, instead of pursuing the fugitives, wheeled suddenly about, and fell with the utmost impetuosity on the flank of the division commanded by the king. David fought with great intrepidity, and, assisted by his barons, made a noble stand against the attacks of the English; but the contest was unequal; the whole division was broken and put to flight, and the king himself taken prisoner. The third division, under the earls of Murray and Douglas, still stood firm, but were soon broken when attacked by the whole force of the English. Murray was slain in endeavouring to rally his men, and Douglas taken prisoner. The English now remained masters of the field of battle; and this victory would, in all probability, have determined the fate of Scotland, had not Robert rallied his men after he had given way to the attacks of the English, and retreated in such excellent order, by which the other fugitives had time to join him, and form a body, which the victors did not think proper to pursue.

The Scots had been often unfortunate in their pitched battles with the English, but never did they receive a more fatal blow than the present. Fifteen, some say twenty thousand Scots, fell in the action. And from a list of the slain, and those who were taken prisoners, it appeared, that there was scarcely a noble family in Scotland that did not share in this public calamity.

David, and about thirty-six noble prisoners, were secured in the tower of London; and Philippa embarking at Dover, passed over to the English camp before Calais, where she was received with all the honours that were due to her rank, to her merit, and success.

Edward had yet made but little progress in the siege of Calais. John de Vienne, a knight of Burgundy, who commanded there, was a person of approved courage and fidelity; so that the English monarch, sensible of the difficulty of taking the place by force, had, from the very beginning of the siege, determined to reduce it by famine. He accordingly blocked up the place both by land and sea; so that, after a siege of some months, the place was in want of provisions; and the governor was obliged to put out all the useless mouths; that the garrison might subsist the longer: and Edward, with a generosity not common in these times, not only suffered these distressed people to pass unmolested through his camp, but also supplied them with money for their journey.

A.D. 1347. Philip, sensible of the importance of Calais, and desirous of succouring a garrison that had so nobly exerted themselves in defending that fortress, determined to attempt their relief, and approached the place at the head of an army of two hundred thousand men. But he soon perceived that it would be madness to attack the English camp, and therefore had recourse to negotiation. He offered to cede Guienne, together with the earldom of Ponthieu, and proposed a match between their children. These offers were, however, rejected. On which Philip dispatched a herald to Edward, offering to decide their quarrel in the open field; but the English monarch was too prudent to risk the whole upon the uncertain issue of a single combat; and Philip was obliged to decamp, and disperse his numerous army.

Despairing of relief, and almost wholly destitute of provisions, the garrison desired to capitulate. John de Vienne accordingly appeared upon the walls, and made a signal for a conference; and Edward sent Sir Walter Manny to hear what he had to propose. The governor told him, that having now no farther hopes of relief, he was willing to surrender the place, and desired no other conditions than that the lives and liberties of the garrison should be secured. Manny answered, that Edward was so exasperated against the inhabitants of Calais for their pertinacious resistance, that he was sure he would receive the town on no conditions that should confine him with regard to their punishment. "Is this" replied Vienne; "the treatment to which brave men are entitled? Would not your king have expected the same conduct from any English knight in my condition, which I have performed for my sovereign? The noble defence made by the inhabitants of Calais certainly merits the esteem of every prince, much more of so gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that if we must perish, we shall not perish unrevenged; and that we are not yet so reduced, but we can sell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is, doubtless, the interest of both sides to prevent these desperate extremities; and I expect that you yourself, brave knight, will interpose your good offices with your prince in our behalf."

Struck with the justice of these sentiments, and being a friend to valour wherever it was found, Manny

Manny exerted all his interest with Edward in behalf of the brave garrison of Calais. He represented the dreadful consequences that might result from so dangerous a precedent, which could not fail of increasing the miseries of war, already sufficiently severe. Edward felt the whole force of his observations, and thought proper to mitigate the severity of the conditions he had demanded. He only insisted, that six of the principal citizens should repair to his camp with the keys of the fortress, bare-headed and bare-footed, with ropes about their necks, to be disposed of as he thought proper. These conditions being complied with, he promised to spare the lives of the rest of the inhabitants.

It is impossible to describe the horror and confusion which these severe conditions excited in the breasts of the inhabitants of Calais. They endeavoured to deprecate the wrath of the victor by the most humble submissions and affecting remonstrances. But Edward was inflexible; and it was resolved by the garrison to submit to the massacre that must follow from their refusal, rather than devote six of their brethren to an ignominious death, for no other reason than that of having done their duty to their king and country. But before the council broke up, Eustace de St. Pierre, one of the principal inhabitants, stepped forth, and offered to lay down his life for the safety of his friends and companions. Affected with this uncommon instance of magnanimity, three of his own relations declared themselves ready to share in the glorious sacrifice; and two others were quickly found who followed their example. These willing victims to the safety of their countrymen appeared before Edward, laid the keys of their city at his feet, and were ordered to be executed immediately. Pierced with the afflictions of virtue in distress, the queen fell on her knees before Edward, and besought him with tears to spare the lives of those brave men, whose only crime was their attachment to their sovereign. Edward could not withstand the force of conjugal affection; he relented, and the heroic burghers were pardoned. But the compassion of Philippa did not terminate here: she carried the almost famished victims to her tent, ordered them a noble repast, made them a present of money and clothes, and sent them back to their friends in safety.

Edward being now master of Calais, took every precaution in his power to secure his conquest. He knew that it would be impossible for him ever to make the inhabitants real friends to his government, and therefore obliged them all to leave the town, and re-peopled it from England. This policy preserved the place several centuries from falling again into the hands of a French monarch.

A. D. 1348. Satisfied with this important conquest, Edward listened to the mediation of the pope, and concluded a truce with Philip; but the terms of it were very ill observed; and an attempt was made to recover Calais, by corrupting the governor. One Aimery de Pavia, an Italian knight, brave and intrepid in war, but a stranger to every principle of honour and fidelity, was entrusted by the English monarch with the command of this important fortress. Geoffrey de Charny, governor of St. Omer's, found means to open a negotiation with Aimery; who, in consideration of twenty thousand golden crowns, promised to admit a certain number of Frenchmen into the fortress; and the most proper methods were accordingly taken to insure success. Edward, informed of the design by Aimery's secretary, prepared to turn the contrivance to the destruction of the enemy. He sent for the governor to London, and reproached him with his crime; but promised to spare his life, if he would assist him in taking vengeance for the perfidious attempt. The Italian hesitated not a moment to promise his utmost assistance in executing the intended design. A day had been appointed for the admission of the French; and Edward having prepared a detachment of a thousand men, under the command of Sir Walter

Manny, departed secretly from London with the prince of Wales, and reached Calais the evening before the treacherous design was intended to be carried into execution. Charny arrived; and a chosen band of soldiers was admitted at one of the postern gates by the governor, who received the stipulated sum. All the French who entered were immediately taken prisoners, while Charny was waiting with impatience for the signal to enter the town in triumph. At last the great gate was opened, but not for him. The English rushed out under the banner of Sir Walter Manny, both Edward and the prince of Wales serving as volunteers. Charny was astonished, but determined to dispute the victory with the enemy. He drew up his men in a square battalion, and maintained the fight till break of day with the greatest intrepidity. During this contest, a valiant knight, called Eustace de Ribamont, had the glory of fighting a single combat with Edward, whom he beat twice to the ground, and who as often recovered himself with surprising agility. The victory was long doubtful; but at last Ribamont owned himself conquered, and delivered his sword to the king. Charny, in the mean time, maintained the fight with great obstinacy; but perceiving his retreat cut off by another detachment from the town, he surrendered at discretion. All the officers were conducted to Calais, where they were treated with great courtesy: they supped with the prince of Wales and the English nobility. No reflections were made on their conduct; even Charny himself was not reproached for his treachery. Ribamont was loaded with praises by Edward, who also presented him with a string of pearls he wore about his own head; saying to him, "I know you, Sir Eustace, to be gay and amorous, and that you take delight in the company of ladies and damsels. Let them all know from whom you received this present. You are no longer a prisoner. I acquit you of your ransom, and you are at liberty to-morrow to dispose of yourself as you think proper." This age was the reign of chivalry and gallantry; and in a famous combat of thirty knights against thirty, fought about this time, Beaumanoir called out, as they were going to engage, that it would be seen that day, "who had the fairest mistresses."

A. D. 1349. The order of the garter, which was now instituted, probably owed its origin to the love which Edward bore to the countess of Salisbury. That celebrated lady, at a court ball, dropped her garter, which the king took up; and observing that some of his courtiers smiled, as if he had not obtained that favour merely by accident, he called out; "Honi soit qui mal y pense." Evil to him who evil thinks. These words became the motto of the order. It consisted at first of no more than twenty-four persons besides the sovereign; though it soon became a capital object of ambition to courtiers.

But these rejoicings and festivities were terminated by a dreadful pestilence, which at this time invaded all the kingdoms of Europe. It first appeared in the northern parts of Asia; and after spreading over all that country, continued its destructive progress from one end of Europe to the other. The western parts of England first felt this fearful scourge, which soon after reached the capital, and raged, with unremitting fury, near two years, so that hardly one tenth part of the inhabitants survived. Above fifty thousand souls perished in London only. This dreadful visitation rendered a prolongation of the truce necessary, neither the French nor English being in a condition to renew hostilities. The Scots, indeed, took advantage of this misfortune to renew their ravages in the northern parts of England, but paid dearly for their temerity. Above five thousand of them were swept away by the plague, and the rest returned to their own kingdom, to disseminate the pestiferous seeds of this dreadful disease among their countrymen.

A. D. 1350. Before this scourge of heaven was removed, removed, Philip paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded in the throne by his son John, duke of Normandy, a prince possessed of many virtues, but rather of a private than a public nature. With a heart full of the justest sentiments of honour and sincerity, he was, of all others, the most improper person to sway the sceptre of France in these turbulent times; he wanted that masterly prudence and foresight, that penetration and sagacity, which the situation of his affairs required. His kingdom was filled with domestic commotions, which greatly favoured the views of the English. His relation, Charles, king of Navarre, surnamed the Bad, threw the kingdom of France into combustion by assassinations and perfidies. He entered into a private treaty with the English, and even seduced the dauphin to engage in his intrigues; but that prince being at last convinced of the folly of such destructive connections, invited the king of Navarre, and the noblemen of his party, to an entertainment at Rouen, where they were all betrayed into the hands of king John: though this stroke proved not decisive in maintaining the royal authority.

A.D. 1356. Man seldom depreciates the humiliating hand of heaven longer than he feels the weight of his chastisement; the sanguinary spirit of ambition which seemed to have crouched beneath the late tremendous scourge of Providence, once more reared its head on the removal of that calamity. The seizing of the king of Navarre was resented by Edward; and the prince of Wales, generally known by the name of the Black prince, from the colour of his armour, having the preceding year made a successful expedition into Guienne, now advanced into Quercy, at the head of two thousand men at arms, six thousand archers, and four thousand foot. The success of this young warrior was astonishing: he wasted Quercy, the Limosin, and Auvergne, advanced to Berry, and after some unsuccessful attempts upon Bourges and Issoudun, took Vierzon by storm. Here he refreshed his army, and here he received the first intelligence that the king of France was posted at Chartres, on the other side of the Loire, all the fords of which were strongly guarded. Young Edward now perceived it was impracticable to advance, and therefore resolved to retreat to Bourdeaux. John perceived his intention, crossed the Loire, and marched with such expedition, that he overtook him in the neighbourhood of Poitiers. Edward perceiving that a retreat was now impracticable, prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and all the prudence of the oldest, and most experienced commander. He posted his handful of men in a place of difficult access, full of hedges, bushes and vineyards, where neither the enemy's cavalry could attempt to pierce, nor their infantry attack him without great disadvantage: at the end of a narrow lane, the only avenue by which the French could advance to attack his main body, he placed a square battalion of the flower of his English archers; nor could the enemy avail themselves of their vast superiority of numbers, till this corps was broken.

The French army, which consisted of above sixty thousand men, was encamped between Beauvoir and Maupertuis, and had John known how to have made a proper use of his numerous forces, his success had been infallible without hazarding a battle. Prince Edward was already so distressed for want of provisions, that a few days would have been sufficient to have forced him to surrender at discretion. But the imprudent ardour of the French nobility would admit of no restraint; they imagined themselves sure of victory, and advanced immediately to attack the English. Just before the charge was sounded, the cardinal of Perigord reached the French army; and at his entreaty the battle was deferred till he had visited the English prince, and endeavoured to save the farther effusion of human blood, by an advantageous peace. Edward, conscious of his own dangerous situation, told the cardinal that he would agree to any terms consistent with his own honour, and that of his country. He offered to purchase a retreat to Bourdeaux, by resigning all the conquests he had made, during this and the former campaign, and by stipulating not to serve against France during seven years. These offers were haughtily rejected by John, who peremptorily insisted, that the prince himself, together with a hundred of the chief nobility in his army, should surrender themselves prisoners; and on these conditions he offered a safe retreat to the English army. The answer of the prince was that of an hero, who fears death much less than dishonour. He declared that neither himself nor his knights should be taken but in battle; and that he would rather sacrifice his life than consent to such infamous terms.

The sword was now to determine the important contest. The next morning was to be the period of the lives of thousands. No advantage was omitted by Edward: he employed the night in strengthening the post he had so judiciously chosen, with new intrenchments; and detached a body of chosen men under the command of de Greilly, capital of Buche, with orders to make a compass round the hill, and keep himself concealed under covert of the hedges and ditches with which it was surrounded, till the battle should begin, and then to fall with the utmost fury on the French rear. He now divided his troops into three distinct bodies, but ranged in so close compact a manner, that they seemed to form only a square battalion: the front was defended by a number of ditches and hedges; and the flanks were secured on one side by a steep hill, and on the other by a morass. The earl of Warwick was stationed on the side of the hill, with the troops which composed the van; the rear, commanded by the earls of Suffolk and Salisbury, was posted behind a hedge about a stone's cast from the lane through which the French must march to the attack. At the end of this lane was a pretty large gap, where Edward took his post at the head of the main body, which extended itself among the vines and bushes; the weaker part of the field being inclosed by the carriages and baggage waggons.

The French army was also divided into three bodies; the first was commanded by the duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the second by the dauphin of France, assisted by his two brothers the dukes of Anjou and Berry; and the third, which consisted of forty thousand of the best troops in France, was led by the king in person.

The battle was begun about nine o'clock in the morning by three hundred chosen Frenchmen, who marched up the lane towards the main body of the English; but were so galled by the archers, who lined the hedges, that more than one half of them were slain before they reached the front of Edward's division, where the rest were cut to pieces by an advanced party commanded by lord Audley. The marshals Clermont and Andrehen, who with a body of chosen cavalry had advanced close behind the men at arms to support them, met with so warm a reception from the earl of Warwick, and at the same time so impetuous an attack from the earls of Suffolk and Salisbury, at the head of a detachment from the rear, that Clermont was killed on the spot, and Andrehen obliged to surrender himself prisoner: most of the corps shared the fate of the former. The first attack of the French being thus rendered abortive, the dauphin advanced to the charge, but not without great difficulty; his men, dispirited at the fate of their companions, were not ready to follow their leader. In this critical moment the capital de Buche fell with the utmost impetuosity upon their rear, and threw them into terrible disorder: the English archers plied them with incessant showers of arrows from every quarter; while the other infantry with swords and battle-axes rushed upon them and made the most dreadful slaughter. The French threw down their arms and betook themselves to flight, while Landas, Bodenai, and St. Venaant, to whom the care of the dauphin dauphin and his two brothers had been particularly committed, carried them off the field of battle, and the whole division followed their example. The duke of Orleans, struck with the same panic, fled with the utmost precipitation; though the greater part had never charged the enemy.

But still the grand division composed of the household troops, and headed by their king in person, assisted by his principal nobility, stood firm, and seemed determined to dispute the victory with the English, who were far inferior in number. They were, however, greatly dismayed at the precipitate flight of their companions. The lord Chandos called out to the prince that the battle was won, and Edward immediately mounted his horse, and advanced at the head of his army to attack the main body of the French. The dreadful struggle for victory now began; all that had passed before seemed only an exercise of arms, in comparison of the violent shock which now ensued. John exerted his utmost efforts to retrieve by his valour what he had lost by his imprudence. The prince of Wales fell with the most amazing impetuosity on a body of German cavalry placed in the front; and a stubborn contest ensued. Nor did the Germans give ground till their three leaders, together with the duke of Athens, constable of France, were slain; but being left without a commander, they quitted the field of battle, leaving the king himself and his young son Philip, exposed to all the fury of the enemy. John now saw himself reduced to a small battalion of faithful friends, who were continually lessening by the fowls of the English. At last, wearied out with fatigue and overwhelmed with numbers, he wielded the sword but faintly, and he might easily have been slain, but every one was emulous of so noble a prize, and therefore as they approached called out to him to surrender, and offered him quarter; but unwilling to yield himself a prisoner to any person of inferior rank, he cried out, "Where is my cousin the prince of Wales; to him only I will yield." Being informed that Edward was in another part of the field, he still persisted obstinately to defend himself, till Sir Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Artois, made his way through the croud of assailants, and requested John to yield himself his prisoner; and John, after being assured that he was a knight, threw him his gauntlet as a signal of surrender: his son Philip was also taken with him.

Wearied with the toil of battle, the prince of Wales, who had been carried to a considerable distance in pursuit of the flying enemy, was reposing himself under a tent he had ordered to be pitched for that purpose, when advice was brought him that the king of France and his son were surrounded, and either slain or taken prisoners. Edward immediately dispatched the earl of Warwick and the lord Cobham, at the head of a small detachment to enquire into the fate of the French monarch, and, if possible, to rescue him from the hands of the soldiers. Warwick happily arrived soon enough to save his life. The English had taken the royal prisoners from Morbec: the Gascons claimed the honour of detaining them; and some of the brutal soldiers, rather than yield the prize to their rivals, threatened to put both the illustrious captives to death. Both parties were over-awed by the presence of Warwick, who approaching the monarch with the greatest marks of respect, offered to conduct him to Edward's tent.

The behaviour of the prince was even, if possible, superior to the ability and valour he had discovered in the battle. Instead of indulging a supercilious pride too commonly the attendant on youthful warriors, he came from his tent to meet the captive king with all the marks of a sincere regard. He sympathized with his misfortunes; he comforted him in his afflictions; he paid him the tribute of praise due to his valour; and ascribed his own victory to capricious fortune, or to the superior power of an over-ruling providence. He ordered a magnificent repast to be prepared in his tent for the royal prisoner, and he himself waited on him at table, as if he had been one of his retinue; and when pressed by the king to sit down, he declared with the greatest modesty, "That it was not for a subject, like him, to sit in the presence of so great a monarch." This moderation added new lustre to his glory.

The generous example of Edward was imitated by the whole army; the prisoners were every where treated with the greatest tenderness and humanity. The spoils taken in the French camp was so great, that the meanest individual in the English army found himself placed beyond the reach of want during the remainder of his life. Indeed the ransom of the noble prisoners alone were more than sufficient for that purpose; though these were very moderate. The extent of the fortunes of all were considered; and no more was exacted of them than they could easily spare; no man was that day impoverished for his misfortunes; they had still sufficient to perform their military service for the future in a manner suitable to their rank and quality. And after a solemn thanksgiving was performed in the English camp for their late victory, Edward marched at the head of his army to Bourdeaux.

A. D. 1357. This fatal event was no sooner known to pope Innocent VI. than he sent the cardinals of Perigord and St. Vital to Bourdeaux, with orders to use their utmost endeavours to bring about a peace; but failing in their negotiation, they confined their requests to the obtaining a truce for two years. The prince of Wales, who was sincerely disposed to heal the wounds both nations had received in this dreadful contest, readily joined his endeavours to those of the legates, and wrote over to the king, in such pressing terms, that his father sent him full powers to act as he thought most conducive to the honour of his country. The prince hesitated not a moment: he signed the truce at Bourdeaux on the twenty-third of March.

After settling the affairs of Guienne the prince embarked with his royal captives, and landed at Sandwich in Kent on the twenty-fifth of May. He was received in every place through which he passed with the greatest expressions of joy; but he constantly refused these honours which were offered him, desiring that the respect intended for him might be transferred with every mark of attention and civility to the French monarch. He was met in Southwark by a thousand of the principal citizens of London on horseback, and the mayor displayed, on this occasion, all the pomp of the city. The entry was truly magnificent. John was dressed in his royal robes, and mounted on a stately white courser, remarkable for its size and beauty, as well as for the richness of its furniture. Young Edward rode on the left-hand of his prisoner, on a little black palfrey, and in a meaner dress, as if studious to avoid every mark of distinction. The streets through which they passed were superbly adorned with plate, tapestry, and armour. The procession reached Westminster-hall about noon, where king Edward, surrounded by a splendid circle of the nobles, and other great men, received his royal prisoner, in all the pomp of state, but at the same time with all the courtesy as if he had been a neighbouring prince, who had come voluntarily to pay him a friendly visit. All the pretensions of Edward to the crown of France seemed to be forgotten, and John in captivity received the honours of a king, which were refused him when seated on the throne. The French monarch behaved with so much propriety on this occasion, as to shew himself truly deserving so generous a treatment: though conquered and a prisoner, he still preserved the dignity of a king. The French noblemen and knights met with the same generous and humane treatment.

The two most powerful enemies of Edward, the kings of France and Scotland, were now his prisoners. The latter, indeed, would have received his liberty long before, had not his subjects refused to pay his ransom. At this juncture he seemed to have little cause to expect any favour from a victorious enemy, who had reduced his country to the greatest distress, and whom, from the late amazing success of his arms in other parts, might, according to the usual frame of the human mind, be supposed not very ready to listen to the dictates of humanity. But he was deceived. Edward, moved by the intreaties of his sister, the queen consort of Scotland, agreed to a negotiation for setting her husband at liberty. The conferences were opened at Berwick, where it was agreed, "That David should be set at liberty, and acknowledged king of Scotland, and an independent monarch, on his giving hostages for the payment of one hundred thousand marks sterling in ten years, by equal portions; and that a truce should subsist, and be inviolably observed by both nations, till the whole should be liquidated."

A.D. 1357. This treaty being ratified, David returned to his kingdom, after a captivity of eleven years. The affairs of Scotland were hardly finished, before the two cardinal legates, who had negotiated the truce with prince Edward, arrived in London, with proposals for a peace: but of so strange a nature, that Edward refused to return them any answer. Baffled in this attempt, they demanded, in the name of his holiness, the arrears of the tribute formerly paid to the see of Rome, amounting to a thousand marks. Edward treated this demand as an obsolete and ridiculous claim; and bid them tell the pontiff, "That he held his kingdom of God alone, and acknowledged no other superior, nor would he pay tribute to any mortal upon earth."

The imprisonment of the French monarch was the signal of a civil war in Paris; every ambitious person became the head of a party. Under a pretence of reformation, factions are generally established. Charles, dauphin of France, was declared regent, and had the mortification of seeing almost the whole kingdom revolt against him. Paris, at that time, began to be a formidable city, for it contained fifty thousand men capable of bearing arms. Charles found himself obliged to release the king of Navarre, whom his father had confined. This was, in fact, letting loose an enemy upon himself. The king of Navarre no sooner obtained his liberty, than he came to Paris to blow the coals of sedition, already sufficiently kindled. Marcel, provost of the merchants of Paris, entered the Louvre at the head of the malecontents, where he caused Robert de Clermont, marshal of France, together with the marshal of Champagne, to be massacred in presence of the dauphin. In the mean time, the peasants tumultuously assembled from all parts, and, in the general confusion, attacked every gentleman they met with, treating them as revolted slaves behave towards those severe masters who happen to fall into their hands. They revenged themselves, by a thousand cruel punishments, for the meanness of their condition. In the midst of these convulsions of state, Charles of Navarre aspired to the crown; and a war was carried on by him against the dauphin, till the latter was obliged to dissemble his resentment, by agreeing to a suspension of hostilities, and pardoning this too powerful and rebellious vassal. The other cities of the kingdom followed the example of the capital: they shook off the dauphin's authority, took the government into their own hands, and spread disorder into every province. The nobles, whose inclinations led them to adhere to the crown, and were naturally disposed to check these tumults, had lost their influence; and being reproached with cowardice, on account of their base desertion of their sovereign in the battle of Poitiers, were treated with universal contempt by the inferior orders. The disbanded soldiers, and the peasants, who had learned something of the art of war, formed themselves into parties in the different provinces, especially beyond the Loire. One of their chiefs took the name of "The Friend of God, and enemy to all the world." A fellow called John of Gouge, a burgher of Sens, was declared king by these banditti, and did almost as much mischief by his depredations as the lawful king had done by his misfortunes.

A.D. 1358. During these dreadful scenes of desolation in France, a treaty was concluded between the kings of France and England; by which it was agreed, that, in consideration of Edward's quitting all claim to the dutchy of Normandy, the counties of Anjou and Maine, and the crown of France, he and his heirs should enjoy Guienne, the Angoumois, Xaintonge, Perigord, Quercy, the Limousin, Poitou, Touraine, Calais, Guines, the Boulonnais, and the county of Ponthieu, free and independent of the crown of France: and that John and the French nobles, who had been taken prisoners with him, should pay, for their ransom, four millions of golden crowns, upwards of a million and a half sterling money. These articles were sent over to the regent of France, who laid them before a meeting of the states, by whom they were rejected with disdain, as destructive at once of the honour and safety of the nation. Edward was highly exasperated at this refusal, and determined to renew the war as soon as the truce was expired; flattering himself that he should succeed better by arms than by negotiations.

A.D. 1359. The resolution of Edward, with regard to an invasion of France, was no sooner known, than the splendour of his former victories induced a prodigious number of adventurers to flock to his standard; and he crossed the sea to Calais at the head of an army of an hundred thousand men. This force was irresistible, and the dauphin was too prudent to hazard a decisive action. He allowed the enemy to spend their fury in the open country, while he employed himself to put all the considerable towns in a posture of defence. It had been determined in a council of war called by Edward near Calais, to penetrate immediately into the heart of France, without losing time in taking places: a wise resolution, had it been punctually observed. But after wasting the province of Picardy, and entering Champagne, Edward was desirous of being invested with the royal diadem of France in the city of Rheims. He accordingly invested the city, where three months were spent without effect, while his army daily diminished by sickness, and he was obliged at last to raise the siege.

A.D. 1360. Early in the spring he entered Burgundy, which, together with the Nivernois, were preserved from his ravages, by paying the contributions he demanded. The Brie and the Gatinois he plundered with the utmost cruelty. He advanced to the gates of Paris, burnt the suburbs of that city, and challenged the dauphin to give him battle; but not being able to make that prudent prince change his plan of operations, he spread his army into the provinces of Maine, Beaufle, and the Chartraine. Here he was overtaken by so dreadful a hurricane, as seemed to threaten the dissolution of the universe. The shock of the elements, in thunder, lightening, and hail-stones of a prodigious size, struck the boldest with terror. No less than six thousand horse, and a thousand foot, were killed on the spot. Edward, with all his courage, was not proof against this dreadful scene: he considered it as a warning from heaven to him, to sheathe the destructive sword of war upon equitable terms. Penetrated with these sentiments, he leaped from his horse, and prostrating himself on the ground, with his arms extended towards the church of Chartres, dedicated to the Virgin, he vowed to agree instantly to a peace with France, if it could be obtained upon just and honourable terms. Several historians have considered this storm as the cause which inspired Edward with pacific dispositions: but perhaps the representations of the duke of Lancaster had more effect on the mind of Edward than this destructive hurricane. He insisted, that the acquisition of the crown of France was not advanced by his successes: that in one day he might lose the advantages he had been several years in obtaining; and that a peace, in his present circumstances, might be concluded, which would annex several provinces to England.

But whatever gave rise to these pacific sentiments, a negotiation was opened at Bretigni, where a treaty was concluded; by which it was agreed, that France should pay, at three different times, three millions of crowns of gold (about a million and a half sterling) for the ransom of king John: That the king of England should renounce his pretensions to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Tourain, and Anjou; and should receive in exchange the provinces of Poitou, Xaintongue, Perigord, the Limosin, Agenois, Quercy, Bigone, Gauze, Angoumois, and Rouergne; and enjoy these territories in the fullest manner; and without any feudal subjection or homage. That the dispute between Charles de Blois, and John de Montfort, with regard to the duchy of Britany, should be candidly discussed, and referred to arbitration, under the sanction of both kings; but if their good offices proved ineffectual, neither should take any part in the quarrel, though the sovereignty of Britany should remain to the king of France, and John de Montfort be restored to the possession of all his estates in that kingdom: That the king of France should renounce alliance with the Scots, and Edward his connections with the Flemings. Forty hostages, among whom were two sons of the French king, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and many of the chief nobility of France, were sent to England, as a security for the performance of these conditions. John made no difficulty to ratify the treaty, and was restored to his subjects.

A. D. 1362. This peace between the two kingdoms being concluded in France, occasioned dreadful disorders in that kingdom. Vast numbers of adventurers, who had enlisted in Edward's army, joined the bands of robbers that had for some time desolated the provinces. Habituated to pillage, and strangers to fear, they committed the most dreadful ravages, and were known by the name of "The Companies." At length John, marquis of Montferrat, being at war with the Viscontis, lords of Milan, took the Companies into his pay, and freed France from these formidable bands of ruffians.

Peace being now restored, young Edward married his cousin, Joan of Kent, the young and beautiful relict of the late earl of Holland. This princess was daughter of Edmund earl of Kent, who had been beheaded in the beginning of the present reign by the intrigues of queen Isabella and the infamous Mortimer; and for her exquisite beauty, she was generally known by the appellation of "The Fair Maid of Kent." The young hero, who had raised the honour of the English to so exalted a pitch, was now created prince of Aquitaine, and invested with the property of many of the noble possessions ceded to the English by the treaty of Bretigni. He soon after crossed the sea, and fixed his residence at Bourdeaux, where he kept a royal court, beloved and respected by all his subjects, who thought themselves peculiarly happy in being governed by so great and generous a prince.

A. D. 1363. The first payment of the ransom for John having been deferred, the princes, who were still hostages at London, began to grow weary of their confinement, and the duke of Anjou broke his parole, and escaped to Paris. This act, so contrary to the principles of honour and justice, filled John with the utmost concern; and he determined, at all events, to execute the conditions of the treaty. His council in vain endeavoured to dissuade him from his design: his purpose was fixed, and every argument lost its force. "If justice and good faith" said he, "were banished from the rest of the earth, they ought yet to retain their habitation in the breasts of princes."

This noble way of thinking, incompatible with the maxims of policy, induced him to return to England, in order to substitute himself in the place of his son, the duke of Anjou. But he did not long survive this action, which he thought absolutely necessary. He died soon after, in the palace of the Savoy, where he had been royally entertained at the king's expence, and the ransom was never paid.

The kingdom of Castile was almost in as miserable a condition as France. The throne was filled by Peter, surnamed The Cruel, from his sanguinary and revengeful disposition. He was placed in the seat of power while a minor, and in very unfavourable circumstances. His father, Alphonso XI. had seven natural children by his mistress, Eleanor of Guzman; and settled such considerable fortunes on them, that they defied the royal authority; while their mother, who enjoyed still more power, insulted the queen dowager. Castile was therefore divided into two parties, one of whom joined the queen-mother, and the other Eleanor. When Peter came of age, and took the reins of government into his own hands, he was obliged to maintain a war against the faction of his natural brothers. He was victorious in a decisive battle; took Eleanor prisoner; and, to satisfy his mother's revenge, put her to death. Soon after, he married Blanche of Bourbon, who falling in love with the grand master of St. Jago, one of those very bastards who was then at war with her husband, she joined the faction, and Peter shut her up in a castle. This greatly augmented the fury of the faction, and Peter was obliged to fight against the king of Arragon and his natural brothers at the same time; but victory still followed his standards; and he made a cruel use of it. He seldom forgave a crime; so that all his relations who had appeared in arms against him, were sacrificed to his resentment; and among the rest the grand master of St. Jago. During these troubles, Blanche of Bourbon died in confinement; and it was universally reported, that she fell by the detested arts of poison. Henry of Transtamare, one of those bastards, animated with a desire of revenging at once both the death of his mother; and that of the grand master of St. Jago, entered into a treaty with Charles V. king of France, and a powerful army was soon raised, under the command of John de Bourbon. Bertrand du Guesclin, a native of Britany; famous for his military abilities, was appointed general in this expedition; and had the address to engage the Companies, now returned from Italy, to follow him into Castile. They had been excommunicated by the pope, and were deeply affected by that sentence; to which they paid a much greater regard than to any maxims of justice and humanity; though it was not sufficient to make them abandon a life of rapine and extortion.

Guesclin, in his passage to Castile, passed by Avignon, where the pope resided; and demanded, sword in hand, both an absolution for his soldiers, and the sum of two hundred thousand livres. It was in vain for the pontiff to plead his inability to perform the latter; no excuses were admitted; and the army left Avignon, hallowed by the blessing, and enriched with the spoils of the holy father.

Transtamare, supported by Arragon; and assisted by those troops which had increased in their march, was proclaimed king in the town of Burgos. It was in vain for Peter to oppose so powerful an army with success, especially as the greater part of his subjects had joined the enemy against him; and thought himself fortunate to escape with his life. He first repaired to the frontiers of Portugal; but being denied entrance into that kingdom, he repaired to Bourdeaux; to implore the aid and protection of the Black Prince.

A. D. 1367. Edward espoused his cause, and undertook to replace him on the throne of Castile. His army passed the Pyrenees in three divisions, each consisting of ten thousand horse. At his approach, all the Companies left Du Guesclin's army, declaring declaring they would never draw their swords against their native prince. But notwithstanding the desertion of the Companies, Henry de Trāntamare and du Gueſclin were ſtill at the head of an hundred thouſand men. Both armies were now in fight of each other, and ſoon after was fought, on the banks of the Ebro near the village of Navarette, the famous battle of that name, between Peter and the Black Prince on one ſide, and Henry de Trāntamare and du Gueſclin, on the other. Edward acquired more honour in this battle than Crecy and Poitiers, becauſe the conteſt was much longer diſputed. The victory was complete; above twenty thouſand of the enemy fell on the field of battle, and Bertrand du Gueſclin and the marſhall of Ardrehen were taken priſoners. Not above four knights and forty private men fell on the ſide of the Engliſh. Peter was re-eſtabliſhed on the throne of Caſtile, and Henry de Trāntamare obliged to fly to Arragon.

But gratitude was not one of Peter's virtues: he deceived his benefactor when he had no longer any need of his aſſiſtance. He reſuſed the ſtipulated pay to the Engliſh forces; and Edward, perceiving that his men daily periſhed by ſickneſs, found himſelf under a neceſſity of leading them back to Guienne. Peter, however, enjoyed not long the good fortune he owed to the perſon he had ſo ungenerouſly treated. The Black Prince had no ſooner croſſed the Pyrenees, and Bertrand du Gueſclin paid his ranſom, than the baſtard of Trāntamare revived the party of the malecontents, and du Gueſclin began to raiſe a new army. The forces of Arragon, the rebels of Caſtile, and the French auxiliaries appeared on the ſide of Trāntamare: while Peter's army conſiſted of the greater part of the Caſtilians, the troops of Portugal, and the Moors of Spain; but his new allies rendered him ſtill more odious, and were of very little ſervice in the day of battle. Trāntamare and du Gueſclin having no longer the genius and fortune of young Edward to contend with, obtained a complete victory in the neighbourhood of Toledo. Peter was taken priſoner by du Gueſclin, and his brother Trāntamare put him to death with his own hand.

A.D. 1369. Edward had contracted beſides a very dangerous diſorder during his campaign in Caſtile, an enormous debt, which Peter had ungenerouſly reſuſed to pay. This obliged him to have recourſe to methods which tranſgreſs the bounds of prudent policy. He totally alienated from him the affections of the French, by impoſing upon them an unuſual and heavy tax. The nobility of Guienne made ſtrong remonſtrances againſt this impoſition, and even carried their complaints to the king of France as their lord paramount. The principal article in the treaty of Bretigni, regarded the renunciation of the ſovereignty, and were to have been made reſpectively by John and Edward, but had remained unexecuted, though the failure in exchanging theſe renunciations was wholly owing to the chicanery of France. Charles, who directed all his affairs by the principles of policy rather than thoſe of juſtice, admitted the appeal of the nobility of Guienne, and ſummoned the prince of Wales to appear perſonally in his court at Paris. The prince, exaſperated at ſo inſolent and unjuſt a meſſage, answered, with all the ſpirit of a young warrior, that it ſhould be at the head of ſixty thouſand men. Charles was not, however, intimidated; he knew the declining years of Edward, the languiſhing ſtate of the prince of Wales's health, and the extreme animosity which the inhabitants of the conquered provinces had expreſſed againſt the Engliſh, would act very powerfully in his favour.

A.D. 1370. The firſt operations of war were commenced in Ponthieu, where the French met with very little oppoſition. The dukes of Berry and Anjou, brothers to Charles, aſſiſted by du Gueſclin, invaded the ſouthern provinces, and ſoon produced an important revolution. The ſtate of the prince's health would not permit him to mount on horſeback, or exert his uſual activity. The brave Chandois, con-ſtable of Guienne, was ſlain in one action, and the capital du Buche, who ſucceeded him, taken priſoner in another. Young Edward ſaw the progreſs of the French with the utmoſt regret; but his diſtemper increaſed ſo faſt upon him, that he was obliged to throw up his command, and return to his native country.

Incenſed at the injuries he had received from Charles, Edward meditated a ſevere revenge, but the infirmities of age ſuffered him not to head his armies in perſon, with that vigour and activity which attended him in the field of Crecy. Sir Edward Knowles was for ſome time very fortunate. He marched from Calais at the head of thirty thouſand men, and extended his ravages to the very gates of Paris, but without being able to bring the enemy to a general engagement. He entered the provinces of Maine and Anjou, and laid them both waſte: but part of his army being there defeated by the admirable conduct of du Gueſclin, now created conſtable of France, the reſt were ſcattered and diſperſed, ſo that inſtead of reaching Guienne, they took ſhelter in Britany, whoſe ſovereign had entered into an alliance with England. The duke of Lancaſter, at the head of twenty-five thouſand men, made, ſoon after, the ſame attempt, and marched the whole length of France, from Calais to Bourdeaux; but his rear was ſo dreadfully haraſſed by flying parties of the enemy, and his foraging parties ſo frequently cut off, that hardly half his army reached the place of their deſtination. One province after another fell into the hands of the enemy, till Bourdeaux, Bayonne, and Calais only remained in the hands of the Engliſh, when the neceſſities of Edward obliged him to conclude a truce with the enemy.

A.D. 1376. But the loſs of his foreign dominions was not the only mortifications, the great Edward met with in the decline of life. The paſſion for military glory, that fired his breaſt during the vigour of his age was now extinguiſhed. His glory was buried in the grave of voluptuouſneſs. After the death of his virtuous queen Philippa, Edward attached himſelf to an inſolent miſtreſs, called Alice Pierce, who now engroſſed the whole regal authority. The parliament on this occaſion preſented a ſpirited remonſtrance, and the imperious lady was baniſhed from the court. Edward alſo ſatiſfied his parliament in another requeſt. The nation had entertained a jealousy of the great power of John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, and apprehended leſt he ſhould himſelf ſeiſe the crown on the death of his father. Edward, therefore, to remove their fears, declared, in full parliament, Richard, ſon to the prince of Wales, his heir and ſucceſſor. Soon after this declaration, the prince paid the debt of nature; an event that plunged the whole nation in the deepeſt ſorrow. He died at Windſor on the eighth of June, in the forty-fixth year of his age.

The character of this prince is truly amiable. His valour and military talents, which procured him the admiration of all Europe, form only a ſubordinate part of his merit. His humanity, generoſity, affability, and moderation, gained him the eſteem of all the world; even the moſt ſhining period of ancient or modern hiſtory would have received a luſtre from his virtues; they were celebrated by his greateſt enemies. Charles of France, though his kingdom had ſuffered ſo ſeverely from his valour, gave a noble mark of his high eſteem for this celebrated hero. He cauſed a ſolemn ſervice to be performed for the repoſe of his ſoul, in the church of Notre Dame, and aſſiſted himſelf in perſon, with the principal part of the nobility of France.

A.D. 1377. The king himſelf ſurvived the death of his favourite ſon but little more than a year. He paid the debt of nature at Shene, near Richmond, in Surry, on the twenty-fiſt of June, in the ſixty-fiſth year of his age, and the fifty-fiſt of his reign. Edward, whether we conſider him as a warrior, a legiſlator, or a monarch, appears to be one of the greateſt greatest princes that ever swayed the English sceptre. The love of glory was, indeed, his predominant passion; and it must be confessed, that he scrupled not to indulge it at the expence of humanity, the lives of his subjects, and the interest of his country. But it should, at the same time, be remembered; that he was a man, and therefore subject to errors; and that the distracted state of affairs on the continent, and the jarring interests of its princes, concurred in flattering his ambition, and inspired him with ideas, which, otherwise, perhaps, he might never have conceived.

But his domestic character is much greater than his military, which has thrown so bright a lustre on the annals of England. He was gracious and obliging to the virtuous and deserving; stern and inexorable to the dissolute and the faithless. He gained the affections of the great, though he curbed their licentiousness: he made them feel his power, though they were not inclined to murmur at his severity. He directed their turbulent spirits against a foreign enemy; and, by his valour and conduct, rendered most of their attempts successful. In conversation he was at once both affable and communicative; nor did he ever disdain to receive instruction from his inferiors, when either their station or learning enabled them to give it. At the same time, he possessed so just a discernment, that few princes ever made a more happy choice of servants, either in the domestic, the civil, or the military departments. He was a friend to the poor, the afflicted, the fatherless, and the widow. He frequently relieved their wants; and his bounty was that of a king; he placed them beyond the reach of their miseries for the future. In the distribution of rewards, he shewed a distinguished judgment; merit was always sure of being rewarded.

Edward was a friend to the constitution of his country, though his passion for glory often obliged him to break through the rules which ought to restrain the royal prerogative. He always consulted his parliament, by which means that assembly acquired a considerable accession of authority during his reign; and the Commons were no longer regarded with that indifference with which they had formerly been treated. They often complained, and not always without effect, of the arbitrary exertions of the royal prerogative; a sufficient proof that the principles of the English constitution, as it is now established, were then well known. In one of Edward's statutes there is this remarkable clause, "That no man, of what estate or condition soever, shall be put out of his land or tenement, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought in answer by due course of law." But the most popular law passed during Edward's reign, was the statute which limited the cases of high treason, before vague and uncertain, to three principal heads; namely, the conspiring the death of the king; the levying war against him, and the adhering to his enemies. The bounds of treason were, indeed, so much limited by this statute, which is still in force without any alteration, that the lawyers were obliged to enlarge them, by explaining a conspiracy for levying war against the king, to be equivalent to a conspiracy against his life; and this interpretation has, from the necessity of the case, been tacitly received.

Edward had a numerous issue by his queen Philippa of Hainault.

1. His eldest son, the heroic Edward, generally called the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour.

2. William of Hatfield, who died in his infancy.

3. Lionel of Antwerp, duke of Clarence; who was first married to Elizabeth de Burgh, heiress of William de Burgh, earl of Ulster. After her death, he married Violante, daughter to the duke of Milan; and died in Italy soon after the consummation of his nuptials, without leaving any posterity by that princess.

4. John of Ghent, duke of Lancaster, from whom sprung that branch which afterwards possessed the crown. He first married Blanche, daughter and co-heiress of Henry duke of Lancaster, to whose title he succeeded. His second wife was Constance, eldest daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, in whose right he assumed the arms and title of that kingdom. After her death, he married Catharine Swinford, who had already bore him several illegitimate children.

5. Edmund de Langley, earl of Cambridge, constable of Dover-castle, and afterwards duke of York.

6. William of Windsor, who died an infant.

7. Thomas of Woodstock, who received the title of earl of Buckingham from his father, and duke of Gloucester from his nephew.

The daughters were,

1. Isabella, married to Ingelram de Coucy, earl of Bedford.

2. Joan, who died of the plague at Bourdeaux.

3. Blanche, who died in her infancy.

4. Mary, married to John de Montfort, earl of Britany.

5. Margaret, married to John de Hastings, earl of Pembroke.

R I C H A R D II. furnamed of BOURDEAUX.

A. D. THIS prince, who was only in the eleventh 1377. year of his age when he ascended the throne, was remarkable for the beauty of his person; a circumstance which, joined with the enthusiastic fondness of the people for his illustrious father, the Black Prince, occasioned an universal joy in the kingdom when he was placed on the throne of his ancestors. His three uncles, the dukes of Lancaster, York, and Gloucester, opposed not his accession. Indeed, their opposite tempers and dispositions formed an unsurmountable obstacle to any attempt of that kind. The coronation of the young monarch was celebrated with the utmost magnificence, and the honour of knighthood was conferred upon several of the young nobility. At this coronation we meet with the first mention in history of a champion, who appeared, completely armed, in Westminster-hall, where his majesty dined. He was attended by the high constable and marshal of England, and preceded by the heralds. When the champion reached the middle of the hall, he threw his gauntlet on the ground; and challenged all persons whatsoever, who should dare to dispute his majesty's title to the crown. The origin of this custom, which is still preserved, is, however, utterly unknown: for though this is the first time we find it mentioned by historians, it is, doubtless, of a much earlier date; since Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office at the coronation of Richard II. was admitted to it by virtue of a right annexed to the manor of Scrivelsby, in Lincolnshire, held by him in right of his wife, the daughter of Sir John Marmion.

The parliament, which met soon after the coronation, established a council of regency; and the Commons proceeded to increase their influence, and to confirm their privileges. But the great power of the king's uncles directed, for some years, the measures of government. Lancaster in particular, though very unpopular, and of a genius not at all adapted to any bold enterprize, yet having been accustomed to govern during the latter part of the late reign, took upon himself the chief direction of affairs, though neither himself nor his two brothers were named in the council of regency.

It was sufficiently evident that a war was, in this situation of affairs, inevitable. The truce concluded with France was now expired, and hostilities had been already commenced by that formidable power, but no action of importance happened between the two kingdoms. Great preparations were, indeed, made, and events of the greatest consequence were expected, when Charles, king of France, paid the debt of nature, and left his crown to his son, Charles VI. a youth only twelve years of age.

A. D. 1381. But though no actions of importance had been performed in the war against France, the great expence attending the several expeditions had exhausted the treasury; and the parliament, in order to raise the necessary supplies, imposed a new and extraordinary tax of three groats on every person, male and female, above fifteen years of age; but they ordained, that in levying this tax, the rich should relieve the poor by an equable compensation. As the money was immediately wanted, and the common method of gathering it would require some considerable time, the court farmed out the grant to a set of rapacious collectors, who extorted it with the utmost rigour from the people. This imposition, added to the cruelty and presumptuous behaviour of the tax gatherers, occasioned one of the most singular mutinies recorded in the annals of history. The people had already acquired some idea of independence, and given several indications of their desire of breaking those chains which had so long been imposed upon them by a haughty nobility. Enthusiasm also assisted to augment this desire, and make the populace acquainted with their own importance. One John Ball, a turbulent but popular preacher, visited various parts of the kingdom, and every where inculcated on his audience the maxims of equal right and liberty to all the goods of nature; and the tyranny of artificial distinctions introduced by a few insolent rulers, in order to aggrandize themselves, and degrade the more considerable part of the species. Doctrines like these, so agreeable to the populace, were embraced with avidity, and kindled in the minds of the vulgar those sparks of rebellion which the insolence of the tax-gatherers blew into a flame.

The insurrection began at Deptford, in Kent; where one of the collectors came to the house of Walter, a tyler, by profession, afterwards better known by the name of Wat Tyler, and demanded three groats for one of his daughters. The peasant refused to comply with the demand, urging, that she was under the age prescribed by act of parliament. The insolent tax-gatherer not only refused to acquiesce in this decision, but offered to produce a very indecent proof to the contrary; and, at the same time, laid hold of the girl. Enraged at this insolence, Tyler beat out the fellow's brains with his hammer. The action was highly approved by the populace of the neighbourhood, who instantly flew to arms. Their example was followed by the peasants of Essex, Surry, Suffex, Hertfordshire, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Lincoln; so that even before the government had any warning of the danger, the disorder was become too great for opposition.

Blackheath was appointed the place of a general rendezvous; and they accordingly assembled there, to the number of an hundred thousand men, under their principal leaders, Wat Tyler, and Jack Straw. The duke of Lancaster was now on the borders of Scotland, and the number of regular troops in the kingdom very inconsiderable; so that the government was thrown into the utmost confusion, as having every thing to fear from this lawless assembly. A council was called in the Tower, where a resolution was taken to send a message to the insurgents, to enquire the cause of this tumultuous meeting. The mutinous rabble received the messengers with the most haughty insolence; and returned for answer, "That they were come to speak to the king about certain important affairs; and desired he would repair to their camp in person, and hear what they had to propose." Many of the council, particularly the archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir Robert Hales, the treasurer, opposed the king's going in person to treat with the rebels; thinking it at once both derogatory to his dignity, and dangerous to his life. But it being represented to the council, that the insurgents were in full march for London, and that it would be impossible to prevent their gaining admittance into the city, the king went down the river in a barge, as far as Rotherhithe; but on approaching the shore, he perceived such symptoms of tumult and insolence, that he put back, and returned to the Tower.

Exasperated at this disappointment, the peasants, who were by this time joined by the city rabble, advanced to the bridge, and threatened to burn the suburbs first, and then the capital itself, if the gates were not immediately opened. Intimidated by this threat, which they were able to carry into execution, their demand was complied with. They entered the city, and immediately gave a loose to every species of excess. They plundered the houses of the most wealthy citizens, and abused their persons, together with those of their wives and daughters. A party of them ran immediately to the duke of Lancaster's palace in the Savoy, and soon reduced that magnificent structure, together with all its splendid furniture, to ashes. Another party set fire to the Temple; while a third repaired to the elegant monastery of St. John of Jerusalem, at Clerkenwell, near Smithfield, and burnt the whole structure, together with all the books, records and papers. They beheaded all the gentlemen that fell into their hands, and expressed a particular animosity against the lawyers and attorneys.

The next morning they divided themselves into three bodies. The first division, under Jack Straw, the second leader in command, marched to Highbury manor, about two miles to the northward of London. The second retired to Mile-End. And the third, under the command of Wat Tyler himself, took up their station in St. Katharine's, and round the Tower, to prevent the escape of the ministers and noblemen who had taken shelter in that fortress, and whom the rabble had devoted to destruction. The king, who had also retired thither for safety, finding the fortress, which was but weakly garrisoned, and almost destitute of provisions, incapable of making any long defence, found means to escape during the night; and hearing that the rebels at Mile-End were the most tractable, and had expressed a desire of treating with the government, he repaired thither, and demanded to know the reason for this tumultuous assembly; telling them, that he was their king, that he was come to hear and redress their grievances. They insisted upon a general amnesty, the abolition of all slavery; liberty of trade in all market-towns, without paying either toll or impost; and that a stated rent should be laid upon lands, instead of the service imposed upon villanage. These requests the king granted very readily, but insisted on their laying down their arms immediately. They made no difficulty of obeying; and returned very quietly to their own houses, leaving a few of each parish to carry down with them the general pardon, and charters of their freedom.

The Burning of St. John's Monastery, near Smithfield, by Wat Tyler's Rabble.

But the rebels under Wat Tyler were of a more ferocious disposition. They were determined to revenge the evils they had suffered on the heads of the nation, and, if possible, carry the romantic scheme of government they had formed into execution. Accordingly, while the king was treating with one division of the insurgents, Wat Tyler demanded admittance into the Tower; and the garrison were so intimidated by the multitude of rebels, that they refused to defend the place, and the gates were accordingly thrown open. This pusillanimous conduct, raised the insolence of the rabble to the highest pitch; and their behaviour was at once both brutish and barbarous. They seized Simon Sudbury, archbishop of Canterbury, then chancellor, dragged him to Tower-hill, and beheaded him with the utmost insolence. Sir Robert Hales, lord treasurer, and Legg, the Flemish farmer of the land-tax, suffered the same fate.

This success, instead of satiating the vengeance, increased the sanguinary disposition of the rebels; every person of any note that fell into their hands, was sacrificed as a victim to their lawless barbarity. The citizens now saw their error in admitting such a turbulent multitude into the city. Their savage practices roused them to revenge, and recovered them from their consternation. Walworth, the lord-mayor, and Philpot, one of the aldermen, promised the king, that they would support him against the rebels, provided some method could be found to amuse them with proposals. Sir John Newton was therefore sent to acquaint them, that the Essex men had accepted certain conditions from the government, in consequence of which they had retired peaceably to their habitations; and that he was empowered to offer them the same terms, on their making the same submission. But the savage plebeians, flushed with their late success, had now formed the most chimerical designs; they proposed to murder the king, together with all the whole nobility, and bury all government in a general anarchy, in order to destroy every species of subordination, and render all men equal. Tyler, therefore, made no other answer to the king's message, than that he would consent to a peace if he liked the terms. Three different charters were sent successively by Richard, in the space of a few hours, but were all rejected with the most provoking insolence.

The ministry and principal men of the city were now thoroughly exasperated, and Richard, attended by the lord mayor, and chief officers of London, rode to Smithfield. Sir John Newton was again sent to the demagogue, inviting him to a conference with the king, in order that his majesty might know his demands, and, if possible, give his consent to their being granted. Tyler now seemed to be alarmed, and moved towards Smithfield, at the head of the rabble, with a very slow and desultory pace. Newton told him the king was waiting for him, and desired he would quicken his march. "Make what haste you please yourself," replied the insolent rebel, "I shall take my own time." The true reason for this delay in the demagogue, arose from his expecting a large reinforcement from Hertfordshire and the adjacent counties, and therefore he would willingly have deferred the conference till their arrival. But the government was now in a capacity to defeat their schemes, and therefore unwilling to suffer them to exercise their savage barbarity any longer. The magistrates of London had assembled a large body of well-armed and well-affected citizens, and Sir Robert Knowles was just arrived at the head of a thousand veterans. When Tyler came into Smithfield, where the king waited for him, Sir John Newton told him that both decency and duty required that he should be uncovered in the presence of his sovereign; but the traitor, instead of complying, was so highly offended, that he would have sheathed his dagger in his breast, had not the king suddenly advanced, and drew off his attention, by asking what he had to request? Tyler was greatly disconcerted; and made such extravagant proposals; and delivered himself in so incoherent a manner, that the king could make no reply. He demanded that all the ancient laws should be abolished; that all bondmen should be free; that all warrens, parks and chafes should be laid open, and every person, the poor as well as the rich, should have free liberty to fish, fowl, and hunt in every part of the kingdom. He added several other particulars relative to the levelling scheme he had formed, but in so confused a manner that they were not understood. The king not being able to comprehend the meaning of what this illiterate leader had advanced, returned no answer, which Tyler considering as a contemptuous refusal, raised his dagger, and at the same time laid hold of the bridle of the king's horse. Walworth, the mayor, who had with difficulty curbed his resentment at the behaviour of this audacious rebel, was now so exasperated that he drew his sword, and struck him so violent a blow, that he fell to the ground, where he was instantly dispatched by Philpot.

The rabble, seeing their leader fall, prepared to take a severe revenge, and a dreadful slaughter would doubtless have ensued, had not Richard prevented it by an amazing presence of mind. He ordered his company to stop; advanced alone towards the enraged multitude, and with an affable and intrepid countenance asked them, "What is the meaning of this disorder; my good people? Are you angry because you have lost your leader? I am your king; I will be your leader." Over-awed by the presence of the king, the insurgents followed him implicitly; and he led them into the fields near Islington to prevent the consequences of any disorder that might arise from an attempt to reduce them to obedience. They had no sooner left the city, than they perceived a large body of forces marching towards them under the command of Sir Robert Knowles. A panic immediately seized the whole multitude: they threw down their arms and begged for quarter. Knowles proposed that all the ringleaders should be put to death, but the king would not permit any sanguinary methods to be taken; and they were accordingly dismissed with the same charters their companions had received. These charters were, however, soon after revoked by the parliament, and the leaders of this extraordinary rebellion severely punished. Such was the end of a faction, which threatened the destruction of the kingdom; but as the deluded populace had no distinguished leader, they could not have long contended with the royal authority. Such tempests, which were then common in Europe, served, however, to shew what sort of government then prevailed.

This remarkable instance of intrepidity and presence of mind in Richard, who was now only sixteen years of age, inspired the people with the highest expectations of his future behaviour. But the presages of early youth are often deceitful. As Richard advanced in years, his conduct abundantly demonstrated that their hopes were built on a delusive foundation; it was soon evident, that he wanted both judgment and capacity. What rendered this want of ability the more alarming to the English was the unsettled state of affairs on the continent, and which threatened to involve all Europe in confusion. On the death of Gregory X. Brignano, bishop of Barri, was elected pontiff, and took the name of Urban VI. But his passionate and turbulent disposition rendered him a very improper person to be placed at the head of the church. He had not long been seated in St. Peter's chair, before he declared, in full consistory, that he was determined to punish the kings of France and England, as the disturbers of the peace of Christendom. Cardinal de la Grange, a Frenchman, and equally passionate with the pope himself, rose from his seat, and shaking his fist at the pontiff, told him that "he lied." This rash word involved all Europe in confusion.

Most of the cardinals, shocked at the brutal disposition of Urban, withdrew to Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples, where they declared the late election void, and proceeded unanimously to the election of a new pontiff; and Robert, son to Amadeus III. count of Geneva, was elected, and took the name of Clement VII. The new pontiff was a person of great parts, eloquent, polite, liberal, and allied to most of the princes of Europe. The emperor, England, Flanders and Hungary, declared for Urban; France, Scotland, Savoy, and Lorraine, for Clement. All the religious orders were divided: the doctors and universities joined also in the contest. The two popes bestowed on each other the appellations of Antichrist and Usurper, and proceeded to mutual excommunications. A civil and religious war was kindled in Europe, and the most horrid cruelties committed by both parties.

A. D. 1382. Clement preached up a crusade against Richard and his subjects; while Urban not only fulminated his excommunications against all the adherents of Clement, but also sent over a commission to Henry Spencer, bishop of Norwich, nominating him the leader of a crusade against his rival. With this commission the pope sent him plenary powers, as his legate, to grant the same indulgences to all who engaged in this expedition, as to those who carried arms against the infidels. The publication of this crusade in England answered the most sanguinary wishes of the pontiff. The nobility, gentry, clergy, and almost all ranks of people, engaged in it with the same ardour and alacrity as if they had been going to fight against an enemy that threatened to put a period to the Christian name.

A. D. 1383. The utmost dispatch was used in embarking the forces; and the bishop landed at Calais on the fourth of May, at the head of fifty thousand foot and two thousand horse. His first attempt was upon Gravelines, which he carried by assault. Intimidated by this success, the inhabitants of Dunkirk opened their gates to the victor. Bourbourg, Cassel, Berg, Furnes, Nieuport, Ostend, Blankenberg, and all the towns on the sea-coast as far as Sluise, followed the example of Dunkirk. Alarmed at this progress of the English, the count of Flanders determined to give them battle. Norwich, depending on the enthusiastic disposition of his followers, marched to meet the enemy, and a bloody battle ensued, in which the count was totally defeated. The king of France, at the head of an army of an hundred thousand men, now advanced to check the progress of the crusaders. The prelate, on a general muster of his forces, found that they amounted to ninety thousand men, occasioned by the continual arrival of fresh reinforcements from England. But many of these were the very dregs of the people, and at once ignorant of discipline and impatient of command. It was, however, resolved in a council of war, to fight the French army; but this was opposed by a large party of the troops, who insisted on their besieging Ypres, where they expected to acquire an immense booty. It was in vain to oppose this strange determination; and the bishop, in order to prevent a mutiny in his army, was obliged to undertake the reduction of that place; a step which ultimately proved fatal to his enterprize. The approaches were carried on with great intrepidity; but he was at last obliged to raise the siege, and send to England for a reinforcement. But so many difficulties occurred, that the season was lost before any thing could be effected; and the bishop returned to England with the poor remains of his army.

This miscarriage of the prelate did not, however, put an end to the schism in the church: it lasted forty years; during which space of time, religion was made a pretence for the greatest enormities. It was during this period of papal confusion, that John Wickliff, a secular priest educated at Oxford, and distinguished for the austerity of his life and manners, ventured to inculcate tenets nearly the same with those propagated by the reformers in the sixteenth century. He denied the doctrine of the real presence, the merit of confession and monastic vows, and the supremacy of the pope. He maintained, that the numerous ceremonies of the church were destructive of true piety; that the scripture was the sole rule of faith; that the church was dependent on the state, and ought to possess no temporal wealth; and that no taxes ought to be levied upon the people till the riches of the ecclesiastics had been expended in the service of the kingdom. These opinions, which had their rise from the usurpations and abuses of the clergy, being well calculated to flatter the people, excited them to rebellion. Wickliff was, however, protected against the attempts of the ecclesiastics by many of the greatest men in the kingdom; particularly the duke of Lancaster, who greatly favoured the doctrines of this first reformer. Wickliff being summoned to appear in a synod held by the bishop of London in St. Paul's cathedral, the duke accompanied him; and in the course of his examination, insulted the bishop, and even proceeded to threats; upon which the synod broke up in great confusion. The profelytes of this reformer were called Wickliffites, and Lollards; but as the principal leaders softened or retracted those tenets which were most obnoxious to the church, this innovation produced no revolution. The respect, however, for the holy see, was every day diminishing; and the violent schism already mentioned contributed greatly to open the eyes of the people, and rouse them from that superstitious lethargy which had so long affected the inhabitants of Europe.

A. D. 1385. The Scots had taken advantage of the minority of Richard to disturb the peace of the northern counties, and a large army was raised to chastise their insolence. Richard headed his army in person. He entered Scotland by Berwick; while the Scots, who dreaded a pitched battle with the English, abandoned the low country, crossed the English borders on the west, and plundered the counties of Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Lancashire. Richard, in the mean time, advanced to Edinburgh, and destroyed all the towns and villages that lay in his rout. He reduced that city to ashes. He treated in the same manner Perth, Dundee, and other places in the low country. But when he was desired to march towards the western coast, in order there to wait the return of the enemy, and take a severe revenge on them for the devastations they had committed, his impatience to be in England, and enjoy his usual pleasures and amusements, were more prevalent; and he carried back his army, without effecting any thing by these mighty preparations.

The French court had long been desirous of wresting their sea-ports out of the hands of the English; and they were persuaded that an opportunity now offered for that purpose; the duke of Lancaster having carried into Spain all the flower of the English military force, in order to prosecute his empty claim to the crown of Castile. Great preparations were therefore made in France for an invasion of England, as the most proper method of succeeding in their design. They collected an immense fleet and army at Sluise. All the nobility of France were engaged in this enterprize, and the English were kept for some time in perpetual alarms. The French army, when reviewed at Arras, consisted of eighty thousand men at arms, with their followers on horseback, besides a prodigious number on foot. Twelve hundred and eighty-seven ships of all sorts were ready at Sluise to carry over this numerous army; and several warlike engines of a new construction were put on board the fleet. This amazing armament engaged the attention of all Europe. The English were intimidated, particularly the city of London. The militia of the kingdom were ordered to the sea-coast; the ports and harbours were put in a posture of defence; and all the beacons on the coast prepared for giving the alarm, whenever the enemy should appear. A fleet was also fitted out to guard the channel, and every prudent measure which reason could suggest was pursued with the utmost care and alacrity.

But the safety of England was principally owing to other causes. Ambition and envy, so often the destruction of public undertakings, had poisoned the French councils. The duke of Berry, a prince of a covetous and aspiring disposition, was no friend to this undertaking, in which he thought neither his dignity nor interest had been sufficiently consulted, and therefore determined to render the whole abortive. In order to this, he proceeded so slow in assembling the troops, that it was the middle of September before he joined the army at the head of his division. The forces were, however, embarked, and the fleet failed out of the harbour with a fair wind. But they had not left their own coast above two hours before the wind changed to the opposite quarter, and a dreadful storm succeeded, which, in a few hours, scattered the whole navy. Some of the ships were driven back into the harbour of Sluise; some were dashed on the rocks, others foundered at sea, and many of the stragglers were taken by the English. Such was the end of those mighty preparations which had held all Europe in suspense.

Richard had for some time considered the subjection in which he was held by his uncles with great regret, and determined to break these ignoble chains. Accordingly he threw himself into the arms of Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young nobleman of an agreeable figure, but of very dissolute manners, more calculated to corrupt the prince than to govern the kingdom. This favourite engrossed the affection of Richard, who knew not how to set bounds to his liberality. He created him duke of Ireland, and conferred on him for life the sovereignty of that island; even the whole authority of the government was by degrees lodged in his hands. Michael de la Pole, the chancellor, and lately created earl of Suffolk, was another of his favourites. He was possessed of great military talents, and had served in the army with applause. He had also been employed in several embassies and treaties of peace, in all which he had distinguished himself by his prudence, integrity, capacity and judgment; but his particular friendship for the duke of Ireland rendered him obnoxious to the people.

The princes of the blood, and the chief nobility, who now saw themselves stripped of their power, determined to attack the favourites, and recover their former influence. An impeachment was accordingly drawn up against the chancellor, and Gloucester undertook to carry it to the house of lords. It was, however, thought proper to observe the appearance of decency at least, and accordingly the commons sent a message by their speaker to the king, importing, that unless the chancellor was removed, they could not proceed in the dispatch of public business. Richard, who little expected a motion of this nature, received the address with an indignation he could not conceal. He told the speaker very sharply, "That it would better become the parliament to attend to the business for which they were summoned, than to concern themselves with his servants." Nor did he give them leave to renew their address: he set out immediately for Eltham in Kent, left his presence should be construed as a sanction to the proceedings of the parliament.

The king having thus withdrawn himself from the national council, a message was sent him by the duke of Gloucester and the bishop of Ely, desiring him, in the name of the parliament, to return: declaring, in case of refusal, that they would immediately dissolve themselves. Richard finding himself unable to resist, was obliged to be contented with stipulating, that except finishing the present impeachment against Suffolk, no attack should be made against any other of his ministers. The accusation was at once both frivolous and unjust; but innocence was but a poor defence against the turbulent envy of the barons; Suffolk was condemned and deposed from his office.

This step was an introduction to greater excesses. Gloucester and his associates, indeed, observed their stipulation with the king, they attacked no more of his ministers; but they proceeded much farther; they attacked the regal power. The king was deprived of his authority; and the exercise of the sovereign power entrusted to fourteen commissioners, whose jurisdiction was limited to a twelvemonth, though it was sufficiently evident, that the party of Gloucester never meant to re-instate their monarch in his prerogatives. They obliged him not only to sign this commission, but to take an oath never to infringe it. Richard, however, entered a protest against this violence at the end of the session, declaring, that the prerogatives of his crown, notwithstanding his late concession, should still be deemed entire and unimpaired.

A.D. 1387. This protest had no effect on the commissioners: they proceeded directly to the exercise of their office; and Richard found himself destitute of all authority. The king was, however, determined to make one attempt for the recovery of his power. He assembled the judges and lawyers, who made no scruple of declaring, that the commission was derogatory to the royal authority; that those who procured it, or advised the king to consent to it, were punishable with death; that those who compelled him were guilty of treason; that those were equally criminal who should persevere in maintaining it; that the king has the right of dissolving parliaments when he pleases; that the parliament while they sit, must proceed first upon the king's business; and that they cannot, without the king's consent, impeach any of his ministers and judges.

It was not long before the duke of Gloucester and his party were informed of this secret consultation, and immediately had recourse to arms, and demanded that the persons who had seduced the king by their pernicious counsel, should be delivered up as traitors to the state. A few days after they appeared in his presence armed, and attended by their followers; where they accused the archbishop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Tresilian, and Sir Nicholas Bramble, as public and dangerous enemies to the kingdom. The duke of Ireland saved himself by flight; but the others were condemned and executed. Force became the only rule of law in those unfortunate times, when the passions of the great seemed to have annihilated every idea of justice.

A.D. 1388. During the scenes of anarchy in the English government, the Scots pursued their desultory war with great advantage; but nothing worthy a place in history happened till the beginning of August, when they entered Northumberland with a small army, consisting of three hundred horse and two thousand foot, all veterans, and commanded by the two Douglasses, the earls of Fife, Murray, and Dunbar, the most celebrated commanders in the Scottish army. They ravaged the whole country through which they passed, and advanced as far as the gates of Newcastle, where the lord Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur, son to the earl of Northumberland, first opposed them. But his troops were defeated, and himself was unhorsed in single combat by the younger Douglas, who having seized his lance, vowed to carry it to Scotland as a trophy of his victory. Inflamed with rage at his late misfortune, Hotspur vowed that Douglas should never carry his lance to Scotland in triumph. He accordingly collected a body of six hundred horse and eight thousand foot, and putting himself at their head marched in pursuit of the enemy, without waiting for a reinforcement of troops that were hastening to join him under the command of the bishop of Durham.

Elated with their late success the Scots had undertaken the siege of the castle of Otterborn, and were lying before that fortress when Percy, by forced marches, marches, reached their camp. Rage had stifled prudence in the breast of Percy: he would not delay the engagement for a moment, though his troops were so greatly fatigued with their long marches, and though night was approaching when he came up with the enemy. He attacked the Scots with all the fury of a disappointed warrior, but the darkness rendered it impossible to continue the contest, and they separated without either obtaining the victory. The moon rising at midnight, however, occasioned the battle to be renewed with great fury, and at last victory declared for the Scots, Douglas was slain, and Percy taken prisoner.

A. D. 1389. The king's authority seemed now totally annihilated: the combination of the princes of the blood and chief nobility had so far engrossed the royal power, that a revolution was apparently inevitable. But the event proved otherwise. Richard, who was now in his twenty-third year, declared, in a full council held at Easter, his intention of directing the affairs of his kingdom and household by his sole authority, and taking into his own hands the reins of government. No opposition being made to so reasonable a design, Richard immediately demanded the great seal from the archbishop of Canterbury, and gave it to William of Wickham, bishop of Winchester. He removed the duke of Gloucester and the earl of Warwick from the council-board, and supplied their places with others whom he thought more worthy of his confidence. The bishop of Hereford was deprived of his office of treasurer, and the earl of Arundel of that of admiral. These changes were made without the least opposition; the dukes of Gloucester and York affected to return to their duty; and Richard, by passing a general amnesty, and remitting some subsidies which had been granted him by parliament, acquired the affections of the people, who easily pass from one extreme to another. The kingdom from this period enjoyed tranquillity for a considerable time. A truce of twenty-five years was concluded with France, which was followed with the restitution of Breſt and Cherbourg; and Richard, who was now a widower, was affianced to the daughter of Charles VI. though she was then only seven years of age. This alliance was thought necessary in order to support the king against the enterprises of his uncles, who envied the power of his ministers.

A. D. 1397. But this confederacy with France gave offence to the English, who had contracted a violent antipathy against that nation; and the conduct of Richard was not calculated to procure the respect of his subjects. A slave to pleasure, and incapable of applying himself to business; under the dominion of favourites, on whom he profusely lavished the revenues of the crown, and the grants of the people; and fullying the dignity of his rank, by admitting persons of very mean condition to his familiarity; he was considered as totally unworthy of wearing the English crown.

Gloucester took advantage of the king's weakness to renew his intrigues. He absented himself from the court; hardly ever appeared in council but to oppose the measures of the administration; and exerted all his abilities to cultivate and increase his popularity with the nation. The invectives he employed against the government, against the long truce concluded with Charles, and against the marriage of Richard, joined to his address in fomenting the hatred against France, and in reviving the desire of ravaging again that hostile kingdom, made the deepest impressions on the minds of a people disposed at all times to revolt, and ever impatient under imaginary distresses.

The ministry saw their danger, and the king, whose precipitate temper admitted of no deliberation, ordered Gloucester to be unexpectedly arrested. The attempt succeeded; the duke was hurried on board a ship lying in the river ready to receive, and carry him over to Calais, where alone it was thought he could be safely detained in custody. The earls of Arundel and Warwick were seized at the same time: the malecontents were astonished and over-awed by being so suddenly deprived of their leaders; and the dukes of Lancaster and York, with the earls of Derby and Rutland, having joined the ministry, they were bereaved of all possibility of resistance.

To put a final period to this opposition, a parliament was immediately summoned at Westminster, and the members entered with violence into all the measures of the court. They annulled the act of amnesty which Richard had voluntarily confirmed: they prosecuted the archbishop of Canterbury, the earls of Arundel, Warwick, and other noblemen, several of whom were condemned and executed, for having been engaged in former attempts against the crown, notwithstanding the pardon they had received. The prosecution against Gloucester was just going to be commenced, when intelligence of his death arrived. It was pretended that he died suddenly of an apoplexy; but it was the general opinion that he had been murdered in consequence of orders from his nephew; and in the succeeding reign, undoubted evidence was produced in parliament of his having been suffocated with pillows by those who had the care of his person. Thus fell Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, the victim of his enemies treachery, and of his own imprudent conduct. With many great and good qualities, he joined an inordinate thirst after popularity, in the pursuit of which he too often lost sight of that respect which should always be preferred to majesty; and whatever advantages he might intend to procure to his country, the measures he took for that purpose were such as no court, that had the least regard to its own honour or consequence, could suffer implicitly.

The death of Gloucester was no sooner known, than his brothers, the dukes of Lancaster and York, hastened to London at the head of a numerous body of forces, threatening to take the most severe revenge on the authors of this execrable tragedy, not excepting even the king himself. Richard had, however, taken all the precautions necessary to divert the force of the expected storm. He had not only gained over the parliament to his devotion; but also collected an army of twenty thousand veterans, and stationed them in the neighbourhood of London. Nor did he depend on the forces he had raised; he had recourse also to the milder methods of negotiation, and the two brothers, finding that all resistance would be in vain, listened to an accommodation.

A. D. 1398. But the party of the duke of Gloucester was hardly suppressed before another arose which proved fatal to Richard. The principles of honour were at this time so little known among the nobility, that Henry duke of Hereford, son to the duke of Lancaster, accused, before the council, the duke of Norfolk, of having spoken in private many slanderous words against the king. Norfolk gave him the lie, and offered to prove his innocence by single combat, a method of trial then authorized by the laws of the kingdom. The challenge was accepted, and the dispute ordered to be decided according to the laws of chivalry, in presence of the king and his whole court.

Both the noblemen appeared on the day appointed, the trumpets sounded, and they were preparing to rush against each other, when the king interposed, to prevent the effusion of noble blood, and commanded them to depart the kingdom; but their sentences were unequal; the exile of Norfolk was for life; but Hereford only for ten years. Both, however, obeyed the royal mandate. Norfolk, who knew he had nothing to expect from Richard, retired into Germany, and afterwards to Venice, where he soon after paid the debt of nature: he did not live to see the revolution which soon happened in his country. The duke of Hereford was more resigned to his fate; he waited on the king to take his leave before he quitted the kingdom, and this submissive missive and respectful behaviour had such an effect upon Richard, that he remitted four years of the time assigned for his banishment; and also empowered him, by letters patent, to enter into immediate possession of any estates that might fall to him during his exile, and to postpone the homage till his return.

A.D. 1399. Hereford had left the kingdom only a few months, when his father, John of Ghent, duke of Lancaster, paid the debt of nature; and his son, in consequence of his rights, and the letters patent he had received, desired to be put in possession of the estate and jurisdiction of his father. But Richard, to the eternal stain of his memory, denied this request, revoked the letters patent he had given to Hereford, decreed his banishment should be perpetual, and confiscated all his paternal estate.

Hereford was highly exasperated at this scene of complicated iniquities. He was of a bold and enterprising spirit; he had signalized his courage and intrepidity both at home and abroad: he was beloved by the people, and adored by the soldiers. He was always cool, sedate, and prudent; and was considered as the only English prince that deserved the public confidence and esteem. His misfortunes were lamented, and the injuries he had received complained of by all ranks of people. He was secretly invited to return to England, and assured of being sufficiently supported in the recovery of his lawful inheritance. Hereford, now duke of Lancaster, determined to embrace the generous offer; and an event soon happened which gave him all the advantage he could desire.

Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had been lately killed in a rencounter with a small party of the Irish; and Richard, in order to reduce the rebels to subjection, and revenge the death of the presumptive heir to his crown, resolved to pass over into that island, and head his army in person. He accordingly embarked at Bristol; and, after a short passage, landed at Waterford, at the head of two thousand men at arms, and ten thousand archers. Struck with consternation at seeing the king of England at the head of so powerful an army, the most considerable part of the rebels submitted, and the rest were soon reduced to obedience.

Lancaster embraced this opportunity of returning to England. He embarked at Nantz with a retinue of sixty persons, and landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, where he was immediately joined by the lords Willoughby, Roos, D'Arcy, and Beaumont, and several gentlemen of distinction, attended by a numerous body of vassals and adherents. A few days after, his party was increased by the arrival of the earl of Northumberland, with his son Hotspur Percy, and his brother the earl of Westmoreland, at the head of such a numerous body of forces, that Henry's small retinue was increased to an army of sixty thousand men. Lancaster now took a solemn oath, that his sole design in this invasion was that of recovering the duchy of Lancaster, unjustly detained from him. At the same time, he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of equity and their country, to second him in this reasonable and moderate pretension. The duke of York, who was left guardian of the realm during the king's absence, assembled an army of forty thousand men, and marched at their head to St. Albans; but upon reviewing his forces, the soldiers declared to a man, that they would not draw a sword against Henry of Lancaster. The guardian himself did not, indeed, seem to be well affected to the cause he had undertaken to defend: he made no difficulty of declaring, that he would second his nephew in recovering his just rights. It is, therefore, no wonder that he listened to a message sent him by Henry, who intreated him not to oppose a loyal and humble supplicant in the recovery of his legal patrimony. The guardian was so far from opposing, that he joined the party of Henry; and his soldiers followed the example of their leader with the utmost acclamations of joy.

Lancaster was now master of the kingdom, and marched directly to Bristol, where some of Richard's ministers had shut themselves up, in order to defend the fortress against the attempts of an enemy whose favour they had no hopes of obtaining. The garrison, however, made but a poor defence; they soon surrendered; and Henry, yielding to the request of the people, ordered the earl of Wiltshire, Sir John Busby, and Sir John Green, who were taken prisoners, to be executed immediately, without even the form of a trial. An act of barbarity which at once sufficiently displays the ferocious manners of the times, and the injustice of Henry's proceedings.

Richard no sooner received intelligence of this invasion, than he hastened over from Ireland, and landed in Milford-haven with a body of twenty thousand men. But his soldiers, like the rest of their brethren, were so strongly attached to the fortunes of Henry of Lancaster, that his army melted away like snow before the sun; and Richard soon perceived that he was in no condition of meeting the enemy. Distracted with a variety of thoughts, he knew not what course to pursue. Wavering and irresolute, he knew not whom to trust, or whom to fear. At length he determined to desert his forces, and take refuge in Wales. Accordingly he retired, with the dukes of Exeter and Surry, the bishop of Carlisle, and a few other attendants, to Conway-castle, proposing to take the first opportunity of embarking for Ireland or France, and there wait for some favourable crisis of recovering his crown, which he was now incapable of defending.

Sensible of his danger, should Richard find means to execute his design, Henry dispatched the earl of Northumberland, with the strongest professions of loyalty and submission; and that nobleman, by the most infamous treachery and false oaths, made himself master of the king's person, and carried him to his enemy at Flint castle. Lancaster lost no time in conveying his royal captive to London, where he was received with the most barbarous insults, and committed to the Tower. But though Lancaster had acquired possession of the person of his sovereign, he was very uneasy with regard to the best method of disposing of that unfortunate monarch, and several councils were held on that subject. At last it was resolved to persuade Richard to make a formal resignation of his power, and to procure an authentic confirmation of the deed by the parliament. For some time Richard refused to submit to so humiliating a circumstance; but at last, finding himself abandoned by all his friends, and sensible of his incapacity to resist the torrent of popular hatred, or, perhaps, desirous of gaining time to save his life, and procure assistance from France, Richard submitted; and, in the presence of a great number of lords assembled on the occasion, the king surrendered up the crown, sceptre, and other ensigns of royalty; and then taking the signet-ring from his finger, he presented it to the duke of Lancaster. At the same time, he desired the archbishop of York, and the bishop of Hereford, to notify to the parliament his resignation of the crown; and to acquaint them, that he wished his cousin, the duke of Lancaster, might be chosen his successor.

But Henry, well knowing that this resignation would plainly appear the result of force, he proposed, notwithstanding the danger of the precedent to himself and his posterity, to have the king solemnly deposed in parliament, for his pretended tyranny and misconduct. Accordingly a charge, consisting of thirty-three articles; was drawn up against him, and presented to that assembly; who, without examining one of the articles, though many of them were false in fact, and though all of them turned chiefly on arbitrary acts, of which the late reign furnished many stronger examples; the barons, though guilty themselves of so many illegal violences, unanimously, and with the consent of the Commons, deposed their sovereign. Nor was there found more than than one man who had courage and virtue sufficient to stand up, and plead in defence of his unhappy master. This was the bishop of Carlisle, who nobly sustained the cause of fallen majesty, amidst this universal disloyalty and violence. But his eloquence was exerted in vain; and Lancaster, exasperated at the bold truths he uttered, sent him prisoner to the Tower.

The crown was now declared vacant: upon which the duke of Lancaster arose from his seat; and after crossing himself on his forehead and breast, and calling upon the name of Christ, he declared, "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit," that the vacant throne belonged to him, as the descendant of Henry III. and "through the right which God had sent him, with the assistance of his friends, to recover a kingdom which was on the point of being ruined by misconduct and oppression."

In order the better to conceive the meaning of these perplexed and obscure expressions, it must be observed, that Henry of Lancaster, supposing the throne really vacant, was not the immediate heir. The duke of Clarence, the elder brother of the late duke of Lancaster, had left a grandson, whose title was therefore preferable to that of Henry. He therefore went back as far as Henry III. in order to avail himself of an absurd but popular tradition, which supposed that Edmund, earl of Lancaster, son to Henry III. was really the elder brother of Edward I. but that, by reason of some deformities in his person, he had been postponed in the succession, and his younger brother imposed upon the nation in his stead. This pretence was, however, destitute of the least foundation; but the parliament made no inquiry; the most palpable absurdities would have passed for truths; and Henry was placed on the throne of England.

The unfortunate Richard did not long survive the loss of his crown; he soon fell a victim to the lawless ambition of his enemies; but the manner of his death is uncertain. Fabian tells us, that Sir Piers Exton, and others of his guards, fell upon him in the castle of Pontefract, where he was confined; and that Richard, wresting a pole-axe out of the hand of one of the assassins, defended himself so nobly, that he put four of them to death before they could finish their bloody purpose. But it is more probable, that he was starved to death in prison; because his body was exposed in public, and no marks of violence were observed upon it. He died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign.

Richard was a very weak prince, and entirely incapable of holding the reins of government in these ferocious times, when the utmost disorder and licentiousness had spread themselves through the whole kingdom. In more peaceable ages, he might have swayed the sceptre without incurring the hatred, perhaps with the applause of his people. But every thing was hostile during this period; and the genius and abilities of his father were scarce sufficient to curb the licentiousness of his ferocious nobility. Richard sunk in the unequal contest. But all the evils which have been imputed to his government, seem to have proceeded less from a settled design of establishing arbitrary power, than from the insolence of victory, and the necessities of the king's situation. Richard left no posterity, either legitimate or illegitimate.

HENRY IV. surnamed of BOLINGBROKE.

The first of the LANCASTER LINE that filled the English throne.

A. D. 1399. THE usurpation of Henry was so palpable, and the right of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, so clear and evident, that all the courage, capacity, and discernment of the new monarch, were necessary to prevent the disorders that attended the commencement of his reign. The session of parliament, which met on the sixth of October, had hardly finished the business of settling the kingdom, before a conspiracy was formed to deprive Henry of a crown to which he had no legal claim. Several of the principal nobility of the kingdom were engaged in this design; and in order to render their undertaking successful, they prevailed on one Maudlin, a priest, who greatly resembled Richard both in shape and features, to personate that unfortunate prince, when their scheme was ripe for execution.

The conspirators were persuaded, that it would not be difficult to surprize Henry, who was then in a bad state of health at Windsor, attended by a few of his nobility. It was therefore agreed, in order to assemble a sufficient number of persons without suspicion, to propose a tilting-match of twenty on a side, to be held at Oxford. Henry was to be invited to be a spectator of this manly exercise. If he accepted the invitation, they imagined it would be very easy to seize his person: if he refused it, they were to march secretly to Windsor-castle, where they flattered themselves with obtaining an easy admittance.

A. D. 1400. Every particular was conducted with the utmost precaution, and on the point of being carried into execution, when Henry discovered the whole design by the treachery of the earl of Rutland. The king perceived his danger, and suddenly withdrew to London; and the conspirators, who came to Windsor with a body of five hundred horse, found that they were betrayed. The insurgents were seized, and executed without any trial, conformable to the practices of these ferocious times, and which will always be the custom when violence stifles the voice of law and equity. The earl of Rutland now exhibited the most shocking spectacle to every one who was not totally destitute of the common feelings of humanity. He presented to Henry, as a testimony of his return to loyalty, the head of lord Spencer, his brother-in-law. The infamous Rutland, who thus dishonoured his birth by so base an action, had been instrumental in the death of his uncle, the duke of Gloucester; and had deserted Richard, by whom he had been trusted, and from whom he had received the greatest marks of friendship and esteem. The most detestable perfidies are constantly committed by those who have no other rule of conduct than their own interest.

Henry saw all the danger of his situation; and well knew, that the late executions must give rise to animosities that are always dangerous to the royal authority; and therefore determined, if possible, to gain the clergy over to his party. It was suspected that he had imbibed all the principles of his father in favour of the Lollards; but he now made no difficulty of sacrificing his principles to his interest. He caused a law to be passed by the parliament, whereby it was enacted, that when any heretic, who relapsed, or refused to abjure his opinions, was delivered over to the secular arm by the bishop or his commissaries, he should be committed to the flames by by the civil magistrate, before the whole people. This sanguinary statute was the source of additional distress to the people, who were already sufficiently acquainted with misfortunes. Nor was it long before so execrable a law was carried into execution. William Soutre, rector of St. Osithes, in London, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliff, was condemned by the synod of Canterbury, and the unhappy man perished in the flames for his opinions.

The unsettled state of the English government encouraged Glendour, a descendant of the ancient princes of Wales, to make incursions into the English territories. A troublesome and tedious war was kindled, which the Welsh prince long sustained by his valour and activity, assisted by the natural strength of that country, and the untamed spirit of the inhabitants. In one of these encounters, the earl of Marche, who had armed his followers in defence of Henry, was taken prisoner. But notwithstanding his loyalty, Henry suffered him to remain in captivity; nor would he permit the earl of Northumberland to ransom him, though he owed his crown to the assistance of that powerful family.

A. D. 1401. The Scots also took advantage of the disorders of England, and committed dreadful ravages in the northern counties. The largest division of the enemy, consisting of twelve thousand men, was headed by Archibald, earl of Douglas. Hotspur Percy attacked the invaders at Homeldon, or Halydown-hill; and after a furious engagement, obtained a complete victory. Above seven thousand Scots were killed on the field of battle; and the earls of Douglas, Fife, Angus, Athol, and Montieth, with a great number of other officers of distinction, were taken prisoners. Henry no sooner received intelligence of this victory, than he wrote a letter, full of the warmest expressions of gratitude, to the earl and his son; but at the same time, strictly enjoined them not to ransom any of their prisoners. This was regarded as an arbitrary usurpation of power; all prisoners being, by the laws of war, which then prevailed, the sole property of the victors.

A. D. 1403. The family of Northumberland were highly exasperated at this command of Henry, who owed his crown chiefly to their power. Thomas Percy, earl of Worcester, brother to the earl of Northumberland, had other causes to excite his resentment. He had been made vice-chamberlain and admiral by Richard: he loved the person of his old master and benefactor while living, retained a grateful sense of his benefits after his death, and could not but detest Henry, as the author of his murder, and the usurper of his crown. He therefore joined his brother, to drive from the throne a person who had no title to fill it, and whose power was founded on the blood of his master. Preparations were accordingly made by the powerful family of the Percies for wresting the sceptre from the hands of Henry. An alliance was concluded with Glendour; and Hotspur offered earl Douglas his liberty without ransom, if he would join the Northumberland army; a proposal which that martial nobleman very readily accepted, as he had long borne an inveterate hatred to the whole house of Lancaster.

An army was soon assembled; but before the troops were ready to take the field, the earl of Northumberland was seized with a sudden illness at Berwick, and the chief command devolved upon Hotspur Percy, who led his forces to Shrewsbury, in order to join the troops of Glendour. Percy now sent a manifesto to Henry; in which he renounced his allegiance, and set that prince at defiance. He likewise enumerated all the grievances of which the nation so loudly complained, and which he was now determined to redress. He accused Henry of perjury: for soon after his landing at Ravenspur, he had sworn upon the gospels, in presence of the earl of Northumberland, that his sole intention was that of recovering possession of the duchy of Lancaster, and that he would ever remain a faithful subject to king

Richard. He aggravated his guilt in first dethroning; and then murdering that prince; and in usurping upon the title of the house of Mortimer, to whom the crown justly belonged; both by lineal descent, and the declaration of parliament. He complained loudly of the cruelty exercised against the earl of Marche, who was suffered to remain a captive in the hands of the enemy, nor were any of his friends permitted to treat for his ransom. He charged him with perjury in loading the nation with heavy taxes; after having sworn, that, without the utmost necessity, he would never levy any impositions upon his people.

Henry answered this manifesto, in order to exculpate himself from the crimes with which he was charged; and accused the Percies, in his turn, of having excited an unnatural rebellion against the established government; and against him, who had, on all occasions, distinguished them from the rest of his subjects by every act of munificence and friendship that a sovereign could bestow upon his most favourite counsellors. He offered to lay aside every privilege of prerogative, to grant the Percies a safe conduct, and suffer them to lay all their complaints before their peers, where they should be candidly heard, and, if well founded, both theirs and the public grievances redressed.

But Henry was not to learn, that remonstrances were of very little use among his ferocious nobility; and fortunately for him, he had, at that time, an army which had been assembled against the Scots, ready to take the field. Percy, who did not so soon expect to be opposed by a royal army, was obliged to abandon the siege of Shrewsbury, which he had just invested, and prepare for an engagement. He encamped at Hartlefield, where he resolved to hazard a battle, though he had not yet been joined by Glendour's forces. The great bravery of the two leaders promised an obstinate contest for the palm of victory; and the equality of the two armies, each being about twelve thousand men, a number which rendered them not unmanageable by the commanders, gave sufficient reason to expect, that the field of battle would be deluged with the blood of the contending parties.

The shock was at once both dreadful and constant. Henry's infantry at first gave ground, and the whole army would have been thrown into confusion, had not the impetuous valour of Percy and Douglas given the royalists an opportunity of rallying. These two chiefs fought side by side, and opened themselves a passage to the spot where the royal standard was erected, and where they knew Henry fought in person, both contending who should have the honour of encountering the royal warrior. Percy supported that renown which he had acquired in so many bloody combats; and Douglas, his ancient enemy, and now his friend, still appeared his rival amidst the horrors and confusion of the battle. Their ardour, however, proved fatal to their cause: they charged with such desperate fury, and pierced with such rapidity the ranks of the enemy, that few of their men could follow them. They were soon surrounded by heaps of dead bodies, and the royal standard was thrown to the ground. Nor did Henry flinch from the storm of battle; he exposed his person in the thickest of the fight. His gallant son, whose military achievements afterwards became so famous, and who here performed his apprenticeship in arms, followed the example of his father; and even a wound, which he received in the face with an arrow, could not oblige him to quit the field. Henry, however, in order either to elude the attacks of the enemy upon his person, or to encourage his own men by the belief that he was present every where, had dressed several persons in the royal garb; and the sword of Douglas, who seemed determined that the king of England should fall by his arm, rendered that honour fatal to many. But while both armies were contending in this furious manner, Percy fell by an unknown hand. This accident decided the victory in favour of the royalists. Above two thousand five hundred gentlemen are said to have perished in that sanguinary contest; but the persons of the most distinction in the royal army were the earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir Nicholas Gansel, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir John Mafsey, and Sir John Caverly. About six thousand private men perished, of whom two thirds belonged to Piercy's army. The earls of Worcester and Douglas were taken prisoners; the former was beheaded at Shrewsbury, but the latter dismissed without ransom, on account of his valour.

During these transactions the earl of Northumberland, being recovered from his illness, was advancing at the head of a very considerable body of troops to reinforce his son's army; but hearing of the total defeat of Piercy's forces, and that the king was advancing against him at the head of his victorious troops, he shut himself up in Warkworth castle. He afterwards dismissed his army, and came to the king at York. Northumberland pretended that his sole intention of raising an army was to mediate a peace between the two parties, and Henry, unwilling to drive so powerful a nobleman to despair, admitted his apology, and granted him a pardon. At the same time he published a proclamation, requiring all his subjects to desist from plundering the estates and houses of the rebels, and even to restore what they had forcibly carried away.

A. D. 1405. Notwithstanding the defeat of the army of the Piercies, and the death of the earl of Worcester and Henry Hotspur, that family were still in great credit with the public, their sufferings acquired them an additional esteem. Thomas Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, son to the duke of Norfolk, whom Henry, while only duke of Hereford, had accused of high-treason, and by that means procured his perpetual banishment, and Richard Scroope, archbishop of York, still continued to harbour an implacable rancour against Henry. The duke of Northumberland also, who well knew that he should never be cordially forgiven, was still determined to procure redress for the wrongs his family had received. Accordingly he joined these malecontents, and a plan was concerted for taking the field against Henry. The conspiracy soon after received an additional strength by the junction of the lords Bardolf, Hastings, and Fauconbridge, and a great number of gentlemen of figure and fortune in their respective counties. The earl of Northumberland visited the courts of France and Scotland, in order to prevail upon those powers to support the confederates and wrest from the hand of Henry the sceptre of England. He was received with the utmost respect, and met with great encouragement in his negotiation. The hopes of foreign assistance gave new life to the conspiracy, and a plan was formed for making an insurrection in the north, while the French, not only made a descent in Wales, but also laid siege to the most important places belonging to the English on the continent. Glendour also joined the confederacy, which now became truly alarming.

Henry was not idle in endeavouring to break the force of the gathering storm. He sent an army into Wales, under the command of his son, who attacked one of Glendour's detachments, and obtained a complete victory. The conspirators now perceived that Henry was no stranger to their intentions, and precipitately took the field, before the earl of Northumberland was ready to join their army. A manifesto was also published by the archbishop of York against Henry, in which he reproached that prince with his usurpation of the crown, and the murder of the late king; requiring that the right line should be restored, and all the public grievances redressed.

The earl of Westmoreland, assisted by several noblemen of considerable power in the north, having been appointed to watch the Scottish marches, no sooner heard of this insurrection, than he advanced at the head of his forces, hoping to surpriſe the rebels before they were prepared for defence. He was deceived; for on his reaching Shipton-Moor, he perceived the insurgents, amounting to seventeen thousand men, drawn up in excellent order; and ready to engage. Westmorland, not being able to give the enemy battle, had recourse to negotiation, and prevailed upon the archbishop and the earl of Nottingham to lay down their arms, and submit themselves to the government. The insurgents, who had just received advice that Henry himself was within three days march, at the head of a powerful army, and that it would be impossible for the earl of Northumberland to join them before the royal body of forces arrived, agreed to the proposals, and disbanded their troops.

But Henry refused to confirm the terms offered by Westmorland; he determined to make these mutinous leaders feel the weight of his resentment. But knowing that the trial of the archbishop, if conducted in the usual form, would prove both troublesome and tedious, and that the celerity of the execution alone could render it safe and prudent, he determined to follow the ferocious customs of the age, and put the prelate to death, without the form of a trial. He accordingly applied to Sir William Gascoigne, the chief justice, to pass the sentence of high-treason on the archbishop. But Gascoigne refused to act contrary to the laws of his country. Sir William Fulthorpe was therefore appointed a judge on this occasion; who, without any indictment, trial or defence, condemned the prelate to suffer death. Nor was the execution of the sentence delayed; the archbishop immediately suffered in a very ignominious manner. This was the first instance in England of a capital sentence being inflicted on a dignitary of the church. The earl of Nottingham, Sir John Lamplugh, and Sir Robert Plumpton, suffered at the same time. The pope was so highly incensed at this alarming attack on the privileges of the church, that he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against all who were concerned in the death of the archbishop; and it was with great difficulty that Henry, by the prevailing eloquence of large sums of money, procured absolution.

The news of this defeat no sooner reached the ears of the earl of Northumberland, than he fled into Scotland, together with lord Bardolf; and Henry soon reduced all the castles belonging to these noblemen. But the unfortunate earl did not long enjoy the benefit of this asylum; an event soon after happened which obliged him to seek his safety on the continent. Robert III. king of Scotland, was by no means qualified to hold the sceptre in these ferocious times. He was a prince of a slender capacity, but extremely innocent and inoffensive; virtues which were then so far from being admired, that they rendered him contemptible. His brother, the duke of Albany, a prince of a more violent and boisterous disposition, assumed the reins of government; and desirous of rendering his power perpetual, he threw David, the eldest son of Robert, into prison, where he was inhumanly starved to death. James, a younger brother of David, was now the only obstacle that opposed the tyrant from mounting the throne on the death of his brother. Sensible of his son's danger, Robert embarked him on board a ship, in order to send him into France, not doubting but he would there find sufficient protection from that friendly power. But Robert was destined to misfortunes: the ship was taken by the English, and Henry, notwithstanding the truce which subsisted between the two crowns, refused to restore the young prince to liberty. Worn out with grief and infirmities Robert was unable to support this last misfortune. He sunk under the weight of his distress, and left the government in the hands of his brother. Henry now saw all the importance of his acquisition: the duke of Albany was entirely dependent on the English monarchy; because a single attempt to prejudice the interest of Henry would be sufficient to pull him from throne. James was about nine years of age when he was first brought to London; and if any thing could atone atone for this breach of faith, it was the excellent education which Henry bestowed upon him, and which afterwards fitted him for filling the throne of his ancestors with great applause. It is not natural to think, that the duke of Albany would, in these circumstances, venture to protect a nobleman so obnoxious to Henry as the earl of Northumberland, and he accordingly retired to France.

A.D. 1407. But that nobleman, impatient of exile, landed in the north of England with lord Bardolf, hoping his presence would be sufficient to rouse the English to arms. He was not wholly mistaken; he was joined by a party of Scottish free-booters, and as he advanced his little army considerably increased. Pleased to find the inhabitants had not yet lost their affections for his family, he continued his march, made himself master of several castles which had been reduced after the fatal battle of Shrewsbury, and appointed Thirsk in Yorkshire, the general rendezvous of his army. The government was alarmed at the great success which had attended the beginning of Northumberland's insurrection; but there was now no royal army ready to march against the rebels. Sir Thomas Rokesby, sheriff of Yorkshire, thought it his duty to stop the progress of the insurgents, and accordingly raised a considerable body of forces, and advanced to meet them. The earl of Northumberland was equally desirous of coming to an action with the sheriff, persuaded that if he could defeat Rokesby's forces, he should not only disappoint Henry of so essential a reinforcement, but also, by this success, engage the city and county of York to declare in his favour. Accordingly he put his army in motion, and met Rokesby on Beaham-Moor, where a bloody engagement ensued, in which the rebels, after an obstinate resistance, were totally routed, and both the earl of Northumberland and lord Bardolf fell in the contest. This fortunate event, together with the death of Glendour, which happened soon after, freed Henry from all his domestic enemies. No more attempts were made to tear the laurel from his brow; he enjoyed the crown he had usurped without any farther opposition from the friends of the late unfortunate Richard.

But though Henry had no domestic enemy to contend with, his days were embittered as a parent by the irregular courses of the prince of Wales. He was now in the full vigour of youth, and of an active, sprightly spirit. While he was employed in the field, no actions of an immoral tendency stained his character. But a life of indolence was not at all agreeable to his nature. The distrust and jealousy of his father having removed him from all share in the public business, he plunged himself, with the utmost violence, into all the extravagances of debauchery, and blushed not for a conduct the most disorderly and licentious. But his outrages proceeded less from a depraved disposition, than the violence of his temper, which being not directed to useful objects, induced him to give full scope to his passions. But many gleams of spirit and magnanimity were observed to break through the cloud which a wild conduct had thrown over his character.

A.D. 1412. One of young Henry's favourites having been indicted for some misdemeanor, was condemned, notwithstanding all the interest the prince, who was present at the trial, could make in his favour. Young Henry was so incensed at the issue, that he struck Sir William Gascoigne, the judge, as he sat upon the bench. But the magistrate was not to be intimidated; he acted with a spirit suitable to his character, and instantly ordered the prince into custody. This fall of passion in the prince was immediately succeeded by a noble return of reason; he suffered himself, with the utmost resignation, to be conducted to prison by the officers of justice. When the king was informed of this transaction, he said, "I thank God I have a judge possessed of so much courage to execute the laws, and of a son endowed with so much obedience; as to submit to such chastisement."

During the reign of Henry the parliamentary proceedings deserve more attention than those relating either to military or foreign transactions. The commons had now attained a very considerable share of importance; and it became an object of policy to direct their election. This circumstance had been complained of during the preceding reign; and was made one of the articles of the charge against Richard; but it continued still unredressed: Henry pursued the same measures he had so severely censured in his predecessor. He was, however, obliged to court popularity, and this gave the commons an opportunity of assuming powers they had not hitherto ventured to exercise. They required the king to dismiss from his household four officers who had displeased them, among whom was his own confessor. Henry complied with their request, but declared he knew no crime these officers had committed. They appointed treasurers to attend to the disbursement of a subsidy which they had granted to the king, and ordered them to deliver in their accounts to the house. They proposed regulations for the government; and obliged the judges, and all the officers of the council, to swear to the observance of them. But their attempts with regard to the church were still more important. They advised the king to seize all the temporalities of the clergy, and apply the money to the exigencies of the state. The archbishop of Canterbury, who attended the king when this address was presented, remonstrated against it in the strongest manner. He asserted that the clergy were the principal support of the state; that though they went not in person to the wars, they sent their vassals and tenants in all cases of necessity; while, at the same time, they themselves who staid at home, were employed night and day, in offering up their prayers for the happiness and prosperity of the state. The speaker smiled, and replied without reserve, that he thought the prayers of the church but a slender supply. The king, however, unwilling to offend so powerful a body of men as the clergy, refused the petition. According to a calculation made by the commons, the clergy possessed a third of the lands in England, and their yearly revenue amounted to no less than four hundred eighty-five thousand marks a year. This address, though refused, alarmed both the king and the clergy. It was sufficiently evident that the doctrines of Wickliffe had spread prodigiously among the people, and it was therefore thought necessary to put the laws in execution against the Lollards. Accordingly several of them were sent to prison, and one committed to the flames even while the parliament were sitting. But these rigorous measures answered not the intention of the clergy. Persecution always tends to increase the numbers of any religious sect; and the sufferings of the Lollards augmented their disciples: the ashes of one victim, scattered by the breath of reformation, became the seeds of thousands.

A.D. 1413. Henry had for some time employed himself in fomenting the divisions which prevailed between the families of Burgundy and Orleans, by which the government of France was then so much distracted. He even meditated important designs against that kingdom; but he lived not to carry his designs into execution. His health had, for some months, been visibly declining: he was subject to fits, which for a time bereaved him of his senses: and though he was yet in the flower of his age, his end was visibly approaching. He was naturally of a peevish and jealous disposition, which was now greatly increased, and he too readily listened to the vile suggestions of his courtiers, who insinuated that his eldest son had formed unnatural designs upon his life and crown. The breast of Henry was now filled with the most anxious fears and apprehensions; he even removed the prince from his post of president of the council. Young Henry was greatly alarmed, and, and, fond as he was of pleasure and dissipation, he was still very susceptible of the nobler passions; and could not, without the most piercing anguish, reflect, that his own conduct had given too much reason for his enemies to asperse his character. But still he knew himself innocent with regard to his having formed even a wish to the prejudice of his father's authority; and determined to pursue every method in his power to convince the king of his duty and loyalty.

He first received the eucharist, dressed himself in a mourning habit, and repaired to court, in order to request a private audience of the king. He was immediately admitted; and falling at his father's feet, expressed himself in the following manner;

"Most dread sovereign, and honoured father, it gives me the most sincere concern to find that I am suspected by your highness of an unnatural design against your crown and person; which I, more than any other subject of your majesty, am bound to reverence and defend. I confess, indeed, with shame and contrition, that my irregularities and excesses have given sufficient cause for your displeasure. But I call the Almighty, who knows the inmost secrets of the heart, and never fails to punish those who dare to invoke him to sanctify a falsehood, to witness, that I never harboured a single thought inconsistent with that duty I owe your majesty as my sovereign and my father. Those who charge me with contrary intentions, seek only to disturb your tranquillity, and to alienate your affections from your son and successor. I would willingly remove these anxieties from your mind; I came for no other purpose. Let me beseech you, therefore, to let my actions be tried by the utmost rigour, with the same severity as if I was the meanest of your subjects; and if I am found guilty, in any respect, of the atrocious crime laid to my charge; if I have ever used an expression that indicated disloyalty or want of affection, let me be punished as the vilest miscreant that ever disgraced the name of son or subject. I will readily submit to any punishment you may think proper to inflict. I again, therefore, beseech you, with the utmost humility, both for the ease of your own mind, and the vindication of your injured son, to issue the necessary orders for making the rigorous scrutiny I now demand."

The king was greatly affected with this free, ingenuous, and pathetic address. He took the prince in his arms, embraced him with tears, assured him, that all his suspicions were entirely removed, and that he would never, for the future, harbour a thought prejudicial to his loyalty and honour. He even promised, that in order to remove every suspicion from the minds of all ingenuous persons, he would give him the names of his accusers, that they might be brought to justice in the ensuing parliament. But the return of his disorder put a final period to the enquiry.

The dreadful fits by which he was so often attacked, soon impaired his senses; and he had been so frequently in danger of losing his crown, that his imagination seems to have been strongly impressed with that idea, which increased as his strength and reasoning faculties decayed, even to a degree of childish anxiety. He would not sleep unless the royal diadem was laid on his pillow. One day he remained so long in a swoon, that his servants thought him actually dead; and the prince took the crown from his pillow, and carried it into his own apartment. The king recovering the use of his senses, and observing the diadem was removed, asked who had dared to take it from his pillow? and being told that the prince had carried it away, he ordered him to be brought into his presence. When young Henry appeared, the king, with an angry countenance, said, "What! would you deprive me of my crown before my death?" "No," replied the prince, "I took it, thinking your majesty was really dead, as my lawful inheritance; but now happily perceiving my mistake, I return the diadem with far greater pleasure than I took it." He accordingly re-placed the crown on the king's pillow; and having received his father's blessing, retired. A short interval between the attacks of this dreadful disease inspired Henry with the pleasing hopes of recovery; and, agreeable to the custom of that age of bigotry, he assumed the cross, and made a solemn vow to heaven, to spend the remainder of his days in a war against the infidels, in order, if possible, to recover the Holy City from the enemies of the Christian name. But he lived not to put his design in execution. He was seized with his last fit as he was paying his devotions before the shrine of St. Edward; and being carried into the Jerusalem Chamber, belonging to the abbot of Westminster, he expired, on the twentieth of March, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

The crimes committed by Henry, in order to usurp the seat of power, must be considered as perpetual stains on his memory by every man who makes the least pretensions to follow the dictates of conscience, or the eternal precepts of the moral law. It may, indeed, be said, that the injustice with which he had been treated by Richard, gave occasion to his crimes: for, in all probability, he never would have usurped the crown, if that monarch had not deprived him of his patrimony. But one crime cannot justify another. The murder of a king, his near relation, and the exclusion of the true heir from the throne, will always render the name of Henry of Lancaster obnoxious to the virtuous and the good. He seemed, indeed, himself, to be sufficiently conscious of the turpitude of his crimes; and the uneasiness with which he possessed his envied greatness, and the stings of conscience which he perpetually felt, cannot fail of rendering him an object of our pity, even when seated upon the throne. At the same time, it must be confessed, that he was endowed with many great and amiable qualities, which would have rendered him one of the greatest monarchs that ever wore the diadem of England, had he not waded to the throne through the blood of his sovereign. His prudence, his vigilance, and his foresight, were admirable; his command of temper and presence of mind remarkable; his courage, both military and political, free from fault. In a word, it was the flame of ambition that rendered Henry a tyrant, and the commission of one crime made way for that of another.

Henry was twice married: first, while earl of Derby, to Mary, daughter of the earl of Hereford, by whom he had four sons and two daughters.

1. Henry, surnamed of Monmouth, from the place of his birth, who succeeded his father in the throne.
2. Thomas, duke of Clarence.
3. John, duke of Bedford, afterwards regent of France.
4. Humphry, duke of Gloucester, afterwards protector of England.

His daughters were,

1. Blanche, who married first the elector Palatine; secondly, the king of Arragon; and thirdly, the duke of Barr.
2. Philippa, married to Eric, king of Denmark and Norway.

Henry's second wife was Joan, daughter to Charles I. king of Navarre, and widow of John Montfort, duke of Brittany. By this princess he had no issue.

This period, like all the preceding, that of the great Alfred only excepted, furnishes us with very few particulars relative to learning, and the arts adapted to excite either our curiosity or our admiration. It is, indeed, no wonder, that a proud, warlike, and ignorant nobility, encouraged only those arts which proclaimed their dignity, displayed their wealth, or contributed to their security. They were magnificent without luxury, and pompous without elegance. Rich plate, even to the enamelling on gold, rich stuffs, and curious armour, were carried to excess; while their chairs were mere pedestals, their clothes incumbrances; incumbrances; and they knew no use of steel, but as it served for safety or destruction. Their houses (for there was no medium between castles and houses) implied the dangers, not the sweets of society; and whenever peace left them at leisure to think of modes; they seemed to imagine, that fashion consisted in disfiguring the human body, instead of augmenting its graces. While the men wore shoes so long and pecked, that they were forced to support the points by chains from their middle; the ladies erected such pyramids on their heads, that the face became the center of the body. It is, therefore, more amazing, that the arts existed at all in these times of Gothic barbarity, than that they attained no greater degree of perfection.

Some discoveries were, however, made during this period. We have, at the conclusion of the preceding book, mentioned the discovery of gunpowder by our learned countryman, friar Bacon. It was, however, applied to no farther use than that of exhibiting an uncommon natural phenomenon, till about the year 1330, when Schwartz, a German monk of Cologne, either revived the invention of Bacon, or made this same discovery himself by accident; and imparted it immediately to the Venetians, who are said to have first made use of it in a sea-fight against the Genoese, in the year 1376. But if what many historians have asserted be true, namely, that Edward III. had a few pieces of cannon in his army at the battle of Crecy, in the year 1346, it will follow, that the English knew the use of gunpowder before the Genoese. But however that be, the making of gunpowder may be considered as one of the most singular discoveries that has ever been made in any age or country. It changed, by degrees, the whole art of war; and, in consequence, many circumstances in the political government of Europe. But the ignorance of that age in the mechanic arts greatly impeded the progress of this new invention. The artillery first framed were so clumsy, and of such difficult management, that men were not immediately sensible of their use and efficacy; and even to the present times improvements have been continually making on this furious engine; which, though it seemed contrived for the destruction of mankind, and the overthrow of empires, has, in the issue, rendered war much less bloody, and, at the same time, given greater stability to civil societies. Nations, by this means, have been brought more on a level; conquest has become less frequent and rapid; success in war has been reduced nearly to be a matter of calculation; and any nation over-matched by its enemy, either yields to their demands, or secures itself by alliances against their violence and invasion.

The art of weaving received very considerable improvements during this period, by the great encouragement given to our woollen and linen manufactures by Edward III. and the two succeeding kings. The art of painting also began to be esteemed; it was chiefly performed on board or glass.

In the year 1344, the first regular gold coins were struck in England, and were of three different kinds; one of six shillings value; a second of three shillings; and a third of eighteen pence. About the same time also, the art of gauging, or the method of finding the contents of all kinds of vessels, was invented. The first mention of clocks in England was in the year 1368, though they had been invented in the ninth century by Pacificus, archdeacon of Verona.

Few persons remarkable for their learning flourished during this period. The most remarkable, besides the few historians, were John Wickliffe and William of Wickham.

Wickliffe may be justly regarded as the father of the reformation, as he was the first in Europe who ventured to bring religion to the test of scripture and ecclesiastical antiquity. The austerity of his life, and the sanctity of his manners, added great weight to his doctrine. He was indefatigable in his labours, and generally went about bare-footed, in the habit of a pilgrim. He translated the New Testament from the vulgate. Calmet says he translated the whole Bible; and that there were several manuscripts of this translation, but that it was never printed. He died at his rectory of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, in 1385.

William of Wickham was considered as one of the most learned persons of his age; and it appears, that his great and useful talents, especially his skill in architecture, recommended him to the favour of Edward III. He persuaded that prince to pull down a great part of Windsor-castle, and rebuild it from his plan, in that plain magnificence in which it appears at present. He also drew the plan, and superintended the building of Queenborough castle. He was afterwards made secretary of state, and lord privy-seal, and enjoyed other accumulated preferments before he was promoted to the see of Winchester. He died on the twenty-seventh of September, 1404.

The most noted historians of this period were,

Thomas Wikes. His history begins at the Conquest, and ends with the death of Edward I. He was a canon regular of Osney, near Oxford; and the part of his work which relates to the barons wars is clear and explicit. His history was published by Dr. Gale, in his Hist. Angl. vol. 2.

John Brompton, abbot of Joreval, in Yorkshire, wrote a chronicle of the principal transactions of England. It was published among the Decem Scriptores. It begins with the coming of Augustine the monk, and ends with the death of Richard I.

Matthew, a Benedictine monk of Westminster, finished his history with the year 1307, and died soon after. But the work has been continued by several hands, especially by Adam Merimath, a canon regular of St. Paul's; who devoted the latter part of his life to the study of English history.

H E N R Y V. surnamed of MONMOUTH.

A.D. 1413. THOUGH this prince, during the last years of his father's reign, had given a loose to his passions, the people formed great expectations of happiness under his administration. They had perceived many indications of a generous and noble spirit often darting with uncommon lustre through the mist of dissipation. They were not deceived. He was hardly seated on the throne before his vices were changed into virtues. He called together his former associates, and after exhorting them to imitate his example, and inhibiting them from appearing any more in his presence if they continued their licentious conduct, he dismissed them with liberal presents. He published a general amnesty for all crimes already committed, except rape and murder. His new council was composed of the wisest and most virtuous persons in the kingdom: he made no distinction between those who had adhered to Richard, and those who had joined his father; he was desirous of extinguishing all parties. He shewed a noble resolution of restoring purity to the courts of justice, by displacing all those who had not filled their posts with integrity. Gascoigne, the chief justice, who trembled to approach the royal presence, was received with the utmost marks of esteem; his strict and impartial execution of the laws was applauded, and instead of reproaches he was loaded with favours. "Persevere," said Henry, "in the same noble conduct, and support the dignity of the laws of your country against all opposition." He treated the earl of Marche with so much attention and respect, that he forgot his right to the sceptre of England, to which he had, by birth, an undoubted title. He restored the noble family of Piercy to their former honours and estates, and laboured sincerely to bury all animosities in the grave of oblivion.

But the party distinction with regard to religion continued to increase; all the abilities of Henry to restore the tranquillity of the church were exerted in vain. The sect of the Lollards were every day increasing in the kingdom, and seemed extremely dangerous to the church, and even formidable to the civil power. Sir John Oldcastle, styled, in right of his wife, lord Cobham, was considered as the head of the Lollards. He was a person of great parts, invincible courage, and eminently distinguished for his experience in military affairs; virtues which had greatly recommended him to the favour of Henry. The archbishop of Canterbury, who was highly incensed against the Lollards, was desirous of indicting lord Cobham, persuaded that the leader of the party was the most proper victim of ecclesiastical severity. But Cobham was too great a favourite with the king for the archbishop to proceed without his leave. He therefore waited upon Henry, and requested permission to proceed against Sir John Oldcastle. The king, who was no friend to ecclesiastical severity, represented to the primate, that reason and persuasion were the best means of supporting truth, and correcting error; that every gentle method should be used in order to bring back these deluded people to the bosom of the church; and that he himself would endeavour to reconcile Cobham to the catholic faith.

But Henry found that all his arguments were in vain; Cobham, though greatly attached to Henry, refused to sacrifice truths of the utmost importance to conciliate the favour of majesty; and the king gave the primate leave to proceed against him to the utmost extremity of the laws. The violence of ecclesiastical authority was now exerted, and the primate, assisted by his three suffragans, the bishops of London, Winchester, and St. David's, condemned Cobham to the flames; but he made his escape from the Tower, before the day appointed for his execution arrived.

A. D. 1414. Provoked by persecution, and stimulated by zeal, Cobham formed a design for taking a severe revenge. He assembled his partisans, and began an open rebellion against the government. But the vigilance of Henry prevented the consequences. Great numbers of the Lollards were seized, several of them executed, and the whole conspiracy rendered abortive. Sir John Oldcastle himself made his escape, and was not brought to justice till four years after, when he was hanged as a traitor, and his body burnt on the gibbet, conformable to the sentence pronounced against him as a heretic. This revolt discredited the party, and checked their progress. The parliament increased the rigours of the penal laws; but, at the same time, petitioned the king to seize the revenues of the clergy for the use of the crown. So great an effect had the principles of Wickliffe made on the minds of persons, who were far from being friends to the enthusiasm of the Lollards. The clergy were sufficiently alarmed; they offered the king all the revenues of the alien priories; but this, in all probability, would not have been sufficient to divert the storm, if the primate had not fortunately directed the attention of Henry to a very different object. He persuaded him to undertake a war against France, in order to recover the provinces that had been wrested from his ancestors.

That kingdom was indeed now reduced to the most deplorable condition. Charles VI. had been seized with a fit of frenzy, which rendered him incapable of exercising his authority; and though he recovered from this disorder, he was so subject to relapses, that his senses were gradually but insensibly impaired; so that he was incapable of pursuing any settled plan of government. This misfortune gave a full career to the rage of parties. The duke of Orleans, the king's brother, and the duke of Burgundy, his cousin-german, after sustaining the most violent quarrels, by which the country had been deluged with the blood of its inhabitants, agreed to enter into a strict friendship, and swore at the altar to the sincerity of their intentions. But notwithstanding they had invoked heaven as a witness between them, very little regard was paid to the sacredness of their promise; the duke of Orleans was soon after assassinated in the streets of Paris by order of the duke of Burgundy, who had the insolence to avow openly and defend the justice of the action, which he termed tyrannicide. The dreadful consequences of so vile a tenet were soon displayed. A reconciliation between the two parties was now impossible; the whole kingdom in general, and the capital

The first, besides a great number of other troops, was composed of eight thousand gentlemen, commanded by the constable d'Albret, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome, and Richemont, the famous marshal Boucicaut, David Rambure, grand-master of the cross-bow-men, and several other officers of distinction. The second line was led by the duke of Alençon, assisted by the duke of Barre, the counts of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, and Grand Pré. The third body was under the command of the counts of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenbergh, and the sieur de Lannoy.

Henry, while the French officers were employed in drawing up their troops, detached four hundred lances, to take post in a wood on the right; and also a party of two hundred and fifty archers to lay in ambush on the left, in a low meadow covered with bushes. The right wing of Henry's army was commanded by the duke of York, assisted by the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The center was commanded by Henry in person, attended by his brother the duke of Gloucester, the earl-marshal, the earl of Oxford, and the young earl of Suffolk. The rear, which consisted wholly of archers, and such as were armed with spears, halberts, and bills, was led by the earl of Dorset. The chief strength of the English army consisted of infantry; and Henry, fearing that the French horse would break them by the fury of the first charge, ordered the archers to fix into the ground piles, or stakes, pointed at both ends with iron, and six or seven feet long, in their front, and also on their flanks, or intervals between the horse and foot. These formed a kind of temporary fortification, behind which the archers were secure from the violent charge of the enemy's cavalry.

The two armies, ranged in order of battle, stood facing each other the greater part of the day; the English not caring to advance, lest they should lose the advantage of the ground; nor the French, for fear of being more crowded together than they were already. At length Henry advanced at the head of his main division, the two wings moving at the same time, till he came very near the village of Agincourt; when the French horse moved forwards to attack the English archers. Upon which the latter halted, pitched their stakes, interweaving them together, and bending them a little towards the enemy. Guarded by this fence, they discharged a shower of arrows which nothing could resist: the ranks were thinned, and the line thrown into great disorder. The archers who lay in ambush among the bushes of the meadow, charged the French in flank, and made a dreadful slaughter. The English took advantage of the enemy's disorder, fell upon them with their battle-axes, and cut them to pieces, almost without resistance. The constable perceiving the distress of his advanced party, hastened to their assistance, but under terrible disadvantages; for the soil being wet and miry, both horse and foot moved with the greatest difficulty; and continuing still to press more closely upon one another, presented a defenceless front to the English, who soon threw the whole line into irretrievable disorder: their business was rather that of executioners than soldiers. The field was now covered with the dismounted, the slain, and the wounded; men and horses were blended in one dreadful confusion. The constable himself, together with the principal commanders of the first line, were left dead on the field of battle. The whole body was totally defeated, and a general flight ensued.

The duke d'Alençon, at the head of the second line, stood firm in an adjacent field; and, on perceiving the route of the first division, advanced to repair the disgrace of his countrymen. Henry met him at the head of his center, and a dreadful contest ensued, especially round the king's person. D'Alençon, in order to snatch, if possible, the victory from the enemy, commanded eighteen French knights of approved valour to watch attentively the motions of the English monarch, and use their utmost efforts either to kill, or take him prisoner. But the genius of Henry saved him from this imminent danger. Animated with the amazing success of his archers, and desirous of distinguishing himself by actions worthy of an English monarch, the king alighted from his horse, and advanced, at the head of his division, with a confidence which seemed to insure the victory. He charged the enemy with such fury as was almost irresistible, and was met by d'Alençon with a spirit worthy of his rank. He received the attack with a firmness that deserved a better fate. The French knights, who had never lost sight of Henry, cut themselves a passage to the spot where he fought in person; and rushing upon him with the utmost violence, would, probably, have made themselves masters of his person, had not David Gam, a Welsh captain, and two other officers, perceiving the danger that threatened their sovereign, flown to his assistance; and all the eighteen knights soon fell, breathless, on the field; but Gam, and his two gallant countrymen, were also mortally wounded. Henry, to shew his gratitude for their generous assistance, knighted them all as they lay on the field. Having paid this generous tribute of acknowledgment to merit and loyalty, Henry darted into the thickest part of the battle, to revenge the late attempt against his life; but his ardour and impetuosity again involved him in the most imminent danger. His brother, the duke of Gloucester, who had fought by his side, was struck to the ground, and the enemy pressed in crowds to avail themselves of the incident. Henry was again surrounded by a host of foes, but he was a stranger to fear: he covered the body of his brother with his shield, and defended him with his sword. In this situation he received so violent a blow on his helmet with a battle-axe, that he fell on his knees, and would, possibly, have been seized by the enemy, had not the duke of York advanced to his assistance, at the head of the fresh body of troops. This intimidated the enemy; they fell back, and Henry and his brother had time to recover from their alarming situation. Another reinforcement immediately followed that led by the duke of York; and Henry again attacked the French with such fury, that they were unable to support the shock; they fell into disorder, and a dreadful slaughter ensued.

Driven to despair at seeing the defeat of his division, d'Alençon made one furious effort, determined either to retrieve the battle, or spare himself the mortification of surviving the disgrace of his country. He put himself at the head of a chosen band of volunteers; and cutting his way to the spot where Henry fought in person, rushed upon the monarch, killed the duke of York by his side, and, with a furious stroke of his sword, cleft the crown on Henry's helmet. The monarch returned the salutation with such violence, that he fell to the ground, and was immediately dispatched by his followers. The death of D'Alençon completed the rout of his division: they consulted their safety in a precipitate and disorderly flight.

All resistance was now over. The third line of the French, indeed, still stood firm, were more numerous than the whole English army, and might have renewed the battle with some prospect of success, had they not been seized with a general panic. But the destruction of their countrymen had deprived them of all thoughts of resistance, and they retired from the field of battle without having exchanged a single blow with the English. But the first line had now rallied themselves, and seemed to advance with a resolution of making another effort for the palm of victory. At the same time, some gentlemen of Picardy having collected about six hundred peasants, had fallen on the English baggage, and were destroying the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, on seeing the enemy both in his front and rear, began to entertain apprehensions lest his prisoners should also join in the attempt to tear the wreath of laurel from his brow; and therefore thought it necessary to issue general orders for putting them to death; but, on discovering the real cause, he put a stop to the slaughter, and the greater part of them were preserved.

This battle was fatal to France, on account of the great number of princes and nobility either slain or taken prisoners. Among the former was the constable d'Albret, the dukes of Brabant, Barre, and Alençon; the count of Marle, and the archbishop of Sens. Among the prisoners, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendôme, and Richemont; and the marshal de Boucicaut, were the most remarkable. Henry was master of fourteen thousand prisoners. Ten thousand men are said to have fallen in this battle; and as the slaughter fell chiefly on the cavalry, it was computed that eight thousand of them were gentlemen. The English lost only forty men; among whom the person of the greatest note was the duke of York; whose death was more honourable than his life.

A public thanksgiving was now held in the English army for this signal and unexpected victory; and as soon as that decent tribute of gratitude was performed, Henry sent for Montjoy, a French herald, who had been dispatched from the dauphin to obtain permission to bury the dead, and asked him to whom he thought the victory belonged; the herald replied, to the English. Henry then desired to know the name of a village to which he pointed with his hand; and being told it was called the Castle of Agincourt; "Let this action" said the king, "be hereafter known by the appellation of The Battle of Agincourt."

Had Henry known how to have made a proper advantage of his victory, and the dreadful consternation of the enemy, every thing must, in all probability, have submitted to his arms. But the poverty of the princes of Europe in these times; and the small resources of their kingdoms, rendered it impossible for them to maintain an army, for any length of time, in the field; and this, perhaps, was the true reason why Henry attempted not to profit any farther from his victory. He pursued his route, by easy marches, to Calais; and, after resting his forces, embarked for Dover, where he landed on the sixteenth of November.

But the distress occasioned by the battle of Agincourt was so far from being sufficient to put a period to the fury of factions in France, that they continued to rage with still greater violence. All the principles of honour, and all the motives of interest, were sacrificed at the altars of ambition and revenge. The duke of Burgundy redoubled his efforts to reinstate himself in the possession of the government. Isabella of Bavaria, the wife of the unfortunate Charles VI. detestable in her character, and capable of the greatest crimes, having been banished to Tours, entered into a strict alliance with him against the dauphin, who was attached to the opposite party. The duke of Burgundy now entered France at the head of an army, reduced several strong places, released the queen from her confinement, and made himself master of the king's person. Paris was a second time deluged with blood; and nothing but an invasion from England was wanting to complete the ruin of that divided kingdom.

A. D. 1418. Nor was that additional scourge of heaven long delayed. Henry landed at Beville, in Normandy, on the first of August; at the head of an army of twenty-eight thousand men. Falaise, Cherbourg, Evreux, and Caen, submitted to him, and he invested the city of Rouen; but the place being defended by a numerous garrison, Henry was obliged to turn the siege into a blockade; and several negotiations for a peace were carried on between the king of England and the leaders of both factions, but without success.

A. D. 1419. The garrison of Rouen was now reduced to extremity by famine, and desired to capitulate. Henry very readily listened to their proposals; and it was agreed, that on paying a stipulated contribution, the city should be preserved from plunder. The surrender of Rouen was followed by that of all the towns and fortresses in Upper Normandy. But a sudden reconciliation taking place between the dauphin and the Burgundian faction, greatly contributed to diminish Henry's expectations of success. This reconciliation was, however, blasted, even in the bud. The duke and the dauphin having agreed to an interview on the bridge of Montreuil, the former was there assassinated by some noblemen in the train of the latter. They had seized this opportunity of revenging the assassination of the duke of Orleans. The most dreadful consequences followed this desperate act. The dauphin was accused of the crime, because it was perpetrated in his presence, and by his most intimate friends. The new duke of Burgundy and the queen threatened the prince with destruction, and conspired the ruin of the kingdom. Every sentiment of honour, of patriotism, and even of personal interest, gave way to the transports of revenge. During these transactions, Henry had made himself master of Pontoise and Gisors, advanced to the gates of Paris, and obliged the court to remove to Troye. His enemies, instead of combining against him, abandoned to him the kingdom.

A. D. 1420. Proposals for a general peace were now made to Henry by the queen and duke of Burgundy; and the terms being agreed upon, Henry, accompanied by his two brothers, the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, repaired to Troye, in order to conclude that famous treaty, by which a weak monarch, a furious woman, and a prince of the blood, enraged against his country, gave the crown of France to a stranger.

This treaty consisted of a great number of articles; but the following are the principal: That Henry should espouse the princess Catharine: That Charles, during his life, should enjoy the title and dignity of king of France: That Henry should be declared and acknowledged heir of the monarchy, and be entrusted with the present administration of the government: That the crown of France should descend to his heirs: That France and England should be forever united under one king; but should still retain their several usages, customs, and privileges: That all the princes, peers, vassals, and communities of France, should swear, both that they would adhere to the future succession of Henry, and also pay him present obedience as regent: That Henry should unite his arms to those of Charles and the duke of Burgundy, in order to subdue the adherents of the pretended dauphin; and that those princes should make neither peace nor truce with him, but by common consent and agreement.

This treaty was followed by the marriage of Henry with the princess Catharine, esteemed the greatest fortune and the finest woman of her time. The states of the kingdom and the parliament of Paris swore obedience to the king of England, who now assumed the reins of government as regent of the kingdom. The dauphin, in the mean time, behaved with surprising spirit and intrepidity. He had dispatched the count de Vendôme to solicit a supply of men from the Scots, whose king still remained a prisoner in England. The regent, however, reflecting, that if Henry became absolute master of France, his country must be the next victim to his ambition, resolved to assist the dauphin; and accordingly a supply of seven thousand men was sent him, under the command of the earl of Buchan. Assisted by these forces, the dauphin made himself master of Pont de l'Esprit and Nîmes; in Languedoc; and threw strong garrisons into Melun, Montreuil, Montargis, Meaux, and Compeigne.

Henry perceived that it was now necessary to take the field, in order to check the progress of the dauphin. He first marched against Sens, which submitted; after a very faint opposition. Montreuil opened its gates at the first summons, and several small towns followed its example. But the reduction of Melun was attended with more difficulty. Great part of that city was encompassed with the river Seine, and the whole defended by a strong wall, flanked with bulwarks and towers. De Barbason, one of the best officers in France, commanded the garrison, and made a noble defence. The place was invested on the twelfth of July, and did not surrender till the eighteenth of November, when famine forced the garrison to submit; but not without capitulating for their lives; it being agreed that none of the garrison or inhabitants should be put to death, except such as had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. Barbason himself was suspected of being one of the assassins; but by the intercession of Henry his punishment was changed into perpetual imprisonment.

A. D. 1421. The supplies granted by the states of France not being sufficient to answer the complicated exigencies of the state, Henry found it necessary to pass over into England in order to procure a subsidy from the parliament. The supply was granted; but the parliament presented an address, in which they observed, that the conquest of France might, in all probability, prove the ruin of England, which would be in the utmost danger of becoming a province of that kingdom: they already perceived that the interest of the monarch and that of the nation, were no longer the same.

During the absence of Henry, the dauphin, assisted by a body of seven thousand Scots, under the command of the earl of Buchan, defeated the duke of Clarence at Baugé in Anjou. The duke was slain in the action, and the earls of Somerset, Huntingdon and Suffolk were taken prisoners. Upwards of eleven hundred men fell in the action. The earl of Buchan, as a reward for his conduct and courage, was honoured with the office of constable of France.

These advantages alarmed Henry, and he passed over to Calais at the head of four thousand men at arms, and twenty-four thousand archers. The dauphin, knowing it would be madness for him to meet the English monarch in the open field, retired beyond the Loire, and determined to act wholly on the defensive. Henry soon recovered the places he had lost, and made himself master of Dreux, Tilliers, Nogent, Gallorden, and several other castles. The garrison of Meaux had for some time greatly harassed the inhabitants of Paris, at whose particular request Henry invested the place, which was strongly fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison, commanded by the bastard of Vaurus, who had distinguished himself both by his courage and cruelty against the English.

A. D. 1421. After a siege of seven months, the garrison, being reduced to the utmost extremity desired to capitulate; their request was granted, and it was agreed that all the inhabitants and soldiers should have their lives preserved: but that all the English, Welsh, Irish, and Scotch, who carried arms in the place, should be entirely at the king's mercy, together with the bastard of Vaurus, and three other officers of the garrison. These terms were agreed to, and all the English, Scotch, and Irish, found among the garrison, together with all those who had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy, were immediately put to death. The governor Vaurus, underwent an exemplary fate; the bravery of that officer could be exceeded by nothing but his cruelty; he used to hang, without any distinction of age or quality, all the English and Burgundians that fell into his hands: Henry, highly incensed at such a barbarous and shocking practice, caused him to be hanged on the same tree, which he had made the instrument of his inhuman executions.

The reduction of Meaux was followed by that of Compeigne, Gamaches, and St. Valery. By these acquisitions Henry saw himself master of all France on this side the Loire, except Anjou and Maine, and the castles of Guise and Crottoy, in Picardy. And to crown all the other prosperities of Henry, his queen was delivered at Windsor of a son, who was called by his father's name, and whose birth was celebrated by rejoicings equally pompous and equally sincere, at Paris and at London.

A. D. 1422. But the glory of Henry had now nearly reached its summit; his career of glory was arrested by the king of terrors, and all his mighty projects vanished like the mist of the morning. He was seized with a fistula, which the surgeons at that time knew not how to cure, and was soon convinced that his disease was mortal. He sent for his brother the duke of Exeter, the earl of Warwick, and the English nobility who happened to be near him, and delivered to them, with great tranquillity, his last instructions, which were to the following effect:

He began with observing that though his life had been short, it had been replete with glory, and employed in promoting the happiness of his people; that though his pretensions to the crown of France had proved the destruction of many thousands, yet these calamities ought not to be imputed to him, but to those whose obstinacy and injustice had forced him to have recourse to arms, by refusing to accept of a reasonable peace: that he should have beheld the approach of death without concern, had not his last moments been somewhat embittered by the reflection, that he had not been able to finish a war he had so happily begun; but hoped they would continue towards his infant son the same fidelity and attachment which they had professed during his life, and which had been cemented by so many mutual good offices. He added, as his last advice, that if they found themselves unable to place his son on the throne of France, they would never at least make peace with that kingdom, unless the duchy of Normandy was for ever annexed to the crown of England; and earnestly requested that they would assiduously cultivate the friendship of the duke of Burgundy, and never give liberty to the French princes taken at the battle of Agincourt, till his son was of age, and able to hold the reins of government. He left the regency of France to his eldest brother the duke of Bedford; that of England to his younger the duke of Gloucester, and the care of his son's person to the earl of Warwick.

All the noblemen promised to observe faithfully his dying instructions, and to pay the same obedience to his infant son as they had done to himself. Comforted with these assurances, Henry made preparations for his approaching dissolution; and declared, in his last moments, that he seriously intended to have made a crusade against the infidels, as soon as he had finished the conquest of France; an enterprize which he vainly imagined would have expiated all the calamities occasioned by his wars. He paid the debt of nature on the thirty-first of August, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the tenth of his reign.

Henry possessed many great and noble qualities. He was affable, polite, generous, and magnanimous; sincere in his attachments, a friend to justice, a friend to merit, and a friend to his country. He excelled all his contemporaries in personal courage, and military achievements. His abilities were great, his judgment sound, his genius extensive; he was equally qualified to shine both in the cabinet and the field. He enjoyed the singular talent of attaching his friends by affability, and gaining his enemies by clemency and address. In a word, he would have merited all the encomiums to which a great hero, and a great king are entitled, if he had not sullied his glory by the injustice of usurpation; though those who are willing to give indulgence to ambition in a monarch, will not consider this as a fault; perhaps they will rank it among his virtues.

Henry left only one son, who was not full nine months old at the death of his father. His widow, Catherine of France, married, soon after his death, a Welsh gentleman, Sir Owen Tudor, supposed to be descended from the ancient princes of that country.

She bore him two sons, Edmund and Jasper, the elder of whom was created earl of Richmond, and the younger earl of Pembroke. By this alliance the family of Tudor was first raised to distinction, and afterwards mounted the throne of England.

During this reign the dreadful schism which had so long divided the Latin church was terminated by the council of Constance, who deposed John XXIII. for his crimes, and elected Martin V. in his place.

The authority of a general council over the pope was established in this assembly; and John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, who had adopted the opinions of Wickliffe, were burnt alive as heretics, notwithstanding the safe conduct they had received from the emperor of Germany. This act of cruelty and treachery, occasioned a bloody war in Germany, where Zisca, general of the Hussites, rendered his name immortal by his victories.

H E N R Y VI. furnamed of WINDSOR.

A. D. 1422. THE parliament of England had greatly increased their power during the two last reigns. The deficiency of the Laneaster family in their title to the crown was of use in establishing the freedom and importance of the commons. The princes of that house never ventured to impose taxes without the consent of parliament, and the English constitution was by that means founded on a basis, that could not be removed, even by the power of absolute princes. Conscious of their own authority, and determined to support the power they had acquired, the parliament paid very little regard to the verbal will of their late monarch; they changed the name of regent into that of protector, from a persuasion that the latter implied less authority than the former. They advanced the duke of Bedford to that office, but permitted the duke of Gloucester to discharge its duties during his absence. Nor did they think it prudent to trust this power wholly in the hands of either; they named a council, without whose advice and concurrence no measures of importance could be determined. They refused to confirm that part of Henry's will which appointed the earl of Warwick the guardian of his son's person: and entrusted the care of their infant king to the bishop of Winchester. The two princes, Bedford and Gloucester, made no opposition to this change in the plan of government: they were unwilling to raise the least disturbance in their country; they chose to cultivate peace and harmony in the kingdom, and made no scruple of sacrificing some part of their own power to make so valuable an acquisition.

The unfortunate Charles VI. did not survive Henry above two months. He had indeed for several years possessed only the appearance of royal authority; but even this shadow of superior power was of great consequence to the English; it divided the duty and affection of the French, between them and the dauphin. That prince, on the death of his father, was proclaimed and crowned king at Poitiers, under the name of Charles VII. the city of Rheims, where that ceremony was usually performed, being then in the hands of the English. Charles VII. was a prince of a mild and generous disposition, but indolent, irresolute, and addicted to pleasure. He, however, gave the pleasing expectation of one day correcting the faults of his youth, and was able to gain over to his cause a great number of partisans. The French renounced not wholly their attachment to their natural sovereign; it was impossible for them not to see the disadvantage of being governed by a foreign prince. This was soon perceived by the duke of Bedford, and every method that human prudence could suggest, taken to prevent the consequence. He immediately proclaimed Henry VI. king of France, and assumed himself the title of regent of that kingdom. He assembled at Paris all the nobility attached to the English interest, and exhorted them to acknowledge young Henry for their sovereign. They immediately complied with his request; they swore allegiance to Henry as king of France, and did homage to him, in the person of the regent, for the lands they held from that crown.

Charles, though now reduced to a very low ebb of fortune, was still master of the counties of Berry, Bourbon, Languedoc, Lyonnois, Forrez, Auvergne, a great part of Xaintonge, and Poictou, together with the earldoms of Comminges and Armagnac, bordering on the Pyrenees. So that his power was still respectable, especially as both his officers and ministers were men of great parts and integrity.

Henry was in possession of Normandy and Guienne, Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, the Isle of France, and the city of Paris; besides the provinces belonging to the duke of Burgundy, his vassal and ally. The duke of Bedford was one of the most accomplished princes in Europe, whether we consider him as a soldier or a statesman. He was assisted by officers equally distinguished for their personal courage and military talents; particularly the duke of Somerset, the earls of Salisbury, Warwick, and Arundel, Sir John Fastolf, and Sir John Talbot. But Bedford well knew that every foreign assistance would be necessary, before an English regent could hope to complete the conquest of France. Accordingly he applied himself assiduously to increase the number of his friends on the continent, and had the good fortune to form an alliance with the duke of Britany, and his brother the count of Richemont. He also prevailed upon the English council to release James king of Scotland, who had continued a prisoner in England ever since his having been taken by Henry IV. It had been supposed that the Scots would never attempt any thing to disturb the peace of England, while their king was a prisoner in that court; but the late assistance sent to Charles, sufficiently proved that this opinion was founded on a chimerical basis; and that a much greater advantage might be procured from releasing James, who having contracted a natural friendship for the English, would still continue their firm ally, especially as his obligations would be so greatly increased by restoring to him at once his liberty and his crown.

But notwithstanding these alliances, Bedford perceived that the utmost circumspection would be necessary to render the advantages the English had gained in France permanent. He perceived, that the French in general were impatient under the new government; and that the sufferings of a young prince expelled his native throne by the rebellion of his own subjects and the arms of strangers, could not long fail of exciting the compassion of all his people, whose hearts were unbiassed by faction; especially as the present situation of France naturally engaged the attention even of the meanest persons, and was become the common topic of conversation.

A. D. 1424. The war had, since the death of Henry V. been carried on with various success; sometimes fortune was favourable to the French, and sometimes to the English; places were taken and retaken successively, without any remarkable advantage. The duke of Milan sent Charles a reinforcement of a thousand men at arms, and five hundred lances; but his chief reliance was upon the Scottish auxiliaries, whom he called his guardians; and of whom he had now no less than fifteen thousand in his service.

He

He had already created the earl of Buchan constable of France; and he now conferred the title of earl of Evreux on general Stuart; and that of duke of Terouranne on the earl of Douglas, who was considered as one of the first generals of his time.

One of Charles's partisans having reduced Yvri, on the frontiers of Picardy, a place of great importance, the regent determined to retake it; and accordingly marched at the head of his army, and invested the place. The governor perceiving that it would be impossible to defend the town for any length of time, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by a certain day. The proposal was accepted; and no army appearing within the limited time, the place was delivered up to the besiegers. Charles had not, however, neglected the necessary means for succouring a place of so much importance. He had dispatched the earl of Buchan, constable of France, assisted by the earl of Douglas and several French noblemen, at the head of a detachment of twenty thousand men, being the flower of his whole army, to relieve Yvri; but before they reached the neighbourhood of that place, the term had been, for some days, expired, and the town was in possession of the enemy.

As it was now impossible to retake the place, Buchan led his army to Vernueil, which the inhabitants delivered up to him in spite of the garrison. The constable might now have retired in safety, with the glory of having made an acquisition, equal, in point of utility, with that he was sent to relieve; but that impetuosity which had so often been destructive to France, proved fatal to Buchan. He called a council of war, in order to deliberate on the measures necessary to be pursued in this dangerous crisis. The wiser part of the council declared unanimously for a retreat; and used such reasons as nothing but a mind determined to listen to no argument could oppose. It was urged, that all the misfortunes of the French had proceeded from their rashness in giving battle, when no necessity obliged them to risk a decisive action: that this army was the last resource of the king, and the only defence of the few provinces he still possessed; and that every reason invited him to embrace cautious counsels, which allowed time for his subjects to return to their duty, and gave leisure for discord to arise among his enemies, who not being united by any band of common interest, could not long preserve the animosity they now cherished against the true heir of France. But a vain point of honour had more weight than all these prudential reasons. It was thought derogatory to their reputation to turn their back to the enemy, as their forces were more numerous than those of the English; and it was therefore determined to wait their arrival. The experience of former misfortunes could not restrain the impetuosity of the French.

During these debates, the duke of Bedford was advancing towards the French, at the head of fifteen thousand men; and on his arrival near the camp of the enemy, under the walls of Vernueil, he took possession of an advantageous spot of ground, flanked by a hill, on which he posted a body of two thousand archers, and furnished all his infantry with sharp stakes, like those used with so much success at the battle of Agincourt, to check the fury of the French cavalry. The earl of Douglas having surveyed the position of the English camp, declared that, in his opinion, the French army should stand upon the defence, and not begin the battle, as the enemy had chosen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without great disadvantage. This prudent advice, which was seconded by the constable, and every officer of experience in the army, appeared to Aymer, viscount of Narbonne, a headstrong, imprudent man, as the effect of timidity; nor did he fail to upbraid the commanders, in express terms, with pusillanimity, and of dishonouring, by their meanness, the arms of France. No answer was, however, made to his invective; which so highly exasperated him, that, snatching up one of the standards of the division, he exclaimed, "Let all who love their sovereign follow me;" and rushing immediately out of the line, he advanced to the charge with the most irregular impetuosity. Douglas and the constable seeing the confusion that now prevailed in their army, and finding their authority despised, determined to perish like soldiers in the inevitable destruction which they knew must be the consequence of this headlong rashness.

The regent had ordered all his cavalry to dismount, and to place their horses in the rear of the army, forming round them a kind of barricade with the carriages of the army. The attack, though made in the utmost disorder, was so furious, that a body of their horse on the right wing broke the opposite wing of the English, and advanced to the barricade which surrounded the horses, and behind which a body of archers were placed. These received them with such a dreadful shower of arrows, as obliged them to fall back. At the same time, those who were posted on the hill so galled the Italians, who were marching up in another line, that they fled with great precipitation. This gave the body of reserve an opportunity of forming themselves, and marching to the support of the main body, where the fight had continued for three hours with great obstinacy, without any perceivable advantage; but this seasonable reinforcement turned the scale of victory in favour of the English. The French horse were driven back upon their foot by the arrows of the English, and a dreadful slaughter ensued. Douglas and the constable perceiving the total rout of their army inevitable, and determined not to survive the disgrace, rushed into the thickest part of the battle, and fell among a heap of foes. Besides these two great generals, the headstrong Narbonne, the son of the earl of Douglas, the counts Aumale, Ventadour, and de Tonnerre, the lords Grandville, Manni, Gamaches, and Guitri, with many other persons of distinction, perished in the action. The duke of Alençon, the marshal de la Fayette, the lords of Goucour and Mortemar, were taken prisoners. About four thousand French, and sixteen hundred of the English, were slain on the field of battle. Vernueil surrendered the next day to the victors.

The situation of Charles was now truly deplorable. He had lost the bravest of his troops, and the flower of his nobility, in the late fatal engagement. His party was dispirited; he had hardly money sufficient to purchase the necessaries of life, much less to pay an army; nor could he raise any among his subjects without exciting a general discontent, which, in his present circumstances, it was necessary to avoid. But in the midst of his distress, when scarce the least ray of hope appeared, the intrigues of a woman sowed the seeds of dissension among his enemies. Jaqueline, countess of Hainault, animated by violent antipathy to her husband, the duke of Brabant, cousin-german to the duke of Burgundy, determined to dissolve her marriage, where nothing but the ceremony had probably as yet intervened. She was a princess of a masculine spirit, and uncommon understanding; and her husband of a sickly constitution, and weak intellects. She, however, knew her husband's family would exert all their power to prevent the pope from dissolving the marriage; and therefore, in order to effect her purpose with more facility, she made her escape to England, and put herself under the protection of the duke of Gloucester, who being enamoured of her person and fortune, ventured to marry her without waiting for the papal dispensation. Gloucester was endowed with many noble qualities, but at the same time of an impetuous temper, and violent passions. He considered not the consequences of an action he was determined to perform. Soon after his marriage, he repaired into the Low Countries, to take possession of her dominions. The duke of Burgundy exclaimed loudly against this conduct; and considering himself as insulted by it, marched in person to the assistance of the duke of Brabant. A sharp sharp war was now kindled in the Low Countries. The labours of the duke of Bedford to restrain the impetuous temper of his brother were in vain; nor was he able to soften the resentment of the duke of Burgundy. He now found it would be useless to push the consequences of his victory at Vernueil, and took a journey to England, where the departure of his brother had excited troubles in the administration. This cessation of hostilities gave Charles leisure to recover from his defeat. He laboured assiduously to gain the friendship of the princes of the blood, whose revolt had almost occasioned the total ruin of the monarchy. The duke of Burgundy was disgusted with the English, but he had not yet overcome his hatred to Charles; the murder of his father still filled his breast with resentment. The duke of Brittany had received no such injury, and therefore listened to the proposals made by Charles for an accommodation; and the count of Richemont accepted of the dignity of constable. That great general, who was an excellent subject, but a bad courtier, had been disgraced for the violence he exercised against the ministers and favourites of Charles; but he soon regained, by his services, the favour and friendship of his master.

A. D. 1426. The defection of the duke of Brittany alarmed the regent, and war was declared in form against the Bretons. The earl of Warwick immediately took the field; and laying siege to Pont Orson, carried the town by assault. He afterwards took and fortified Beauvron, where he fixed his head-quarters, and thence extended his ravages over the adjacent country, to the very gates of Rennes. The constable Richemont exerted all his power to raise a sufficient number of troops to put a stop to these incursions, and was fortunate enough to succeed. He soon found himself at the head of twenty thousand men, and marched immediately against the enemy. Warwick, whose whole corps did not amount to more than eight thousand, shut himself up in Beauvron. The constable immediately invested the town, and proposed to reduce it by famine. But Giac, prime minister to Charles, and who hated the constable, neglected to send him the necessary supplies of men and money, so that Richemont despaired of being able to effect his purpose; but exasperated to find himself baffled in his first attempt, he rashly resolved to make a general assault. The garrison behaved with the utmost intrepidity; the besiegers were every where beaten off; and Warwick perceiving a great disorder in the ranks of the enemy, sallied out, and falling upon their rear, put them to flight with great slaughter, and made himself master of all their baggage and artillery.

The defeat of the constable's army, the great defection of his troops, and the dissensions which prevailed in Charles's councils, encouraged the earl of Warwick to undertake the siege of Montargis, as a place of the utmost importance for facilitating the regent's intention of carrying the war beyond the Loire. He accordingly invested the town, and soon reduced the garrison to the last extremity. The bastard of Orleans, afterwards the famous count de Dunois, resolved to march to the relief of Montargis. He was then only twenty-three years of age, but had served with great reputation in eight campaigns. He was natural son to that duke of Orleans who had been assassinated by the duke of Burgundy, and had been educated for the church, but thought proper to exchange his ecclesiastical for a military habit. This gallant leader, at the head of no more than sixteen hundred men, attacked the English camp with so much fury, that the earl of Warwick, who knew nothing of his approach, was obliged to raise the siege. This advantage raised the hopes of Charles's party, and established the military character of Dunois.

A. D. 1427. The duke of Bedford, having settled affairs in England, returned to France; and after forming a numerous army on the frontiers of Brittany, fell so unexpectedly into that province, that nothing could resist his progress. All the attempts of the duke of Brittany were in vain; so that after seeing the greater part of his territories wasted with fire and sword, he desired an interview with Bedford; and a treaty was signed between them, by which the duke of Brittany not only returned to his former engagements with the English, but also signed the treaty of Troye, acknowledging the duke of Bedford regent of France, and engaging to do homage for his duchy of Brittany to the king of England.

A. D. 1428. The regent having thus forced the duke of Brittany to submit, formed a project, the success of which would have secured to England the conquest of France. This was the taking of Orleans, a city of the utmost importance, and which was now the only barrier that opposed his entrance into the southern provinces. The conduct of this siege was committed to the earl of Salisbury, one of the most consummate generals of the age. He marched from Paris about the latter end of July, at the head of sixteen thousand men, assisted by the earl of Suffolk, the lord Talbot, Sir John Fastolf, and other excellent officers. He immediately advanced through the county of Beaufle, and made himself master of all the towns that lay in his route to Orleans. He passed the Loire at Beaugenci, and invested the place on the side of Sologni, on the twelfth of October.

Every motion of the English sufficiently indicated their intention of besieging Orleans, and every precaution was accordingly taken for its defence. The command of this important city was given to the count de Gaucourt, an officer of great courage and experience, and inviolably attached to the family of Orleans. Many other officers of distinction threw themselves into the place. The troops that formed the garrison were all veterans, and long familiar with danger. The citizens themselves had acquired the military turn, so common in that age, and were therefore extremely well qualified to assist the regulars in the defence of the place. Many new fortifications were raised, the old ones repaired, and the greater part of the buildings in the suburbs pulled down, that they might not be used by the English in carrying on the siege. The fate of this city engaged the attention of Europe; the fortune of the kingdom seemed to depend entirely upon it.

The first operation of this siege was against a bulwark erected to cover the castle of Tourelles, which defended the head of the bridge over the Loire. The English artillery soon demolished the parapets, and made a breach sufficiently large for storming it. Preparations were now made both by the French and English; the former for attacking, and the latter for defending the bulwark. The first attempt did not succeed; the English were obliged to retreat, leaving two hundred and fifty men dead in the breach. This repulse, however, served only to increase the ardour of the besiegers; they continued battering the work with such fury, that it was soon abandoned by the French, and the English took possession of it without any farther opposition. Forts were now erected both above and below the bridge, for battering the city. But still the place was invested only on the side of Sologni; that towards the Beaufle was entirely open, and the bastard of Orleans found means to throw himself into the city at the head of eight hundred men. It was easily perceived, that while the city could be supplied with troops and provisions, it would be impossible to reduce it. The earl of Salisbury therefore ordered sixty small forts or redoubts to be built at proper distances round the city; but while he was pointing out the proper spots where they should be erected, a stone discharged from a canon in the place put a period to his life. The loss of this great general was universally lamented by the army: the soldiers considered themselves as invincible while he was at their head.

The command of the English army now devolved on the earl of Suffolk, who, assisted by the famous Talbot, one of the greatest captains of that age, pushed the siege with unremitting vigour. Sallics were frequently made by the garrison, and the most astonishing acts of valour were performed both by the besiegers and the besieged. On the twenty-first of December, a fresh reinforcement of English and Burgundian troops arrived; but still the number was not sufficient to invest the place; and the forts which had been erected in consequence of the orders issued by the earl of Salisbury, were at too great a distance from each other to prevent the enemy from throwing into the place large quantities of ammunition and provisions.

A. D. 1429. Four months had already been spent in continual sallies and engagements, when the regent ordered a convoy to set out from Paris with salt-fish, herrings, and other provisions of a similar kind, for the use of the besiegers during the Lent. This convoy was escorted by a guard of seventeen hundred men, under the command of Sir John Fastolf, an officer of approved valour and great experience. Charles, who had advanced to Chinon, a town in Touraine, about twenty leagues distant from Orleans, receiving intelligence of the march of this convoy, sent the count de Clermont, at the head of three thousand men, to attack the English in their route. The count came up with the convoy at Rouvrai St. Denis on the twelfth of February. Fastolf, apprized of his approach, and knowing himself too weak to sustain the impetuous shock of the French in the open field, drew up his men behind a barricado of his waggons, and in this position received the first shock of the French, which was made with their usual fury; but they were not able to force the temporary fortification. At the same time, they met with so warm a reception, that they were thrown into confusion. Fastolf perceived his advantage, sallied from his barricado, and routed the enemy with prodigious slaughter. In this action, generally called The Battle of the Herrings, one hundred and twenty French noblemen and persons of distinction lost their lives, besides a great number of common soldiers. The count de Dunois, having received notice of the count of Clermont's march, found means to escape from Orleans, and advanced to support him at the head of a body of veterans; but he arrived too late. He, however, secured his retreat; and the convoy reached the English camp, without meeting with any farther opposition.

This defeat, together with the alarming aspect of Charles's affairs in general, filled that monarch and his whole court with confusion; and an offer was made, that Orleans should be sequestered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy. But Bedford rejected the proposal with indignation; and observed, "That he was not in a humour to beat the bushes, while others ran away with the game." This sarcasm so disgusted the duke of Burgundy, that he recalled all his troops from the service of the English. But notwithstanding this defection, the place was every day more and more closely invested by the enemy. The utmost scarcity prevailed in the city; and Charles meditated an inglorious retreat into Dauphine. Mary, of Anjou, his queen, and the fair Agnes Sorrel, his mistress, found means, however, to inspire him with more noble sentiments. Love, which usually softens the heart, roused his courage; he determined to conquer or perish. At this dangerous crisis a country girl delivered him from the danger with which he was threatened, and placed him on the throne of his ancestors.

The name of this heroine was Joan d'Arc, afterwards much better known by the name of The Maid of Orleans. She was born at the village of Dom. Remi, near Vaucouleurs, on the borders of Lorraine. At this time she was about twenty years of age, of an irreproachable life, and had not hitherto been remarked for any singularity. She, indeed, possessed a genius superior to most in her class of life, but had been wholly employed in country business. A continual recital of the calamities of France had made so great an impression on her imagination, that losing sight of every other object, and abandoning herself to the transports of enthusiasm, she fancied that she heard heavenly voices, and doubted not but she was called upon by the Deity to undertake the defence of the kingdom. She communicated her visions to the governor of Vaucouleurs, who at first treated her with neglect; but her frequent returns prevailed upon him to send her to the king. She supported before the court the character of an inspired person with an astonishing candour and firmness. An assembly of divines, and the parliament of Poitiers, who examined her on the subject of her mission, pronounced that there was something supernatural in her. It was an object of policy to make her case be considered as miraculous; but in an age devoted to superstition, admiration and wonder, it was hardly necessary to employ art to effect this purpose. Her enthusiasm, therefore, joined to the extraordinary qualities she possessed, could not fail of making lively impressions on the vulgar. She promised to deliver Orleans, and conduct Charles to Rheims, in order to his coronation. She now wrote a letter to the duke of Bedford, commanding him, in the name of God, to raise the siege, and to evacuate France. Every method was taken to publish the predictions of the Maid of Orleans, and which were believed with the most implicit faith. It was pretended, that she had demanded of the king, as the instrument of her future victories, a particular sword which was preserved in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and which, though she had never seen, she described with so many particular circumstances, as plainly proved her supernatural knowledge. The English affected to speak of her with derision; but were struck with the opinion which every where prevailed of her heavenly mission. The French troops gave credit to all her predictions, and were ready to attempt the most daring actions from an assurance of victory.

This extraordinary engine being thus prepared, it was resolved to try its force upon the enemy. The Maid was armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on a fine horse richly caparisoned. The sword of St. Catherine was sent for, and delivered to her with great formality. It was now determined to send this inspired leader with a large convoy of provisions and ammunition to the besieged, who were by this time reduced to the last extremity. Joan accordingly marched at the head of twelve thousand chosen men destined to escort the convoy, with a consecrated banner in her hand. She was assisted by the lords of Gaucourt, Ray, and St. Severe, the admiral Crevant, and other excellent officers. The garrison of Orleans were informed of the design, and a great number of boats were prepared to carry the convoy over the Loire. As soon as the Maid appeared on the side of Sologne, the count de Dunois made a vigorous sally on the English on the side of Beausse, to prevent their sending troops to the other side of the river, while the boats were loading with the provisions and ammunition destined for the town. The English on that side were too weak to encounter so strong an escort; and their inaction being considered by the French as the effect of terror imprinted on their minds by heaven, to facilitate the enterprize of the Maid of Orleans, fell upon them with such enthusiastic fury, that they were defeated, after a long resistance, and the convoy passed into Orleans. A natural event served also to increase the superstition of the French. During the time of the action, there happened a violent storm of thunder, lightning, and hail. This, it may easily be supposed, was considered as the voice of heaven declaring in their favour. Had the attempt miscarried, it would have been interpreted in an opposite sense. Joan was received into Orleans as a tutelar angel, and the whole success attributed to her: her presence dispelled every thought of danger. The garrison believed themselves invincible under her sacred influence; and the frequent and successful sallies which they they made, completed the consternation of the enemy. The English ascribed to the operation of the devil what the French considered as the work of the Deity. They raised the siege of Orleans on the twelfth of May; and retired before an army who had so long trembled at the name of the English.

Charles now suffered his army to take the field, in order to improve the success that had so lately attended their efforts. At the same time, the English, by a strange mistake, after raising the siege of Orleans, instead of keeping their forces in a body to act powerfully against the enemy, distributed great part of them into places near the Loire, which they had subdued when they first passed that river. Being thus separated, the French met with little resistance in the places they attempted. The Maid of Orleans still headed their troops; and wherever she appeared, the English were struck with a panic, while the French believed themselves supported by an invisible hand. Gargeau, a small fortress, into which the earl of Suffolk had been so imprudent as to throw himself, with four hundred men only, was obliged to surrender at discretion, and the earl himself was taken prisoner. Melun suffered the same fate, with many other towns and castles garrisoned by the English. Beaugency only held out a regular siege, but was at last obliged to surrender.

Lord Talbot, who, on the imprisonment of the earl of Suffolk, took the command of the English army, found that his whole force amounted to no more than six thousand men. He therefore endeavoured to avoid an engagement with the enemy, who were at least double that number. But being overtaken at Patay, a battle became inevitable; and the event was what might be expected from a handful of men oppressed by the power of superstitious prepossession. They were totally defeated: above two thousand fell in the action, and about two hundred were taken prisoners; among whom were the lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rempston, and several other officers of note.

The Maid of Orleans had now performed one part of her promise, the relief of that city; but the other, and more difficult task, remained still to be executed, the crowning of Charles at Rheims. Before this could be done, it was necessary to pass over a large tract of country occupied by the English; an enterprise which was rash, and, perhaps, impracticable in any other conjuncture than the present. Charles, who had hitherto never exposed his person, allowed himself to be carried away by the torrent of his success, and the instigation of the Maid of Orleans. This interval of enthusiasm secured his victories. Without provisions, without resources, he marched securely, at the head of twelve thousand men, through the midst of his enemies. Troye and Chalons opened their gates at his approach. The inhabitants of Rheims drove out the English garrison, and sent him the keys of their city, which he entered in triumph. The ceremony of his coronation was immediately performed in presence of the Maid of Orleans, who attended with her consecrated banner in her hand. Charles now appeared more venerable in the eyes of his subjects. Numbers immediately joined him; they returned from their prepossessions and errors, and conceived the utmost aversion to the shameful yoke of slavery they had so long endured. Loan, Soissons, Chateau-Thierry, and several other towns and fortresses, submitted to their lawful sovereign.

During this reverse of fortune, the duke of Bedford acted with the most consummate prudence. He retained Paris in subjection by his vigilance and severity. He also renewed his alliance with the duke of Burgundy; and being joined by five thousand men, which the bishop of Winchester was conducting on a crusade against the Hussites, he was once more in a condition of taking the field against the French, and checking their rapid success. The Maid of Orleans, after Charles was crowned at Rheims, considering her commission as accomplished, was solicitous to return to the place of her nativity; but her influence was so great over the troops, that the count de Dunois prevailed upon her to continue in the army till the English were entirely driven out of France.

Bedford being advanced as far as Montereau, on the Yonne, sent an herald to Charles, offering to give him battle in any indifferent place he should name, in order to put a final period to the war by a general engagement. But Charles, who had learned wisdom in the school of adversity, refused to hazard his crown on the uncertain event of a battle. The regent, therefore, returned into the Ile of France, in order, by his presence, to prevent the towns from revolting; and also to give the French nobility an opportunity of retiring from the army, where they served at their own expence.

A. D. 1430. It having been determined in the English parliament to send young Henry into France, in order to his being crowned at Paris; he embarked at Dover with a splendid retinue, and landed at Calais on the nineteenth of May. But the army of Charles being then in the neighbourhood of Paris, it was thought prudent to carry the young king to Rouen, till the enemy was removed farther from the capital: and in order to effect that design, the regent laboured assiduously to induce the duke of Burgundy to act with more vigour than he had done since he recalled his troops from the siege of Orleans. Accordingly he ceded to him all the places the English possessed in Champagne and Brie; and the duke immediately entered France at the head of a powerful army. He reduced Troye and Soissons; and being joined by the earls of Suffolk and Arundel, he invested Compeigne. The place was well provided with every thing necessary for making a noble defence; and the garrison was commanded by Flavi, a brave and experienced officer.

But as Compeigne was considered as a city of the utmost importance, a detachment of about six hundred men, under the command of the Maid of Orleans, and Xaintrailles, a celebrated general, threw themselves into the place, which gave fresh spirits to the garrison. The next day the Maid of Orleans, at the head of a considerable party, made so desperate a sally upon the quarters of John of Luxembourg, the Burgundian general, that he was driven from his post. The fury of that enthusiastic leader carried her too far. Her retreat was cut off; and, after making the most desperate resistance, she was taken prisoner by the bastard of Vendome, who immediately delivered her up to the Burgundian general. The captivity of the Maid of Orleans was thought equal to a decisive victory. Te Deum was publicly sung at Paris, and the regent obtained from the duke of Burgundy the custody of that extraordinary woman. The garrison of Compeigne, however, continued to make a noble defence, till the siege was raised by a large detachment from Charles's army.

During these transactions, young Henry continued at Rouen; but it was now determined to perform the ceremony of his coronation. He accordingly repaired to Paris, attended by the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and a splendid train of the nobility of both nations. Sunday, the seventeenth of December, was appointed for the ceremony, which was accordingly performed, with great magnificence, in the church of Notre Dame; where the cardinal of Winchester placed the crown on the head of Henry, and the nobility swore allegiance to him.

A. D. 1431. Though the conduct of the Maid of Orleans had been irreproachable, and she certainly was entitled to be treated as a prisoner of war, it was determined to try her as a sorceress and impostor. Religion was to be interested in this act of oppression. The bishop of Beauvais, in whose diocese Joan was taken prisoner, demanded that she should be tried before an ecclesiastical court, affirming her guilty of heresy and magic. The university of Paris, a body destined for the instruction of mankind, meanly supported the absurd request of the prelate; and several clergymen clergymen of rank, among whom was the cardinal of Winchester, were selected to pass sentence upon her. She appeared before the court in her military apparel, but loaded with irons. During four months they harassed her with captious questions, which she answered with wonderful art and intrepidity: she was not intimidated though before a tribunal of ecclesiastics, whose persons she had been always taught to revere. She boldly avowed the designs she had formed against the English; she told them, with an air of confidence, that it would not be long before they were driven out of France. Being interrogated about her pretended revelations, and whether she would submit to the judgment of the church with regard to their being real? she only answered, "That she was certain they came from heaven, to whose judgment she would leave the decision; determined not to give them up to any other authority, even though the church should declare them illusions." When asked, Why she assisted with a consecrated banner in her hand, at the coronation of Charles, "It is but just," said she, "that the person who had shared in the danger of the enterprise, should also partake of the glory." She, however, soon perceived she had gone too far, in refusing to submit to the decision of the church; she appealed to the pope; declared herself willing to recant; and acknowledged the illusion of those revelations which the church had rejected. In consequence of this recantation, her punishment was mitigated to perpetual imprisonment, and to be fed during life on bread and water.

But this sentence was not sufficient to satisfy the vengeance of Joan's enemies. Enough had indeed been done to convince both the French and the English, that the opinion of divine influence, which had so much encouraged the one and daunted the other, was wholly without foundation. Had they stopped here, their proceedings might have been vindicated upon political reasons; but her death was determined. Suspecting that the female dress, which she had since her sentence consented to wear, was not agreeable to her, they purposely placed in her apartment a suit of men's apparel, and watched the effect of that temptation. The stratagem succeeded. Joan, at the sight of a dress in which she had acquired so much honour, and which she once believed the wore by the appointment of heaven, revived all her former enthusiastic notions: she ventured in her solitude to clothe herself again in the forbidden garment. Her insidious enemies caught her in that situation: her fault was interpreted to be nothing less than a relapse into heresy: no recantation would now suffice, and no pardon could now be granted her. She was delivered over to the civil magistrate, on pretence of heresy and magic: this admirable heroine, the terror of the English, and the deliverer of France, was burnt alive in a slow fire, in the market-place of Rouen. Such was the end of the famous maid of Orleans, whose actions must excite surprize and admiration, whether they were owing to innate courage, or resulted from the effects of enthusiasm.

A. D. 1432. But the death of the maid of Orleans was far from restoring to the English the advantages they had lost. They were still unfortunate; and their affairs went every day more and more to decay. In this alarming crisis an event happened which gave a fatal blow to the hopes of the English. The dutchess of Bedford, sister to the duke of Burgundy, paid the debt of nature, and was buried in the church of the Celestines at Paris. This unfortunate event dissolved the close connection that had hitherto subsisted between her brother and the regent, and the marriage of the latter, about four months after her death, with Jaqueline of Luxemburg, occasioned a breach between them. The cardinal of Winchester mediated a reconciliation between these princes, and brought them both to St. Omers for that salutary purpose. But a point of honour rendered the whole abortive. The regent expected the first visit, as he had condescended to come into the duke of Burgundy's territories, in order to have an interview with him. But Philip, proud of his great power, and independent dominions, refused to pay this compliment to the regent; and the two princes, unable to adjust the ceremonial, parted without seeing each other.

A. D. 1435. The duke of Burgundy had for some time seen his error, and began to repent of the wounds he had given to his country, and of the injury he had done to himself, by placing its crown upon the head of a foreigner. Time, reflection, and the public calamities, made an impression upon his heart, which was naturally disposed to generosity, and weakened that ardent desire of revenge, which had armed him against his sovereign. Charles disavowed the assassination of the duke's father; offered all the satisfaction and atonement that could be desired of him, and banished Tannegui du Chatel, the murderer of that prince, from his court. This proof of his desire to remove every difficulty which might oppose a reconciliation had the desired effect: a congress was appointed at Arras, under the mediation of the pope and the council of Basle. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the English, but on condition of doing homage to Charles, conformable to the ancient custom. This offer was rejected with disdain, and the English plenipotentiaries departed immediately from the congress. Nothing now remained but to discuss the pretensions of Charles and Philip; and this was soon performed, because the vassal was in a capacity of giving law to his sovereign. It was stipulated that Philip should receive reparations and acknowledgements for the murder of his father; that Charles should cede to him all the towns of Picardy situated between the Somme and the Low Countries, and several other territories, which, as well as the other territories in possession of Philip, should be held, during his life, without doing any homage, or swearing any fealty to the present king. At the same time Charles released his subjects from all obligations to allegiance if he ever infringed this treaty. So dishonourable were the conditions, by which France purchased the friendship of the duke of Burgundy.

Soon after the conclusion of this treaty, the duke of Bedford paid the debt of nature at Rouen. He was justly esteemed one of the greatest persons of the age; and it is difficult to say whether he shone most in the field or the cabinet, whether he was a greater general or politician, and whether he was most esteemed for his valour, his equity, or his moderation. About the same time Isabella, the widow of Charles VI. finished the period of her mortal existence. This monster of nature, who viewed with horror the progress and success of her own son, in recovering possession of his kingdom, may be considered as having expiated her crimes, if they could, indeed, be expiated, by the hatred of the French and the contempt of the English.

A. D. 1436. Though the death of the duke of Bedford greatly increased the misfortunes of the English in France, and gave Charles every advantage he could wish for extending his conquests, yet such parties were formed in the English council, that it was seven months before the commission of the duke of York, who was appointed regent of France, passed the seals. The French monarch wisely improved every moment, and made a rapid progress in establishing his authority, which he had nearly effected when the duke of York arrived. The capital had been some time reduced, so that the territories of the English now chiefly consisted of Guienne and Normandy. But Charles was unable to meet the English in the field; several places were taken, but no action of importance ensued. The French, grown wiser by experience, wisely avoided a general engagement.

The duke of Burgundy attempted to reduce Calais with an army of fifty thousand men, and made himself master of several small castles in the neighbourhood of that city. The Flemings, who were then then much more famous for manufacture than war, vainly imagined that the appearance of their numerous army would be sufficient to intimidate the garrison, and that the gates would be opened at their approach. They were deceived. The garrison, instead of being intimidated, dreadfully harassed their camp, with successful sallies. In the mean time the duke of Gloucester, at the head of fifteen thousand men, landed at Calais, and sent a herald to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. Philip accepted his challenge; but his Flemings had so severely felt the effects of the valour of the English, that they could not be prevailed upon to meet them in the open field; they quitted their camp, and made a precipitate retreat. Philip, fearing that the garrison of Calais might take advantage of this confusion in his army, drew up his regular troops to secure his retreat, and retired in good order to Gravelines; leaving behind him all his baggage and artillery, which fell into the hands of the English.

Gloucester, determined to revenge the insult of the duke of Burgundy, led his army into Artois, and after laying the whole country waste with fire and sword, returned to Calais loaded with plunder. Nor was this all the loss the duke of Burgundy sustained; he was hardly returned to his own dominions before he had the mortification to see the maritime parts of his possessions in Flanders, ravaged by an English fleet; while he himself was in the utmost danger of losing his life in a sedition at Bruges, after seeing the French marshal, Lisle-Adam, almost torn in pieces by the fury of the populace.

The hostilities in France were now carried on by both parties in a very languid manner. Destitute of resources, of industry and of commerce, the two nations were drained by the expences of the war; and their troops were obliged to subsist by plundering and oppressing the country both of friends and enemies. Proposals of peace were often proposed, and as often rejected; both insisted on terms which could not be granted. At the same time both the English and French courts were filled with factions. The duke of Gloucester and the cardinal of Winchester, continually opposed each other, and the interest of the nation was sacrificed to their perpetual enmities. The dauphin of France headed a faction against his father. He was of a restless and ambitious disposition, and found means to bring over to his interest, the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, with the counts of Vendôme and Dunois. Charles perceived his danger, and was very desirous of procuring the release of the duke of Orleans, who had continued a prisoner in England ever since the battle of Agincourt, as the only person whose merit and rank could balance the credit of the dauphin's party. After a tedious negotiation, which was strenuously opposed by the duke of Gloucester, it was determined to set him at liberty on his paying a ransom of thirty-six thousand pounds of our present money, an immense sum in those days, and nearly equal to two thirds of all the extraordinary supplies granted by the parliament to support the war, during an interval of seven years. The duke of Burgundy displayed a noble instance of generosity on this occasion; he renounced his ancient resentments, and paid the ransom of a prince who had been long his enemy.

A.D. 1441. But the release of Orleans did not put a period to the divisions in the English council: nothing less than the destruction of Gloucester could satisfy the malice and ambition of the cardinal of Winchester. He was, however, unable to attack the duke in person, and therefore formed the most inhuman plot, infamous by its agents, and detestable by its motives. He caused his dutchess to be accused of witchcraft; and it was pretended, that a waxen image of the king was found in her possession, which she and her associates, Sir Roger Bolingbroke, a priest, and one Margaret Jordan of Eye, melted before a slow fire, with an intention of making Henry's force and vigour waste away by the like insensible degrees. The accusation was well calculated to affect the weak and credulous mind of the king, and to gain belief in an ignorant age. The dutchess was accordingly brought to trial with her confederates. The nature of the crime; so opposite to all common sense, seemed sufficiently to exempt the witnesses from observing common sense in their evidence. But this was of no consequence in a court, where it was determined to find the prisoners guilty. The dutchess was condemned to do public penance and to suffer perpetual imprisonment in Chester castle. These violent proceedings, however, produced not the intended effect. The people were persuaded that they were wholly owing to the malice of Gloucester's enemies, and acquitted the dutchess. They were even more attached to the duke than before.

A.D. 1444. The English council had for some time been engaged in a matter of very great importance, that of giving a queen to England. It was easily foreseen that this circumstance would be sufficient to decide for ever the victory between the two contending parties; and therefore both exerted their utmost influence to procure for the princess they favoured the honour of sharing the English throne. The duke of Gloucester warmly recommended the daughter of the count d'Armagnac; but had not influence sufficient to effectuate his purpose. The cardinal and his friends had cast their eyes upon Margaret of Anjou, daughter of Regnier, duke of Anjou and Lorraine. He was titular king of Sicily, Naples and Jerusalem, and descended from the count of Anjou, brother to Charles V. who had left these magnificent titles, but without any real power or possessions to his posterity. The princess herself was the most accomplished woman of her age, both in body and mind; and seemed to possess those qualities which would equally qualify her to acquire the ascendant over Henry, and to supply all his defects and weaknesses. She was of a lively and daring spirit, great penetration, and uncommon resolution. Such was the princess designed as a consort to Henry, by the cardinal and his friends, and the earl of Suffolk was dispatched to the continent with proposals of marriage, which were accepted. Henry himself was so charmed with the description and merit of Margaret, sent over by the earl of Suffolk, that he empowered that nobleman to promise a cession of Anjou and Maine, at that time in the hands of the English, to Charles of Anjou, her uncle, then prime minister and favourite of the French king. Great opposition was, however, made in the English council to the ratification of this marriage treaty; the duke of Gloucester and his friends exerted all their influence to set it aside; but their efforts were in vain; the cardinal and his faction prevailed, and the contract was approved by the council. Suffolk was dignified with the title of marquis, and received thanks of the parliament for concluding the marriage.

A.D. 1445. The new queen had not been long in England, before she sufficiently indicated her intentions of being mistress of her husband's conduct as well as his affections. The opposition made by the duke of Gloucester to her marriage, had filled her mind with envy, and induced her to enter into a close correspondence with the cardinal and the marquis of Suffolk, who, strengthened by her friendship, and animated by their common hatred against the duke of Gloucester, resolved to effect the ruin of that patriotic nobleman. He was accordingly stripped of all his preferments, and even entirely removed from the council-board. But this unjustifiable method of proceeding raised such commotions in the nation, that the authors of his disgrace thought it absolutely necessary for their own safety, to colour over their base proceeding with a shew of justice.

A.D. 1447. They accordingly declared that they intended to impeach him before the parliament; but the duke was too great a favourite with the citizens of London, for them to attempt the execution of their base designs in the capital. The members were summoned to meet at St. Edmundsbury, and the duke cited to appear. Conscious of his own innocence, the duke determined to appear, and accordingly was present at the opening of the parliament on the tenth of February. But the very next day, he was arrested, and put under a strong guard. The people were highly exasperated at this method of proceeding; but persuaded that the duke, on his trial, would sufficiently exculpate himself from every charge that could be exhibited against him, no tumult was excited in his favour.

His enemies, however, did not intend to bring him to a fair and open trial. The lords who were to sit as his judges took no pains to conceal their sentiments with regard to his innocence; they even threw out several intimations of their being determined to do strict justice upon his accusers, provided they were unable to prove the charge against him. This sufficiently intimidated the faction, and the duke was soon after found dead in his bed. It was, indeed, pretended, that his death was natural; and his body was accordingly exposed to public view, without exhibiting any marks of external injury; but no one doubted of his having fallen a sacrifice to the vengeance of his enemies. An artifice formerly practised on Edward II. and on Richard II. could deceive nobody.

Thus fell, by the treacherous hand of malice, Humphrey of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, the most learned person of his age. He founded at Oxford one of the first public libraries in England, and was a generous patron to men of science, and able artists of every profession. His hearse was watered by the tears of the people. His enemies saw the grief of the people with terror, and thought it absolutely necessary to give some colour to their proceedings. Several of the duke's domestics were accordingly tried, and received sentence of death; but they were no sooner suspended, than they were cut down, and received their pardon.

The cardinal of Winchester did not, however, long triumph over the fall of Gloucester. He died about six weeks after him, in all the horrors of a guilty conscience. Happy would he now have thought himself, had he applied his mind more assiduously to provide for his passage into eternity, and not have embued his hands in the blood of the innocent. By the death of the cardinal, the queen, and her favourite, Suffolk, were deprived of the great support they derived from his experience, his birth, his riches, and his order; and left exposed to all the effects of the unpopular measures they afterwards pursued. The minister did not, however, immediately feel the resentment of an injured people. He, for some time, enjoyed his power; and the next sessions of parliament he was created duke of Suffolk.

A.D. 1448. During these domestic troubles in England, Charles was very assiduous in establishing the happiness of his people. The face of his kingdom was entirely changed. He restored the administration of public justice, regulated the finances, established discipline among his troops, encouraged commerce and agriculture, and made his subjects forget their former misfortunes. The kingdom was now in a condition to act with vigour in recovering those dominions which were still in the hands of the English; and an accident soon happened which gave Charles a pretence for re-commencing hostilities, which had been terminated by a truce.

The death of the duke of Gloucester seemed to offer a fair opportunity for ceding the province of Maine to Charles of Anjou, pursuant to the marriage contract. But the English ministry still endeavoured to postpone the cession, as they well knew it must be attended with a popular clamour, which might probably shake their authority. At length, however, orders were sent to Sir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, the capital of the county, to deliver that city into the hands of Charles of Anjou. Surienne, who was a native of Arragon, and had served the English above twenty years, disputed the authenticity of the order, and absolutely refused to deliver up the place. The count de Dunois was therefore sent, at the head of a numerous body of troops, and a large train of artillery, to reduce it by force. Surienne made a noble defence, but was at last obliged to capitulate; by which the garrison, consisting of two thousand five hundred men, were suffered to march out, with all their effects. They retired into Normandy; but being refused admittance into any of the fortified towns, and falling into great distress, Surienne led his troops into Britany, surprised the town of Fougères, repaired the fortifications of Pont Orson and Beuvron, and procured subsistence by extending his depredations over the whole province.

This breach of the truce, in which Britany had been included, induced the French monarch to demand satisfaction from the duke of Somerset, governor of Normandy. Somerset replied, that he was greatly concerned for these indefensible actions; but that the whole had been executed without his privity and consent; nor had he any authority over the troops that had committed the ravages of which he complained. Application was now made to the court of England, who disavowed the insult, and redress was promised for the injuries received. But the court of France, desirous of rendering an accommodation impracticable, estimated the damages at no less than one million six hundred thousand crowns. Charles was determined to take advantage of his present superiority over the English.

A.D. 1449. He accordingly declared war against Henry, and soon annexed Normandy to his dominions. The brave Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, indeed, supported his reputation and glory to the last. "He was" says father Orleans, "equal to an army." But the province was invaded in four different places, and Talbot had only an handful of forces under his command; so that nothing could be expected from that gallant officer, especially as the greater part of the garrisons consisted of Normans, who opened their gates to the enemy almost at the first summons. Guienne suffered the same fate; and that province, which had for three centuries formed a part of the dominions of the crown of England, was now reunited to that of France.

But more fatal misfortunes than those of losing Normandy and Guienne now threatened the English. The sword of civil war was ready to be drawn, in order to drench the fields with the blood of their owners. The duke of York, first prince of the blood, was descended, by his mother, from the house of Mortimer, which enjoyed an incontestible title to the crown of England, after the demise of Richard II. when the rights of sovereignty were usurped by the house of Lancaster. His personal merit was great, and he had contracted several powerful alliances. He had married the daughter of Nevil, earl of Westmorland, whose family was more potent than any other in the kingdom. The earl of Warwick was one of that family, a nobleman extremely popular, and so amazingly rich, that thirty thousand persons were constantly subsisted at his tables in his different manors and castles. His hospitality and munificence rendered his authority over his numerous partisans almost absolute. The duke of York, who had commanded with great applause in France, had lately been deprived of his commission, without any reason being assigned for so imprudent an exertion of power. On his return to England, some dark hints, with regard to the pretensions of his family to the crown, were dropped by his partisans, and had the desired effect. The virtues of the duke of York, and the great services he had performed for his country, were extolled to the skies.

The queen and Suffolk were alarmed at his increasing popularity; and a commotion having lately happened happened in Ireland, it was thought proper to invest him with the title of lord-lieutenant, and send him into that island, as the only person capable of restoring tranquillity. York well knew the true reason for his being sent out of the kingdom, but made no difficulty of accepting the commission. His mild and gentle behaviour soon produced the desired effect; the Irish returned to their duty, without being compelled by force. They even became so strongly devoted to him and his family, that no misfortunes were able to shake their constancy.

A. D. 1450. The people, ever since the death of Gloucester, had detested Suffolk, as the assassin of that patriotic nobleman. He was hated by the great as prime minister, and the declared favourite of the queen; and as the poverty of the crown obliged him to have recourse to arbitrary measures, it was impossible for him to escape the machinations and resentment of so formidable a faction. The popular clamours arose to an amazing height; and Adam Moleyns, bishop of Chichester, was murdered in a tumult excited by a patriotic leader of the multitude. In the agonies of death, the bishop charged Suffolk with being a traitor to his country. This charge increased the public discontent, and the House of Commons determined to impeach him.

Accordingly they accused the duke of high-treason. They ascribed to him the loss of the English dominions on the continent; and even insisted, that he had entered into a design to dethrone the king. The violence of faction had, however, carried the Commons too far; their accusation could not bear examination; it was supported by no evidence. A new charge of misdemeanors was therefore drawn up against him, chiefly regarding the perversions of authority, and, in all probability, founded entirely upon facts. Henry was now alarmed for his minister. He perceived that the Commons were determined to carry on the prosecution with the utmost vigour, and feared the upper house would declare him guilty. He therefore sent for all the lords, spiritual and temporal, to his apartment, produced Suffolk before them, and asked him what he could say in his own defence. He denied the charge, but submitted himself to the pleasure of the king, who banished him from the kingdom during five years.

But this sentence was far from satisfying the lords. They returned, in a very ill humour, to their house, and entered a strong protest against these proceedings. They declared, "That the sentence pronounced on the duke of Suffolk was not the result of their advice, but purely the king's own act, which should not at all infringe their privileges; and that if Suffolk had insisted on his right, and not submitted voluntarily to the king's pleasure, he was entitled to a trial by his peers."

The duke of Suffolk, who considered this temporary banishment as the only expedient that could save him from the fury of the people, prepared, with great alacrity, for his departure; flattering himself, that as he still enjoyed the queen's favour and confidence, he should be soon recalled. But his enemies were determined that his life should pay the forfeit of his crimes. They accordingly employed a captain of a ship to cruise off Dover, and intercept him in his passage to the continent. The captain, who had imbibed the common prejudices, performed his duty with great exactness. The duke was seized near Dover, his head struck off on the side of a long-boat, and his body thrown into the sea. No enquiry was made after the authors of this atrocious act of violence, though the court threatened to send an army into Kent, and lay the whole county waste, in revenge for the murder of Suffolk, perpetrated near that coast.

The duke of Somerset succeeded the late minister in all his power and credit with the queen; and as he was the person who commanded on the continent when the French provinces were lost, the public, who always judge by the event, soon made him the object of their animosity and hatred. Somerset was now in the same dangerous situation experienced by Suffolk; and the parliament was no sooner broke up, than various commotions were excited in different parts of the kingdom. They were, indeed, soon quelled; but sufficiently indicated the disposition of the people, and proved a prelude to an insurrection of a more alarming nature, and which, for some time, threatened the nation with very dangerous consequences.

One John, or rather Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, having been outlawed for a rape and murder committed in Suffex, had taken sanctuary, and was forced to abjure the kingdom. He, however, soon after, returned into Kent, and observing the discontents of the people, determined to turn them to his own advantage. He took upon himself the name of John Mortimer, pretending that he was the son of Sir John Mortimer, who had been beheaded in the beginning of the present reign; and consequently a near relation of Richard duke of York, the person from whom the people hoped for redress of all their grievances. The very mention of that popular name was sufficient to procure him multitudes of followers, and Cade soon found himself at the head of twenty thousand men. The arch rebel perceiving that vast numbers daily flocked to his standard, advanced to Blackheath, giving out, that he was going to reform the government, and ease the people of that load of taxes, by which they had been so long oppressed.

The court, on receiving intelligence of this insurrection, sent a message to the insurgents, demanding the reason for their appearance in arms. Cade replied, that they had no design to offer the least violence to the person of the king; they only desired to present a petition to the parliament, that the ministers who oppressed the people might be removed from the royal presence. At the same time, he delivered to the deputies two papers, enumerating the grievances of the nation. Among other particulars, they prayed that the duke of Somerset might be punished, as the principal author of the loss of Normandy; that the king's council might be filled with the princes of the blood, and other prudent and judicious persons; and not with vicious and profligate men of bad principles and corrupt morals, from whom neither happiness nor tranquillity could be expected.

These remonstrances were, however, so far from producing the intended effect, that the ministry, thinking themselves highly insulted, determined to have recourse to violent methods for quelling the rebellion. An army of fifteen thousand disciplined forces, under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford, was sent against the insurgents. Cade artfully affected to be terrified at the general's approach, and retired, with the main body of the rebels, to Sevenoak; but left a strong detachment in ambuscade to intercept Stafford in his march. The royal army followed without observing the necessary cautions, and were so furiously attacked by Cade's concealed forces, that great numbers of them were cut to pieces, and the rest sought their safety in a precipitate flight. The general himself fell in the action.

Animated by this success, Cade returned to Blackheath, and again sent a remonstrance to the king and council, demanding, "That the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, should be recalled to court; that the murderers of the good duke of Gloucester, together with all those who had contributed to the loss of the English territories on the continent, should be brought to condign punishment." The government, alarmed at the late defeat of their forces, and knowing that the secret friends of the duke of York were on the point of declaring themselves, resolved, if possible, to purchase their safety by sacrificing some individuals to the fury of the populace. The lords Say and Cromer, who had rendered themselves very unpopular, were committed to the Tower; and the archbishop of Canterbury, and and the duke of Buckingham, sent to treat with the insurgents. Cade received them with the utmost complaisance, but told them he was absolutely determined not to lay down his arms, till the king came in person and granted their requests. The effect of this conference was reported to the council, and the king, persuaded he had every thing to fear from the fury of the insurgents, set out, with his whole court, for Kenelworth castle.

Their retreat was no sooner known to Cade, than he marched directly towards the capital; where the citizens, alarmed at the success of the rebels, opened their gates, and Cade entered in triumph at the head of his forces. He had even the insolence to strike his sword against London-stone, crying out, "Now is Mortimer lord of London. He, however, maintained, for some time, great order and discipline among his followers. He always led them out at the approach of night into the fields, where they continued till the morning, when they again returned into the city. But being resolved, in order to gratify their malevolence against Say and Cromer, to put those ministers to death, he could no longer restrain their riotous dispositions. They plundered the houses of the more opulent citizens, and committed so many disorders, that the inhabitants perceived, there was a necessity for joining the regular troops, in order to prevent the destruction with which they were threatened. Accordingly when Cade marched out of the city in the evening, they seized the gates, and put the detachments that guarded them to death.

Cade and his followers, at their return in the morning, found the gate of the bridge shut and barricaded against them. They attempted, however, to force a passage. A battle ensued, and the contest continued till night, without either party gaining any remarkable advantage. The rebels were greatly disappointed at not being able to open themselves a passage into the city; and the ministry took advantage of their timidity. They drew up a general pardon for the insurgents, provided they would lay down their arms; and another for Cade in particular, on condition of his abandoning his rebellious projects. These pardons were issued under the great seal, and prudently published during the night in the camp of the insurgents. The effect was astonishing. The morning no sooner appeared than Cade found himself deserted by the greater part of his followers, and retreated to Rochester, where the rest dispersed, notwithstanding all his remonstrances and artful speeches, by which he endeavoured to persuade them, that the pardon they had received was of no effect, as it had not received the sanction of the parliament. Perceiving that all his arts were exerted in vain, he fled into the wolds of Sussex, with a few of his friends, who were determined to share his fate. A price was now set upon his head by the government, and he was slain by one Iden, a gentleman of Sussex, who sent his head to London. The duke of York was strongly suspected of having excited this insurrection, in order to make a trial of the sentiments of the people. He was still in Ireland, where his success had entitled him to the public esteem and confidence; but he now hastened to return to England, persuaded that his personal security depended upon the vigour of his measures; and the whole kingdom was immediately filled with his pretensions and rights.

A. D. 1451. Soon after his landing, he wrote a very submissive letter to the king, in which he pointed out the grievances of the nation, and offered his best services to reform the abuses that had crept into the government. The ministry perceived the duke's real intention; but their present situations obliged them to act cautiously; and it was resolved to return a civil answer. Accordingly the king, in a letter to the duke, told him, "That he had for some time been sensible of the necessity of reforming the government; and intended to nominate a council for that purpose, and of constituting the duke of York as their president." Adding, "that till this could be effected, such precautions should be used that the duke of Somerset should be ready to take his trial whenever it was thought necessary." It was imagined by the ministry, that this remarkable condescension would deprive the duke of York of all pretensions for taking up arms; but they were mistaken; the offers were declared unsatisfactory by the duke's friends, and it was resolved to proceed in their scheme early in the ensuing spring.

This interesting contest engaged the attention of the whole kingdom. The people were divided in opinion with regard to the pretensions of the houses of Lancaster and York. Many plausible reasons were urged by the partisans of both parties. "Richard II. said the friends of Lancaster, was dethroned by an act of the nation; and Henry IV. was placed in the seat of power by the same authority. The right of succession was a rule admitted only for the general good, and could not be pleaded to the destruction of the national tranquillity. Two glorious reigns had consolidated the possession and rights of the reigning family, and the people were bound to allegiance by the numerous oaths of fealty they had taken. Even the duke of York himself, had renounced claims to which he might have been entitled, by having done homage to Henry, as his lawful sovereign. To what calamities, added they, would the nation be exposed, if disputes and revolutions, which must be attended with bloodshed, and all the violences of civil contention, were encouraged." It was urged on the contrary, by the partisans of the duke of York, "That the maintenance of order in the succession of princes, was the basis of public tranquillity; that the injustice committed by the violation of it, could not be too soon repaired; that the lapse of many ages was necessary to give avidity to a violent establishment; that both the deposition of Richard and the coronation of Henry IV. had been occasioned by a popular insurrection rather than by a deliberate act of the nation; that the lawful heirs of the crown had, indeed, submitted to necessity and force, but had never renounced their rights; and that a revolution destined to establish order, so far from proving ruinous to the state, would prevent similar disputes for the future." These arguments were continually repeated, and appeared weaker or stronger in proportion to the prejudice of the party. But they tended not to heal the animosities of the people; arms alone were sufficient to decide the important contest.

A. D. 1452. As soon as the spring was considerably advanced, the duke of York, who was then in Wales, had joined his friends, and entered England at the head of a formidable army. No acts of hostility were, however, committed; they marched peaceably forwards, and published a manifesto, declaring that their sole intent was to promote the good of the nation; to release the oppressed subject from a burden he was unable to bear: and to bring a corrupt administration to justice. These plausible reasons produced the desired effect. The people, who groaned under enormous taxes, gladly joined the duke's standards; he soon saw himself at the head of ten thousand men, and directed his march towards London, expecting to have met with no opposition from the royal army, but he was mistaken; the queen and Somerset had exerted all their power to raise a number of forces sufficient to meet the duke in the open field, and their attempts were successful. The king marched from London against him; but before the two armies met, York was informed of his danger, changed his route, and, by forced marches, reached the capital, before Henry knew that he intended to evade a battle. But the duke soon perceived that he had placed too much confidence in the promises of the Londoners; instead of receiving him with open arms, they shut their gates against him.

Henry no sooner received advice that the duke had passed by his army, than he returned with the utmost expedition towards the capital, while the duke of York

York crossed the Thames at Kingston, and being joined by Thomas Courtney, earl of Devon, and the lord Cobham, he encamped on Bremheath near Dartford. The king followed him close, and, marching over London-bridge, encamped on Black-heath. The duke of Somerset, who attended the king on this occasion, and seems to have been an able politician, advised Henry to crush this rebellion in its bud, and not wait till it had gathered strength, and become formidable. He observed, that this was the time to attack the insurgents, who might be defeated with ease, and the nation freed from all future attempts of this kind, as the great superiority of the royal army almost insured a victory. But Henry was so impolitic as to neglect this prudent counsel. He listened to the advice of some timorous, perhaps treacherous noblemen, and had recourse to negotiation. This counsel was indeed better adapted to the pacific genius of Henry, and to that aversion he always entertained to spilling the blood of his subjects. Certain prelates and noblemen were sent to know the reasons for the duke's appearing in arms, and upon what terms he was willing to restore the tranquillity of the nation.

York, with the greatest appearance of respect and moderation, told the messengers, that the prosperity of his country was his sole intention; that he desired nothing more than to reform the government, by bringing to justice the duke of Somerset, and others of the council, who had trampled on the laws of the kingdom, and oppressed the people. He added, that he was willing to disband his forces, and throw himself at Henry's feet, if the persons he had mentioned were taken into custody, and brought to answer the charge he was ready to exhibit against them in parliament. Henry made no difficulty of complying; Somerset was put under arrest, and the duke of York by this condescension, deprived of all excuses for keeping up a body of forces. He saw his error, but determined to keep his word. Accordingly, he dismissed his army, and repaired to court without arms, and without a passport. When he came into the royal presence, he openly avowed the cause of his taking up arms, and insisted that the duke of Somerset should be immediately brought to trial; when to his great astonishment, that minister came from a private closet in the presence-chamber, and bitterly reviled him for his treasonable practices. A virulent contention ensued, and a torrent of the most indecent invectives were poured out, without the least regard to the presence of the sovereign.

Somerset insisted on putting the duke of York to death immediately; but the more dispassionate members of the council, fearful of carrying matters to such extremities, would not permit that any violence should be offered to his person. Any attempt of that kind would, indeed, in all probability, have been attended with very disagreeable consequences to the government. The duke was accordingly dismissed, after making a formal submission to the king, and acknowledging, upon oath, his title to the crown.

A. D. 1453. But Somerset did not long enjoy his triumph over the duke of York. The bad success of an enterprize which had been taken against Guienne, and in which the brave Talbot, the glory of the English arms, perished; together with the birth of a son to Henry, which cut off all the duke's hopes of succeeding to the crown, without the effusion of human blood, served, once more, to kindle the flame of civil discord, and increase the activity and zeal of the partisans of the house of York. But it was thought necessary to conceal their intentions under the mask of submission, as the candour of his late conduct in disbanding his forces, and the oath he had taken to the king, had lulled the court into a perfect security. The king had for some time been afflicted with a dangerous disease, which had occasioned the meeting of parliament to be postponed several times. The secret friends of the duke of York were determined not to lose so favourable an opportunity of procuring that nobleman his seat in the council, from which he had been unjustly excluded. They accordingly insinuated to the queen and Somerset, that when the present dispositions of the people were considered, there was very little reason to expect that the parliament would be very ready to comply with their desires; on the contrary, it was sufficiently apparent, that, conformable to the wishes of the nation, that assembly would appoint a new ministry. They added, that the only sure method of preventing that misfortune would be to admit into the council, the duke of York, the earls of Warwick and Salisbury, and some other popular noblemen, in order to convince the public, that they had no intention of making their own wills the sole rule of government. This advice appeared so plausible to the queen and her favourite, who dreaded the effects of a parliament censure, that they readily embraced the proposal, and these noblemen took their seat at the council-board before the meeting of the parliament.

A. D. 1454. The minister soon felt the effects of his complaisance. The Yorkists had no sooner gained admittance into the council, than their credit superseded that of their adversaries. The proceedings of government were changed; they renewed the prosecution against Somerset, and even ventured to arrest him in the queen's presence, and to send him prisoner to the Tower. The council was now entirely governed by the duke of York, and the king still continuing in a state incapable of holding the reins of government, it was thought necessary to appoint the duke of York lieutenant of the kingdom; with powers to hold the ensuing session of parliament in the king's name. This title was soon after changed into that of protector, by the parliament.

A. D. 1454. But York did not long enjoy this plenitude of power. Henry recovered from his late indisposition; and the duke's commission was superseded; Somerset was released from his confinement, restored to his former power in the administration; and, in conjunction with the queen, directed all the affairs of government. The duke of York had now every thing to fear, and after concerting measures proper to be pursued in this alarming conjuncture, retired into Wales in order to raise a body of forces. He well knew that the proceedings of the council in releasing Somerset, without bringing him before the parliament, would be considered as a sufficient reason for renewing his pretences to reform the government. He was not deceived. The popular clamour against the minister was soon as loud as before; and the people flocked from all parts to his standard, so that he soon found himself at the head of three thousand men.

Thinking himself now sufficiently powerful to resist any force the king could bring into the field against him, he marched directly to London, hoping to surprise Henry in the capital. But he was deceived in his expectations. The king, at his approach, marched out to meet the insurgents, though his army consisted of no more than two thousand men. Richard, without advancing any pretensions to the crown, demanded only a reformation of government. This request was denied, and a battle was fought at St. Albans between the two parties, in which the Yorkists were victorious. The duke of Somerset, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, the lord Clifford, with many knights and gentlemen of eminence, and above eight hundred common soldiers were killed on the spot. The king himself fell into the hands of the duke of York, who treated him with the greatest respect and tenderness. This was the first blood spilt in that fatal quarrel which subsisted thirty years; which was signalized by twelve pitched battles; and which gave occasion to the most cruel and sanguinary excesses. No less than eighty princes of the blood fell in these dreadful contests, and the ancient nobility of England were almost entirely annihilated.

A. D. 1455. Affairs did not, however, immediately proceed to the last extremities: Margaret of Anjou supported supported, in some measure, the tottering throne; and the nation was kept in suspense by the irresolute temper of the duke of York. The parliament, which met soon after the battle of St. Albans, granted to the Yorkists a general indemnity, restored the protectorship to the duke, but, at the same time, they renewed their oaths of fealty to Henry. The queen did not behold the success of the duke of York with idle resignation. Henry Beaufort, duke of Somerset, the son of him who fell at St. Albans, glowed with impatience to revenge the death of his father. Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, was equally enflamed in a desire of vengeance for the loss of his son, who perished in the same contest; and all the princes and nobles, allied or attached to the house of Lancaster, determined to exert all their endeavours to pluck the duke of York from the seat of power.

Richard, regardless of this opposition, lived in such apparent security, as astonished his enemies. Persuaded that an attempt to wrest the sceptre from a family who had held it near sixty years, would be attended with the utmost difficulty, and, perhaps, prove abortive, after deluging the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants; he resolved to wait for some favourable opportunity for asserting his rights, and seizing the crown to which he had an indisputable title. His great care was to acquire the love of the people, without which he knew all his efforts must be ineffectual. Desirous of convincing them that his conduct was not influenced by passion or interest, he paid the utmost attention to the affairs of the royal family: he established the household of the prince of Wales, and settled on him a decent maintenance; and, at the same time, left the king and queen at liberty to act as they thought proper. He was persuaded it was not in their power to divest him of the dignity of protector, because his patent could not be revoked without the consent of parliament. But the queen was of too active and enterprising a spirit to be diverted from her purpose by such slender obstacles.

A.D. 1456. On the meeting of the parliament, Henry, who had now, in some measure, recovered his former health, came to the house, and declared from the throne his resolution to re-assume the reins of government; and desired the duke of York's patent might be annulled. No opposition was made to the king's declaration: Henry was declared to be reinstated in his sovereign authority, and Richard's patent was revoked. Had Margaret been satisfied with this success, she might, perhaps, have enjoyed her authority for some time without disturbance; but elated with this favourable turn of fortune, she resolved to secure her future tranquillity by arresting the persons of York, Salisbury, and Warwick.

A.D. 1457. In order to effect this dangerous undertaking with more security, the court removed to Coventry; and letters, under the privy-seal, were dispatched to those three noblemen, commanding them to attend the king on affairs of importance. They made no scruple to obey the order; but when they were within a few miles of Coventry, they received intelligence from their friends, that designs were formed against their liberties and lives. They immediately separated themselves. Richard withdrew to his castle of Wigmore, in Herefordshire; Salisbury to Middleham, in Yorkshire; and Warwick to his government of Calais, which had been conferred on him after the battle of St. Albans. This treacherous attempt destroyed all remains of confidence; and an unusual degree of animosity took place between the partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster. But still the archbishop of Canterbury, and other persons of peaceable dispositions, hoped it was not yet too late to interpose their good offices for bringing about a reconciliation between the two parties, and prevent the dreadful consequences of a civil war, which otherwise appeared inevitable. For some time, all offers were rejected; but at last their labours seemed to promise a happy termination to these alarming dissensions; and it was agreed that all the great leaders of both parties should meet at London, in order to effect a solemn reconciliation.

A.D. 1458. But their appearance resembled the meeting of two numerous armies, rather than that of the chief nobility of the same kingdom. They seemed to be followed by the greater part of the inhabitants. The duke of York and his partisans took up their quarters near each other for mutual security. The same precaution was observed by the chiefs of the other party; and the mayor of London, at the head of five thousand men, patrolled the streets, to keep the peace between them. At length an apparent reconciliation was effected; but the terms upon which it was founded took not away the ground of difference. This agreement was, however, notified to the public by a solemn procession to St. Paul's cathedral, where the duke of York led queen Margaret, and a chief of one party walked hand in hand with a chief of the opposite; exhibiting every appearance of a cordial reconciliation and undisguised confidence. But, unfortunately for the peace of the nation, there was very little sincerity on either side. Instead of labouring sincerely in the great ends of union; instead of taking their places at the council-board, to which they were now entitled, the confederated lords suddenly retired to the places where their interest was most considerable; the duke of York to the borders of Wales; the earl of Salisbury to the north; and the earl of Warwick to his government of Calais.

A.D. 1459. The peace was, however, observed; but in such a manner, that it was sufficiently evident the least accident would revive the flames of civil discord. This was too soon effected. The earl of Warwick having returned to London to justify his conduct with regard to some ships he had taken in the channel, a fray happened between one of his servants and a domestic belonging to the queen; in which the latter, who was the aggressor, was desperately wounded. The companions of each party took part in the quarrel; the streets of London were filled with blood and confusion; the attorney-general was killed in the commotion, and the earl himself narrowly escaped. Both parties, in every county in England, now openly made preparations for deciding the contest by the sword.

Armies were raised in different parts of the kingdom; and it was expected, that when the respective forces of each party were joined, the dispute would be determined by a general engagement. The earl of Salisbury having raised a number of troops, was marching to join the duke of York; but was overtaken on Bloreheath, on the borders of Staffordshire, by lord Audley, at the head of a much superior body of forces. The river Stow, a small stream, but of considerable depth, ran between the two armies, and its banks were lined with lord Audley's troops. Salisbury well knew that his forces were not able to engage those of the enemy in the open field, and had recourse to stratagem. He ordered a detachment of his best archers to advance briskly to the banks of the river, and pour a shower of arrows upon the royalists. This being effected, he founded a retreat, and his forces retired with the appearance of precipitate confusion. This produced the desired effect. The royalists were deceived; and thinking the Yorkists were flying before them, began to pass the stream with great precipitation; but when part of the royal army had passed the brook, Salisbury suddenly turned upon them; and partly by surprise, and partly by the division of the enemy's forces, totally routed them. The rest of the army were seized with a panic, fled in the utmost disorder, and Salisbury obtained a complete victory. Lord Audley himself, and several of his principal officers, fell in the action.

Encouraged by his success, York joined Salisbury at Ludlow, and openly declared his pretensions to the crown. He was soon after joined by the earl of Warwick; at the head of a body of veterans from Calais. The queen, and all the nobility in the interest of the house of Lancaster, were now convinced of the necessity of exerting their whole power to prevent the Yorkists from wresting the sceptre from Henry's hand; and an army, superior in numbers to that of the insurgents, was soon ready to take the field. The Yorkists were encamped near Ludlow; and the royalists advanced immediately to Worcester, where they halted. Henry, in order to prevent the effusion of human blood, sent Richard Beauchamp, bishop of Salisbury, with an offer of pardon to the rebels, if they would lay down their arms. But his proposals were refused, and both parties prepared to decide their quarrel by the sword.

But the night preceding the intended engagement, the Calais veterans, who had hitherto imagined they were going to rescue the king from the hands of a wicked ministry, perceived their mistake. They found that the contest was to wrest the sceptre from the hand of Henry, whom they considered as their lawful sovereign, and therefore deserted to the royal army. This defection so intimidated the Yorkists, that they separated the next day, without making the least disposition for a battle. The duke of York fled to Ireland; the earls of Marche, Salisbury, and Warwick, into Devonshire, where Sir John Denham provided them with ships, which carried them over to Calais. The parliament meeting soon after at Coventry, an act of attainder was passed against the duke of York, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and their principal adherents; who were all declared traitors, their estates forfeited, and their heirs disinherited.

A. D. 1460. There now remained no hopes of accommodation; every thing wore the aspect of war and desolation. Warwick, who was greatly beloved both by the soldiers and seamen, was very successful in his cruises; and having received invitations from his partisans, he landed in Kent, with the earls of Salisbury and Marche, at the head of fifteen hundred men. He was soon joined by the archbishop of Canterbury and the lord Cobham, and marched directly to London, amidst the acclamations of the people. The city gates were immediately thrown open; and his troops continually increasing, he soon found himself in a condition of facing the royal army, which hastened from Coventry to attack him. The two armies met at Northampton, and a furious battle ensued. For some time, the victory continued doubtful; but the lord Gréy of Ruthin, who commanded the vanguard of the royal forces, deserting to the enemy in the heat of the engagement, the whole army was filled with consternation, and Warwick obtained a complete victory. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, the lords Egremont and Beaumont, Sir William Lucy, and several other persons of distinction, were among the slain. Henry himself, that empty shadow of a king, was again taken prisoner, but used with great tenderness and respect, the innocence and simplicity of his manners having procured him the highest regard of the people. He bore this change of condition with the utmost fortitude and resignation. Perhaps his natural imbecillity rendered him equally insensible of good or bad fortune.

Henry was conducted to London; and soon after his arrival, a parliament was summoned to meet at Westminster the beginning of October. The duke of York arrived from Ireland three days after the opening of the session. He repaired immediately to the House of Lords, and advanced towards the throne; but was stopped by the archbishop of Canterbury, who asked him if he had yet paid his respects to the king? York was confounded at this question, and for some time continued silent; but at last replied, That he knew of no person to whom he owed that title. This sudden declaration alarmed the assembly; and Richard standing near the throne, complained to the house of the various calamities his family had suffered since the deposition of Richard II. enumerated the cruelties by which the house of Lancaster had paved their way to the seat of power; insisted on the miseries which had attended the government of Henry; and exhorted them to do justice to the lineal successor. This regard to law and liberty was very unusual in times of violence and licentious tumult. The assembly were struck with so uncommon a precedent; and examined, with the utmost calmness and tranquillity, the duke's pretensions. At last they pronounced a decision, calculated; as far as possible, to please both parties. They declared, that the duke's title was indefeasible; but as Henry had now enjoyed the crown thirty-eight years without any opposition being made to his title; they determined that he should continue to possess both the title and dignity during his life; but that the administration of the government should, in the mean time, remain with Richard, who should be acknowledged the true and lawful heir of the monarchy, and succeed to the crown immediately on the decease of Henry: that every one should swear to maintain his succession: that it should be high-treason to attempt his life; and that all former acts for settling the succession of the crown, during the two last reigns, should be repealed.

This act was passed by the unanimous consent of the whole legislative body; and the accommodation celebrated by a solemn procession to St. Paul's, at which Henry, and both houses of parliament, assisted. The king himself appeared not to be the least affected with this sudden revolution in his affairs. Satisfied with the present tranquillity he was permitted to enjoy, he devoted his whole time to exercises of devotion, and committed entirely the care of the administration to those who acted under the sanction of his name and authority.

Very different were the sentiments of queen Margaret. She was a woman superior to her sex, whom no dangers could intimidate, and who was capable of the utmost efforts of heroism. She had taken refuge in Scotland with the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and was now exerting all her talents to bring the northern counties of England over to her interest. The duke of York was soon apprised of the impending storm, and trembled for the consequences. A summons was sent her to repair immediately to London, in order to put a stop to her enterprizes, or of procuring a pretence for banishing her from the kingdom. No regard was paid to the mandate; but advice was soon received, that she was advancing towards the capital at the head of twenty thousand men. Richard had only five thousand, but marched as the head of this little army to stop the progress of the queen; while his son, the earl of Marche, repaired to the borders of Wales, in order to raise a more considerable body of forces, and join his father. The queen determined not to lose the opportunity of attacking Richard before his army was increased by the additional forces of his son. She therefore quickened her march; and the duke of York, conscious of his being unable to meet, in the open field, an army so superior in numbers, threw himself into Sandal-castle, situated in the neighbourhood of Wakefield.

Margaret advanced to the gates of the fortress, and used every method in her power to provoke the duke to a battle. For some time, all her arts were vain; but she at last effected by stratagem what could not be done by any other method. She marched, at the head of the main body of her army, towards the capital, leaving only a small detachment in the neighbourhood of the castle. But during the night, she separated her army into two divisions, and placed them in ambush on the sides of Wakefield-green. On the queen's departure, York drew out his forces, and determined to give the enemy battle; but he had hardly drawn them up in order of battle, before he was attacked, both in flank and rear, by the two bodies placed in ambush for that purpose. He now perceived his error, but it was too late to retrieve it, and resolved to sell his life as dear as possible. His courage was changed into despair. He attacked the enemy with the utmost fury; and his followers catching the enthusiastic valour of their leader, pursued his track of slaughter in a firm, compacted body. The contest did not last above half an hour, but that short interval of time was crowded with destruction. Above two thousand eight hundred of the duke's army were cut in pieces, and he himself fell in the action. His son, the duke of Rutland, a youth of seventeen, whose exterior figure, as well as other accomplishments, are represented by historians as extremely amiable, was murdered in cold blood by lord Clifford. The earl of Salisbury was wounded and taken prisoner, and immediately beheaded, with several other persons of distinction, by martial law, at Pomfret. The body of the duke of York being found among the slain, his head was cut off by lord Clifford, and sent to Margaret, who caused it to be fixed on the walls of York, encircled with a paper crown, in derision of his title.

Thus perished, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and who surely merited a better fate. He lost his life by adhering to principles which render him an object of our esteem. Had he followed the ferocious practice of the times, and founded his throne on the blood of his enemies, he might, in all probability, have enjoyed the English sceptre, notwithstanding all the efforts of the house of Lancaster. He left behind him three sons, Edward, George, and Richard; and three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth, and Margaret.

A.D. 1461. The queen was too much elated by her late victory. Instead of keeping her whole force together to act against the enemy, she separated her army into two divisions; sending one of them, under the command of Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, against Edward, now duke of York, who was raising forces on the borders of Wales; while she herself marched with the other division towards the capital, where the earl of Warwick was left to command the Yorkists. As soon as Edward had finished his levies, he began his march towards London, in order to join the earl of Warwick, and retaliate on Margaret the cruelty his friends had suffered. He was met by the earl of Pembroke at Mortimer's Cross, in Herefordshire, where a battle ensued; but Pembroke's army being far inferior to that of Edward, they were soon routed, and above four thousand men fell in the action. He himself escaped by flight; but his father, Sir Edward Tudor, was taken prisoner, and, with several other persons of distinction, put to death with the utmost brutality. These illegal and horrid executions were afterwards an hundred times repeated by the leaders of both parties; so atrocious and sanguinary are civil commotions!

This defeat was soon after compensated by Margaret, who was then leading her victorious forces towards London. Warwick, apprised of her approach, advanced as far as St. Albans to meet her; and a battle ensued upon Barnard-heath. For some time, the Yorkists had the advantage; but lord Lovelace, who commanded a considerable division of the army, treacherously withdrawing from the combat, victory declared for Margaret. About two thousand five hundred Yorkists were slain in the contest, and the person of the king himself fell again into the hands of his own party. Lord Bonneville and Sir Thomas Kiriell, to whose care the king had been intrusted, continued with him after the defeat of the army, relying on the royal promise of protection. But Margaret paid no regard to the assurances given by Henry: she caused both their heads to be struck off by the hand of the executioner.

The duke of York still continued his march towards the capital, and was soon after joined by the earl of Warwick, at the head of the remainder of his forces. Margaret, who thought it imprudent to remain in the neighbourhood of London, retired into the north, where she hoped to increase her army to so formidable a number, as would insure success against all opposition. Edward, therefore, continued his march, and was received by the citizens as their guardian angel. He was, indeed, formed to attract the love of the people. His external figure was beautiful beyond description; his constitution active and hardy; his judgment quick and penetrating; and his abilities as a soldier surpassed by none of his age. But his failings unhappily obscured the lovely dawn that ushered in the morning of his youth. He was cruelly vindictive: the laurels he gained in the field were stained by the streams of noble blood with which he deluged both the field and the scaffold. More resolute than his father, and more certain of the attachment of the people, whom he had entirely gained over by his popular manners, he determined to assume the title and dignity of king; persuaded that all the misfortunes of his family were owing to their timidity in not supporting their claim to the crown with the necessary firmness and intrepidity.

But notwithstanding his plausible title, it was necessary to obtain a national consent, or at least something that had the appearance of it. Time would not permit the assembling of a parliament, which might also be attended with other inconveniences; a less regular method therefore was chosen. The army was ordered to assemble in the fields near Clerkenwell, whither an infinite crowd of people resorted. In the midst of this multitude, an harangue was pronounced, displaying the title of Edward, and inveighing against the usurpation and tyranny of the Lancaster family. After which, the people were asked, whether they were still desirous that Henry of Lancaster should continue to hold the sceptre of England? The whole multitude exclaimed against the proposal. It was then demanded, whether they would accept of Edward, duke of York, for their king? The answer was a loud and general exclamation of applause. The experiment having thus far happily succeeded, a great council was called at Barnard's-castle, where the popular election was confirmed, and the new king was proclaimed on the fifth of March, in the streets of London and Westminster, by the name of Edward IV.

This transaction finished the reign of Henry VI. a prince who had been long the sport of fortune, though he enjoyed the crown even in his cradle. But he was not formed for governing a ferocious people. In less violent times, when the laws were more respected; he might, perhaps, have swayed the English sceptre with applause. His virtues rendered his person respectable, but they were not sufficient to support him against the powerful attacks of insatiable ambition.

E D W A R D IV.

A.D. 1461. THE very commencement of Edward's reign was marked with blood! A tradesman in the city, whose shop was known by the sign of the crown, having told his son, in a jocular manner, that he would make him "heir to the crown," the expression was construed as a sarcasm upon Edward's title, and the shopkeeper suffered death for his pleasantry. But this was only the beginning of those sanguinary actions which almost destroyed the nobility of England, and laid great part of the country waste. Every district of the kingdom was filled with the two implacable factions distinguished by the white and red roses; the former being the badge of the house of York, and the latter of that of Lancaster; and Edward was too much disposed to confirm his authority by cruel executions. Margaret, who was a stranger to fear, and who considered her repeated defeats as the most powerful motives for new attempts, exerted all her abilities to recruit her army, and engage the usurper of her husband's throne. She had already rendered herself extremely popular in the northern counties, and soon found herself at the head of sixty thousand disciplined forces.

Edward was alarmed at her success, and hastened, with an army of forty thousand men, to check her progress. He was accompanied by the earl of Warwick, and continued his march, with the utmost expedition, till he reached Pontefract, in Yorkshire. Lord Fitzwalter was now detached with a body of troops, to take possession of Ferrybridge, a pass over the river Aire, and then of the utmost importance. Fitzwalter executed his commission with success, and took post on the north side of the stream. The royal army was commanded by the duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford; all of them famous for their military abilities, and unshaken friends to the Lancaster family. The king and queen, with their young son the prince of Wales, retired to York, in expectation of an event which must finally decide the contest for the English throne.

The surprisal of Ferrybridge was considered as an event of the utmost importance; and it was determined, if possible, to drive the enemy from that advantageous post. Accordingly lord Clifford was sent, at the head of a party, during the night; and reaching the post before break of day, he fell so unexpectedly upon the enemy's detachment, that the greater part of them were cut to pieces, the pass was recovered, and Fitzwalter himself slain in the action.

This loss greatly affected the spirits of the Yorkists; an incident the more alarming, as a decisive engagement was every hour expected. The earl of Warwick perceived the danger; and ordering his horse to be brought, he stabbed him with his sword in presence of the whole army; and kissing the hilt of the weapon, he swore to share the fate of the meanest soldier, and either conquer or perish. At the same time, a proclamation was issued, by which every person who pleased was at full liberty to retire; but the whole army declared, they would gain the victory, or fall with their leaders. Animated by this resolution, lord Fauconbridge undertook to recover the pass in possession of lord Clifford. Accordingly he passed the Aire at Cailleford, three miles above the place; and marched with such secrecy and expedition, that Clifford was surprised, his detachment routed, and he himself found among the slain.

Edward now led his troops against the enemy; and the two armies met at Tooton, where a bloody battle ensued. While the Yorkists were advancing to the charge, there happened a heavy fall of snow, which being driven by a brisk wind in the faces of the Lancastrians, prevented them from knowing, with any degree of exactness, the distance of the enemy. Lord Fauconbridge, who led the van of Edward's army, improved this advantage. He ordered his men to advance as near as possible; and after discharging a flight of arrows on the enemy, to retire with the utmost expedition to their former post. This stratagem produced the desired effect. The Lancastrians perceiving, by the force of the arrows, that the enemy was very near, emptied their quivers by repeated discharges, without producing any great effect; and then advanced, sword in hand, to decide the dreadful contest. The Yorkists, who had kept their arrows, poured in so dreadful a discharge, that the advanced line fell back on the main body. The earl of Northumberland perceiving the disadvantage of his forces, pressed forward, and the battle soon became very obstinate and bloody. The dreadful contest continued ten hours with unremitting fury, and without any perceivable advantage on either side. The field was covered with dead, and the groans of the wounded augmented the horrors of the battle. Towards evening, the Lancastrians began to give ground, and retreat in good order towards Tadcaster bridge. Animated with the appearance of the victory, the Yorkists redoubled their efforts, and attacked the enemy with so much fury, that they were unable to support the charge. Their ranks, which they had hitherto maintained with surprising firmness, were broken, and a precipitate flight ensued. Edward had issued orders to give no quarter, so that the carnage was shocking to humanity. Above thirty-six thousand persons perished that day by the swords of their countrymen. Among these were the earl of Westmorland, and his brother Sir John Nevil, the earl of Northumberland, the lords Dacres and Welles, and Sir Andrew Trollop. The earl of Devonshire, who had lately espoused the cause of Henry, was taken prisoner, and soon after beheaded at York. Henry, his queen, and the young prince, escaped into Scotland; but the intestine divisions which then prevailed in that kingdom prevented their receiving any effectual assistance.

Edward thought it unnecessary to pursue the fugitive family. He returned to London, and summoned a parliament, which met at Westminster on the fourth of November. No difficulty was made against acknowledging Edward's title to the crown; they even declared, that he was properly possessed of the throne from the moment he assumed the government, tendered to him by the acclamations of the people. They reversed several acts passed in the late reigns, particularly the attainders of the earls of Cambridge, Salisbury, and Gloucester, and that of lord Lumley. They also passed an act of forfeiture and attainder against Henry, queen Margaret, their infant son prince Edward, and their principal partisans. Such, in these ferocious times, was too often the fortune of princes!

A.D. 1462. But Edward was not contented with the dreadful sacrifice that had been already made to his safety: he thought it necessary that others, tho' they had never appeared in arms against him, should feel the weight of his power. John de Vere, earl of Oxford, a nobleman venerable for his years, and venerable for his virtues, together with his son Aubrey de Vere, were tried by martial law, for a pretended correspondence with Margaret, and beheaded on Tower-hill. Sir Thomas Tudenham, Sir William Tyrrel, Sir Baldwin Fulford, and John Montgomery, suffered the same fate. Edward distributed the estates of these victims to his ambition, among his own adherents. Nor did he neglect the opportunity of cultivating the esteem of the clergy. He confirmed their privileges, exempted them from being prosecuted in civil courts for felony, and other offences: indulgences which could not fail of engaging that powerful body of men in his interest.

While Edward was employed in establishing his throne, Margaret was soliciting the court of France for assistance to replace Henry in the seat of power. Lewis XI. who had lately succeeded his father, was sufficiently inclined to feed the flames of civil discord among such dangerous neighbours, by giving assistance to the weaker party: but having formed the project of humbling his own nobility, he was not in a capacity of furnishing Margaret with a sufficient number of troops to effect the intended purpose. He, however, sent a small body of forces, under the command of Varenne, seneschal of Normandy, who landed in Northumberland, and made himself master of Alnwick-castle.

A.D. 1463. As nothing could be expected from this handful of men, Margaret passed over to France, in order to solicit, in person, a more powerful assistance. She even offered to deliver up Calais, on condition of receiving an army sufficient to drive Edward from the throne. The duke of Brittany supplied her with twelve thousand crowns, and Lewis with two thousand men at arms. With this inconsiderable force Margaret landed at Bamburgh, in Yorkshire, and found means to take possession of that castle; but on receiving advice that Edward was advancing against her, at the head of a numerous army, she retired into Scotland. Edward soon reduced the castles of Bamburgh and Alnwick; and seeing no enemy in the field to oppose him, he returned to London.

But Margaret was not idle. She exerted herself with so much success in Scotland, that she raised a numerous army, who followed her standard chiefly for the sake of plunder. She entered Northumberland about the latter end of April, and for some time was extremely fortunate. She surprised the castle of Bamburgh; and being joined by the duke of Somerset and Sir Ralph Percy, with their followers, she took a considerable number of places in that part of the country. The first check she met with was from lord Montague, who routed a detachment of her forces on Hedgley Moor, where Sir Ralph Percy, their leader, was slain. Elated with this success, Montague determined to give battle to Margaret's army, without staying for the reinforcements he expected from Edward, who was marching to the northward at the head of a powerful army. Montague accordingly advanced against the queen's forces, encamped on a plain near Hexham. He made a furious attack during the night, and was received with equal intrepidity. But after several unsuccessful attempts, he forced the trenches, and put the Lancastrians to flight. The duke of Somerset, the lords Hungerford, Rofs, and Moleyns, Sir Thomas Hufsey, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir John Findcarn, were taken prisoners, and their heads struck off by martial law. Edward's policy led him to exterminate his enemies. He sought to establish, by their blood, a throne he had procured by violence, and which was therefore unsteady and insecure. Henry being well mounted, fled into Lancashire, where he continued concealed for a twelvemonth, but was at last discovered, and committed to the Tower. His imbecillity was so great, that no attempt was made against his life.

Margaret, with her infant son, fled into an adjacent forest, where the splendor of her attire soon betrayed her into the hands of robbers, who stripped her of her rings and jewels. Fortunately for her, the richness of the booty occasioned a quarrel among them; and while they were thus engaged with one another, Margaret and her son made their escape into the thickest part of the forest, where they wandered for some time, spent with hunger and fatigue, and oppressed with terror and affliction. In this wretched condition, the queen perceived another robber approaching with a naked sword in his hand. There was now no possibility of effecting an escape, and she trembled for the life of her son. But happily recollecting, that he might possibly be one of those persons who had been unfortunately proscribed for adhering to the interest of her husband, she approached the robber with an air of majestic confidence, and presenting to him the young prince, called out, "Here, my friend, I commit to your care the safety of the king's son." Struck with awe at the name of his prince, and penetrated with compassion at beholding persons of the highest rank reduced to such melancholy distress, the robber, who was not wholly lost to humanity and virtue, vowed to devote himself to her safety and protection. He accordingly conducted her out of the forest, to a village by the sea-side, whence she soon after escaped to Flanders.

Edward had now no enemy to fear. He had set his foot upon the neck of opposition. The parliament had confirmed his title, and he was in quiet possession of the throne. He therefore applied himself to acquire a general popularity. He lived with his subjects in the most familiar manner. He attended less to the cares of royalty, than to the dissipation of amusements and the allurements of passion. He became the general patron among the men, and the general lover among the ladies. Even foreign princes courted his alliance; and several matches worthy of him were proposed, particularly Margaret, daughter to the king of Scotland; Isabella, sister to Henry IV. of Castile; and Bona, daughter of the duke of Savoy, and sister to the queen of France. The last was chosen, and the earl of Warwick was sent to demand the princess in marriage. But while the earl was labouring to promote at once the glory of his master and the advantage of his country, an event happened which rendered his negotiation abortive, and for ever alienated his affections from his sovereign.

Edward being at a hunting-match in Wychwood-forest, took the opportunity of paying a visit to the dutchess of Bedford, who then resided at Grafton-mansion, near Stony Stratford. The dutchess, soon after her husband's death, had married Sir Richard Wideville, a private gentleman, to whom she bore several children, particularly Elizabeth, remarkable at once for the grace and beauty of her person, and her mental accomplishments. This amiable lady had married Sir John Gray of Groby, by whom she had several children; but her husband having embraced the Lancastrian party, and falling at the second battle of St. Albans, his estate was forfeited to the crown; and his widow had returned to her father's seat, where she lived in privacy and retirement. The presence of the king was thought a favourable opportunity for the beautiful widow to obtain some grace from the young monarch, who was so greatly celebrated for his condescension and gallantry, especially to those of her sex. She accordingly threw herself at the king's feet, and, with a flood of tears, implored his pity on her distressed family.

Struck with the charms of the beautiful widow, love, under the guise of compassion, stole into the heart of the amorous monarch. He raised her from the ground with the assurance of favour. The elegant conversation of the amiable object every moment increased his passion; and Edward, in his turn, became a suppliant at the feet of Elizabeth. Her virtue, however, withstood all the efforts of his address. This behaviour augmented his passion, and he offered to share his throne with the object of his affections.

affections. The marriage was secretly performed at Grafton-manor, and every precaution taken to prevent so important a secret from being known.

During these transactions, Warwick had laboured so assiduously in conducting his negotiation; that nothing remained but the ratification of the treaty, and the bringing over the princess to England. Edward's marriage could not be long concealed; and the intelligence at last reached the ears of Warwick, who immediately broke off his negotiation, and returned to England glowing with resentment and indignation at this insult offered to his honour. The king's marriage was now publicly declared, and she was crowned at Westminster-abbey on the twenty-sixth of May. Edward took no pains to regain the friendship of Warwick, to whom he was indebted for his crown: on the contrary, he took methods which tended directly to widen the breach between them. He lavished a profusion of honours and estates on the family of his queen. Her father was created earl of Rivers, and made high constable of England. Her brother, John Wideville, was married to the daughter and heiress of lord Scales, to whose honours and estates he succeeded; and all her friends and relations were raised and enobled by the royal favour. This partiality excited an uncommon degree of jealousy among the nobility, especially as Edward had obtained from parliament a general resumption of all the grants which had been made since his accession to the throne.

A. D. 1465. Warwick saw the discontents of the nobles with a secret satisfaction, and plainly perceived that he should be soon in a condition to make Edward feel the weight of his resentment. In the mean time, he obtained permission to retire to his castle of Warwick, where he practised by the arts of popular patriotism usual with persons discontented with the measures of the court. Edward knew the cause of his sequestering himself from the affairs of government, and took the most prudent methods for rendering any attempt, that might be made by that ambitious nobleman, abortive. He concluded a treaty of alliance with Philip, duke of Burgundy, a descendant of the house of Lancaster, but who made no scruple of sacrificing to his political ambition the interest of that unfortunate and oppressed family. The duke of Brittany also entered into an alliance with him, and the king of Scotland prolonged the truce for forty years. He was equally successful in obtaining supplies from his parliament; they granted him subsidies with a liberality unknown in any former reign. The Commons also passed a bill of attainder against the small remains of the Lancastrian party; and by these forfeited estates the king was enabled to gratify his friends; but his favours were chiefly bestowed on the queen's family. That princess now procured her sister Catherine to be married to the young duke of Buckingham, a minor, and a ward of the crown. William Herbert having espoused Mary, another of her sisters, was created lord Dunster, and afterwards earl of Huntingdon: and Anne, a third sister, married a son and heir of Gray, lord Ruthyn, who was now honoured with the title of earl of Kent.

Warwick and his friends saw this profusion of favours lavished on the Wideville family with secret indignation; and were joined by a multitude of discontented nobles; among whom was the duke of Clarence, Edward's brother. Warwick, however, still preserved the external marks of submission to Edward, but redoubled his attention to increase his popularity. His house was always open, his tables always spread for every one who chose to partake of his hospitality; and hence he became a greater favourite with the people than ever.

A. D. 1469. The duke of Clarence, already disgusted by the measures of the court, now contracted an intimate connection with Warwick, by marrying his eldest daughter, Isabella, by which he obtained a very noble settlement; and the earl retired to his government of Calais, under pretence of celebrating the nuptials. The spirit of faction now threatened the kingdom with all the horrors of civil discord; but the same spirit which threw the nation into confusion; so biased the pens of the historians of those times, that it is impossible to trace the causes of the various insurrections; some imputing the whole to the intrigues of Warwick; while others assert, that by his assistance they were suppressed. But however that be, the first insurrection was excited in the north, headed by one Robert Hillyard; generally called Robin of Ryddesdale; but the insurgents were soon routed, and their leader executed. The malecontents were, however; rather animated than discouraged by the ill success of their first attempt. They again assembled in more formidable numbers; and were joined by lord Fitz Hugh, and Henry Neville; son to the lord Latimer. But as both these noblemen were totally ignorant of military affairs, the command was given to Sir John Conyers, an officer of great reputation and experience. Their first intention was to make themselves masters of the city of York; but being disappointed in procuring a sufficient train of artillery, they resolved to direct their march towards the capital; and openly declared, "That they were marching to deliver their lawful sovereign, king Henry, from his confinement, and re-place him on the throne of his ancestors."

Alarmed at the progress of the rebels, and the continual augmentation of their numbers, Edward issued orders to the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and the earl of Rivers, to assemble an army in Norfolk, and the adjacent counties. He also wrote to his friend the earl of Pembroke, commanding him to assemble the Welsh, and cross the country immediately, in order to intercept the march of the rebels from the north.

Pembroke soon found himself at the head of ten thousand men, and marched with great expedition against the insurgents, who were then in the neighbourhood of Northampton. In his route he was joined by the earl of Devonshire, at the head of a considerable body of archers. As soon as the two armies came in sight of each other, Pembroke detached all his cavalry, under the command of his brother, Sir Richard Herbert; with orders to observe the position of the enemy, and, if he thought it practicable, to attack their rear. Sir Richard executed his orders; but perceived that such wise precautions had been taken by the leader of the insurgents, that an attack must be attended with the utmost disadvantage. The fiery spirit of the Welsh could not, however, be restrained by prudential reasons: they fell upon the rear of the enemy, and were repulsed with considerable slaughter.

During these transactions, the earl of Warwick arrived from Calais; and the rebels, flattering themselves with being powerfully assisted by that popular nobleman, changed their route. Instead of pursuing the road to London, they directed their march towards Warwick-castle. Pembroke, impatient of revenge, followed the rebels with such expedition, that he came up with them near Banbury, and the two armies encamped near each other. During the night, a trivial difference about quarters arising between the earls of Pembroke and Devonshire, the latter retired with his archers, and left Pembroke alone to encounter the rebels. This desertion filled the insurgents with hopes of obtaining a complete victory; and Sir Henry Neville, one of their leaders, having charged the royalists at too great a distance from the main body, was surrounded, and taken prisoner. This misfortune checked the ardour of the rebels, and they returned to their camp. But Pembroke having, without any form of trial, put the noble prisoner to death, they were exasperated to a degree bordering on madness. They attacked the Welsh army with a fury that was irresistible, put them to the sword without mercy; and having taken Pembroke and his brother prisoners, caused them both both to be immediately beheaded, Elated with their late success, they detached a party to Grafton-manor, seized the earl of Rivers and his son John, and struck off their heads in the market-place of Northampton. But they committed no farther disorders. Contented with having destroyed the most obnoxious of Edward's ministers, they dispersed, and returned quietly to their own habitations. Persuaded all these misfortunes were owing to the desertion of the earl of Devonshire, the king caused that nobleman to be executed in the like summary manner. All the laws of humanity were sacrificed to passion and resentment.

A. D. 1470. The duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick now engaged in open rebellion; but their measures were so ill concerted, that they were obliged to fly to the court of France for protection. Lewis XI. one of the most politic princes of his age, now undertook to reconcile Warwick with queen Margaret, who then resided at Angers. Perhaps no two persons ever entertained a greater animosity against each other than Warwick and Margaret. His father had been executed by the orders of the queen. He himself had twice reduced Henry to captivity, had banished Margaret, and put her most zealous friends and partisans to death. He had been the scourge of the house of Lancaster. But all these difficulties Lewis found means to remove. They were both highly exasperated against Edward, and their common interest formed an union between them. It was determined to re-establish Henry on the throne. At the same time, it was agreed, that Warwick and the duke of Clarence should direct the administration of the government during the minority of young Edward, Henry's son; that prince Edward should marry the lady Anne, second daughter of that nobleman; and that in case of failure of male issue in the prince, the crown should descend to the duke of Clarence, to the entire exclusion of king Edward and his posterity.

Edward, intoxicated with the love of pleasure, and too vain of his own power, neglected to take the necessary measures for breaking the force of the storm that was gathering round him. He received authentic intelligence of this extraordinary treaty from the duke of Burgundy, who had fitted out a large fleet to intercept Warwick in his passage; but he availed himself not of the discovery. He was even so confident of rendering the attempt abortive, that he declared, the duke might have saved himself the trouble of guarding the seas, as he wished for nothing more than to see Warwick landed in England. It was not long before that nobleman appeared. He landed at Dartmouth about the middle of September, and immediately declared for king Henry. The name of Warwick, so dear to the English, his immense credit, and the turbulent disposition of the English, drew to his standard, in a few days, an army of sixty thousand men.

So unexpected a defection of the English alarmed Edward. He saw his folly when it was too late to prevent the consequences. He was then with his army in the north, and employed in quelling an insurrection raised in Yorkshire by the lord Fitz Hugh, who had married one of the sisters of the earl of Warwick. But on receiving advice of the success of that popular nobleman, he immediately altered his route, and directed his march towards London with great expedition. Warwick, determined, if possible, to engage Edward before he reached the capital, advanced across the country, and came up with the royal army in the neighbourhood of Nottingham. The marquis of Montague, the brother of Warwick, had raised an army of six thousand men, and was following Edward, in order, as it was imagined, to reinforce the royal army. But the king had no sooner halted, on account of the approach of Warwick, than the marquis fell upon the rear of the royal army, during the night, with the utmost fury, and the air resounded with the cry of "God save king Henry!" The king, alarmed at the noise, started from his bed, and was soon convinced that it was the cry of war, generally used by the Lancastrian party. Lord Hastings hastened into his apartment, and informed him of his danger; urging him to make his escape from an army where he appeared to have so many concealed enemies, and so few zealously attached to his service. He had hardly time to get on horseback, before the enemy attacked his quarters. A few minutes would have determined the fate of Edward. He fled with the utmost precipitation, attended with a small retinue, to Lynn in Norfolk, where he fortunately found some Dutch ships ready for the sea, and sailed immediately. But his danger did not terminate with his embarkation. A fleet of ships belonging to the Easterlings, who were then at war both with France and England, were hovering on the Norfolk coast, and gave chase to the king's vessels; and it was with the utmost difficulty that they escaped into the port of Alcmæer, in Holland.

Warwick had now no enemy to oppose him. In no longer a space of time than eleven days from his landing, he was left entire master of the kingdom. He immediately directed his march towards London, delivered Henry VI. from the Tower, re-placed him on the throne, and proclaimed him king with the utmost solemnity. The most considerable partisans of the York family either sought protection beyond the seas, or took shelter in sanctuaries where the ecclesiastical privileges afforded them shelter from the insults of their enemies. It is computed, that in London alone, no less than two thousand persons saved themselves in this manner; and among the rest, Edward's queen, who went privately by water from the Tower to Westminster-abbey, in order to avoid the violence of the citizens, who now appeared as extravagantly zealous for Henry as ever they had been for Edward. The earl of Worcester, constable of England, fell into the hands of the Lancastrians, and was soon afterwards beheaded. He was the first nobleman in England who distinguished himself by his love for letters, and who laboured assiduously to propagate genuine learning among his unpolished countrymen.

A parliament was summoned to meet at Westminster; and as no exertions of liberty could be expected in this assembly, their proceedings were entirely directed by the ruling party. The treaty with Margaret was here fully ratified. Henry was acknowledged king; but as his incapacity for government was universally acknowledged, the regency was entrusted to Warwick and Clarence, till prince Edward reached the age of majority; and in default of that prince's issue, Clarence was declared successor to the crown. Edward was declared a traitor to his country, and an usurper of the throne. Even the paternal estate of the York family was declared to be forfeited. All his friends were attainted; particularly the duke of Gloucester, his younger brother. The attainders of the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Pembroke, Oxford, Richmond, and Ormond, were reversed; and all who had suffered for adhering to Henry were restored to their honours and estates.

Clarence and Warwick now assumed the government in Henry's name, and disposed of all posts, both civil and military. The judges, sheriffs, and coroners, were changed in every part of the kingdom. The archbishop of York, brother to the earl of Warwick, was appointed chancellor, and the duke of Clarence lord lieutenant of Ireland. At the same time, the paternal estate of the York family was settled upon him. The marquis of Montague was restored to his favourite post of warden of the east marches of Scotland, and a long truce was concluded with France.

Edward, when he landed at Alcmæer, was kindly received by De Bruges, governor of Holland, under the duke of Burgundy. But that prince was greatly perplexed with regard to the measures most proper for for him to pursue in this unexpected revolution. He was fearful of plunging himself into a war with England, by giving the unfortunate exile an asylum in his dominions; and he was already attacked by Lewis XI. who had made himself master of Amiens and St. Quintin. He therefore sent his secretary, Philip de Comines, to Calais to discover the intentions of Vaulere the governor, with regard to his future conduct. He found the governor, the garrison, and all the inhabitants of the town, dressed in Warwick's livery, which they had assumed on the first news of that nobleman's success, and was assured that the earl was sending over four thousand men to begin hostilities in the duke's dominions, who, as the protector of Edward, had been declared the enemy of England. Philip, though alarmed at this intimation, told the governor that his master's treaty, which was made with the kingdom as well as the king of England, was still in force: and that the duke of Burgundy conceived himself bound to observe the articles, the change of the king's name from Edward to Henry making no difference. These arguments would, however, have had little weight with the English government, had they not been supported by the merchants of London and Calais, who had then great influence on the affairs of the nation, and who were afraid of losing the principal part of their commerce with the duke of Burgundy. At their instances therefore the earl of Warwick put a stop to all hostilities, and it was agreed that the treaty should continue in force; and the duke, on his part, promised to give no assistance to Edward. But this covenant was very ill observed; for though he refused to supply him openly, he equipped four large vessels in the name of some private merchants, and caused fourteen ships to be secretly hired of the Easterlings. This small squadron, together with a considerable sum of money, he delivered to Edward, who immediately sailed for England, with his small retinue and a body of two thousand men. On his departure the duke issued a proclamation, forbidding all his subjects to give him any assistance on pain of death.

A. D. 1471. Edward reached the coast of Norfolk on the twelfth of May, and sent Sir Robert Chamberlain and Sir Gilbert Debenham on shore, to discover the sentiments of the people with regard to his interest; but they soon perceived that the great vigilance of the earl of Oxford had rendered it very unsafe for them to land in that country. It was, therefore, resolved to stand farther to the northward; but a storm arising in the night, they were obliged to continue at sea till the fourteenth, when they landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire. Edward was soon convinced that the policy of the earl of Warwick with regard to changing the magistrates was very detrimental to his interest, and that it would be necessary for him to have recourse to art and dissimulation to effect his purpose. He pretended, and even made an oath, that he came not to challenge the crown, but to recover his paternal estates, which had been unjustly taken from him by the parliament.

This political dissimulation produced the desired effect upon the minds of the people. Compassion supplied the place of affection; numbers, deceived by his humble pretensions, flocked to his standard, and the nobility were very willing to receive him as a fellow-subject, though not as a king. He marched directly for the capital of the county where he landed, and found the inhabitants universally disposed to assist him in recovering the estates he enjoyed from his ancestors, though not in the recovery of his crown. It was, therefore, thought necessary to give them every satisfaction in his power with regard to his pretensions; and he scrupled not to take a solemn oath in the cathedral, never to renew his claim to the crown; to govern the city in a kind and courteous manner; and to be a true and faithful subject to king Henry.

But Edward never intended to observe his oath any longer than it tended to promote his own interest.

His army was now considerably increased, and it was determined to march towards the capital where Edward had many powerful friends. Warwick had assembled an army in the neighbourhood of Leicester, and advanced to give his enemy battle; but Edward by following another road passed him unmolested, and presented himself before the gates of London. The city ladies became powerful advocates in behalf of the gallant Edward; while his creditors, knowing that they had no other chance for the recovery of their debts, than by re-placing him in the seat of power, joined their instances in his favour, and Edward entered the city in triumph, while Henry, destined to be the sport of fortune, was again committed to the Tower. He was now in a condition to oppose his enemies, and being informed that the earl of Warwick was marching to give him battle, he advanced to meet him, and the two armies came in sight of each other in the neighbourhood of Barnet. Margaret was every day expected with a considerable reinforcement of foreign troops, and all her friends held themselves in readiness to join her standard. But Warwick, who was determined either to gain the whole honour of the victory or perish in the attempt, waited not for Margaret's arrival. The night before the engagement, the duke of Clarence, who had secretly entered into engagements with his brother, deserted to the king, and carried with him twelve thousand men.

Warwick was now too far advanced to retreat, and rejected with disdain the terms of peace offered him by Edward and Clarence. He told them, "that he had rather be consistent with himself, than to follow the example of a perfidious duke; and that he was determined either to gain the victory or lose his life." This defection of Clarence greatly affected the spirits of Warwick's soldiers; and had the earl not been so near the enemy he would, in all probability, have declined a battle, and waited the arrival of Margaret; but he was now several days march from a place of safety; and to have attempted a retreat in the face of an army superior in numbers to his own, would have been certain ruin; nor would his intrepid soul, a stranger to fear, suffer him to turn his back upon the enemy.

Early in the morning of the fourteenth of April, both armies were drawn out in order of battle. Edward's van-guard was commanded by the duke of Gloucester; the main body by himself; and the rear by lord Hastings. The right wing of Warwick's army was commanded by the marquess of Montague and the earl of Oxford; the left by Warwick himself assisted by the duke of Exeter; and a strong body of archers posted in the center by the duke of Somerset.

Never was victory contended for with more obstinacy; nor ever were leaders more determined to conquer or perish. The battle began at four in the morning, and the troops of Warwick, though inferior to those of Edward in number, charged the enemy with such impetuosity, that the earl of Oxford's division broke the main body of Edward's army; but pursuing the fugitives with too sanguine an eagerness, left their main body defenceless. Edward saw the mistake, and attacked the weakened part of Warwick's division at the head of a body of reserve. Oxford soon saw his error, and wheeled about to recover his former station; but unfortunately his men, who wore stars for their badges, returning from the pursuit and passing near the duke of Exeter's division, the latter mistook their stars for suns, the badge which distinguished Edward's soldiers, and charged them so furiously, that they drove them off the field before the mistake was discovered. This gave the forces of Edward's routed wing an opportunity of rallying. The battle was now no longer equal; the late unfortunate accident had occasioned a suspicion of treachery. They, however, defended themselves with the utmost bravery, and, in all probability, would have put a final period to Edward's reign, could the unfortunate accident have been retrieved. But that was impossible. Warwick in vain exerted all his efforts to support his forces, now borne down by the weight of numbers. He perceived the battle was irretrievably lost, and disdaining life when victory was gone, he rushed into the middle of Edward's ranks, and fell covered with wounds. His brother, the marquis of Montague, followed his example, and perished by his side. Their deaths completed the route of their army; and as Edward had issued orders to give no quarter, a dreadful carnage ensued. About two thousand fell on the side of the conquerors, and three thousand on the side of the vanquished. The duke of Somerset and the earl of Oxford fled into Wales, and joined the earl of Pembroke, who was raising troops for Warwick's army.

The day after the fatal battle of Barnet, Margaret with her son the prince of Wales, landed at Weymouth in Dorsetshire, attended by the countess of Warwick, the prior of St. John of Jerusalem, the lord Wenlock, and several other persons of distinction, at the head of a considerable body of French troops. The queen had hardly time to repose herself after the fatigue of a very tempestuous passage, before she received the fatal intelligence of the defeat and death of Warwick, and the captivity of her husband. The soul of Margaret, hitherto a stranger to fear, could not support the shock. Her courage and magnanimity gave way to grief and despair. She retired to the abbey of Beaulieu in Hampshire, and registered herself, her son, and her followers, as persons claiming sanctuary in that religious retirement. But her spirits were soon raised from the abyss of terror into which the weight of her misfortunes had plunged them, by the appearance of the duke of Somerset, the earl of Devonshire, the viscount Beaumont, Sir Thomas Fulford, Sir John Fortescue, Sir Thomas Seymour, and many other persons of distinction, who, on the first news of her landing, set out at the head of their vassals and dependents to offer her all the assistance in their power, and to declare their resolution of spending their lives and fortunes in her defence.

This instance of affection encouraged Margaret to make one final attempt for the recovery of her throne. She left her sanctuary, and putting herself at the head of her foreign forces, began her march through the counties of Devon and Somerset, where her army was every day considerably increased by the continual acquisition of new partisans. On the twenty-ninth of April the queen reached Tewkesbury in Gloucestershire, where she proposed to halt and refresh her wearied troops after their long and fatiguing march; and then proceed to the borders of Wales in order to join the earl of Pembroke, who had raised a considerable body of archers. But the activity of Edward prevented this junction. He no sooner received advice of the queen's landing, than he set out at the head of his army to give the Lancastrians battle, before their whole strength was consolidated: and after a very painful and fatiguing march, encamped, on the third of May, within three miles of the enemy. Astonished at the approach of Edward's army, a council was immediately held in the queen's camp, where it was resolved to pass the Severn, in order to join Pembroke's forces; but the city of Gloucester refusing to open her gates, it was considered as impracticable to cross the river in their present situation without exposing their rear to inevitable ruin. It was therefore determined, to intrench the army in a part adjacent to the town of Tewkesbury, where the troops would be flanked on both sides with hollow ways, ditches, hedges, and broken ground, and the rear defended by the town and abbey; while a strong entrenchment was to be thrown up in the front of the army. Could this resolution have been completely executed, the queen's camp would have been impregnable; but the activity of Edward prevented them from effecting their design; he determined to attack them the next day, before their fortifications could be completed. The Lancastrians had, however, used such expedition, that Edward owed his success to stratagem.

He drew up his army in two lines, the first of which was commanded by his brother the duke of Gloucester, while he himself, assisted by the duke of Clarence and lord Hastings, led the other. The Lancastrian army was formed into three lines; the first was commanded by the duke of Somerset and his brother lord Beaufort; the second by the prince of Wales, assisted by lord Wenlock; and the third by the earl of Devonshire. The duke of Gloucester began the attack with the utmost fury; but Somerset's division, who guarded the front of the entrenchment, received them with such intrepidity, that they were repulsed with considerable slaughter; and had Somerset been as remarkable for prudence as he was for valour, Edward, in all probability, would have been obliged to abandon the attempt. But Gloucester, pursuant to the orders he had received from his brother, perceiving the intrenchments were not to be forced, pretended to retire in confusion. The stratagem succeeded; Somerset, whose disposition was naturally impetuous, led his division through the defiles of the intrenchment, leaving orders for the second and third lines to support him, and attacked the Yorkists in the open field with the utmost fury. A dreadful contest ensued, and continued without any perceptible advantage on either side, till a detachment of two hundred horse from Edward's army, attacked the Lancastrians in flank, and threw them into disorder. Somerset was now obliged to fall back through the defiles to his former station, which he should not have quitted; but was followed so closely by Gloucester's division, that the greater part of his troops were cut to pieces. Amazed at not being supported, the duke threw his eyes around the camp, and perceived lord Wenlock standing coolly at the head of his division. Somerset construed this into an act of treachery, and riding up to him with the utmost fury, clove the head of that nobleman with his battle-axe.

The duke of Gloucester had pursued his advantage with so much prudence, that his whole division was now within the intrenchments, and was soon followed by Edward, at the head of the second line. Confusion now reigned in every part of the queen's camp. The whole army betook themselves to a precipitate flight after a faint resistance, and Edward gained one of the most complete victories recorded in history; scarce a person of any note in the queen's army escaping either death or captivity. Among the slain were the earl of Devonshire, lord Beaufort, Sir John Delves, Sir Edward Hamden, Sir Edward Whittingham, and Sir John Luckner. The duke of Somerset, the grand prior of St. John, and about twenty gentlemen of rank and fortune, took sanctuary in the abbey-church. But Edward paid no regard to ecclesiastical privileges: he sent a detachment of his forces, who dragged them from their asylum, and put them immediately to death, according to the barbarous policy of that relentless monarch. Margaret of Anjou and her son had also taken sanctuary in another religious structure, and were dragged from thence by Edward's soldiers. The queen was sent to the Tower, where she continued four years in close confinement, when she was released by Lewis XI. who generously paid fifty thousand crowns for her ransom. She retired to France, where she passed the remainder of her days in privacy and retirement; after having astonished the world by a courage and resolution, which would have done more honour to her sex, had she also been endowed with its softness and other amiable qualities.

But a more melancholy fate attended the young prince her son. He was brought into the presence of Edward, who asked him, in an insulting manner, "How he dared to invade his dominions?" The noble youth, forgetting his present situation, replied, with with an unseasonable vivacity, "That he came to recover his father's crown, and to claim his just inheritance." Stung with this intrepid answer, the ungenerous Edward, insensible to pity, struck the young prince on the face with his gauntlet; and the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, and lord Hastings, considering the blow as a signal for farther violence, hurried the prince into the next apartment, where they dispatched him with their daggers.

Henry himself survived the battle of Tewkesbury only a few days. That unfortunate prince, whose innocence and melancholy imbecillity might have defended him from the attempts of violence, fell a victim to the misfortune of being born to a crown. He is said to have fallen by the unrelenting hand of the bloody duke of Gloucester. His body was exposed to public view, in order to persuade the people that his death was natural. But this precaution produced a very contrary effect, by recalling many similar instances in the English history, and suggesting a comparison not at all favourable to the government.

The earl of Pembroke, convinced that the fatal battle of Tewkesbury had put a final period to the hopes of the Lancastrian family, fled into Brittany, carrying with him his nephew, the young earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. The only partisan that now remained was the bastard of Fauconbridge, who took the advantage of Edward's absence to attempt the recovery of the capital. He had been honoured with a vice-admiral's commission by the earl of Warwick, and appointed to guard the channel; but having been stripped of his employment on the death of that nobleman, he withdrew with the ships under his command, and for some time subsisted by piracy. The landing of Margaret induced him to assist that princess in recovering the English sceptre; and being joined by three hundred men from the garrison of Calais, he landed with his forces at Sandwich, and was admitted into Canterbury by the magistrates. Vast numbers flocked to his standard; and he marched immediately for London, at the head of seventeen thousand men. He entered Southwark without opposition; and had not the news of Edward's victory at Tewkesbury arrived in the critical moment, he had been master of the capital. But the citizens, encouraged by the hopes of effectual assistance from their victorious monarch, shut their gates against the insurgents. They made, however, a desperate attempt to carry the bridge by storm; but being repulsed with great slaughter, they deserted their leader, who was soon after taken prisoner, and executed, according to the summary manner of those ferocious times.

Edward had now no competitor for the throne, nor any enemy to fear. A parliament was summoned, which, like the other assemblies of that kind during the civil wars, ratified all the acts of the victor, recognized his title, and again attainted the whole Lancastrian party. But prosperity was of more pernicious consequence to Edward than adversity. He had sufficient firmness to support all the evils of the latter, but he could not resist the allurements of the former. He devoted himself to amusements, and was far more attentive to fill his coffers than to remove the complaints and grievances of his subjects. His familiar manners, and pleasing address, rendered him, however, extremely popular, notwithstanding the cruelties he had exercised on his enemies. The melancholy ideas of destruction were absorbed in the gay scenes of pleasure and dissipation.

A. D. 1474. But the desire of foreign conquests, which had so nobly emblazoned the reigns of his predecessors, at length roused Edward from the couch of voluptuousness. A treaty of alliance was concluded with Charles duke of Burgundy; by which it was stipulated, that Edward should cross the seas with an army of above ten thousand men; and that Charles should join him with all his forces, in order to invade the territories of Lewis: that Edward should challenge the crown of France; and that the sword of war should not be sheathed till he had obtained the provinces of Guienne and Normandy: That Champagne, and several other territories, should be procured for the duke; and that all his dominions should be freed from the burden of homage to the crown of France. It was added, that neither party should make peace without the consent of the other. The English parliament, always ready to assist their sovereign in any attempt to humble France, granted him a large subsidy; and every precaution was taken to render the success of this expedition as brilliant as those that attended the attempts of his predecessors.

A. D. 1475. Edward, attended by the principal nobility of England, landed at Calais, at the head of thirty thousand archers, and prepared to carry his conquests into the very heart of France. But the sanguine hopes of the English were greatly lessened, when the duke of Burgundy joined them with only his common equipages. That prince, transported by the violence of his temper, had led his army to the frontiers of Germany, where they were employed against the duke of Lorraine, and other princes of the Empire. Edward was greatly disgusted at this breach of the treaty, and determined to take every advantage that offered for promoting his own interest. Lewis XI. a prince who disdained all military glory, and who, dreading the events of war, regulated all his proceedings by a policy, which the more certainly answered his purpose, as he was not over scrupulous in adhering to his engagements. Money was the great hinge on which his politics turned. He made very advantageous offers to Edward; and a treaty was concluded at Pecquigni, near Amiens, by which it was stipulated, "That Lewis should pay seventy-five thousand crowns, to indemnify Edward for the expences of the expedition; that he should also pay him annually the sum of fifty thousand crowns during their joint lives; that the dauphin of France should marry Elizabeth, Edward's daughter, and settle on her sixty thousand livres a year as her jointure; and that neither party should encourage civil wars in the other's dominions, but, on the contrary, assist in suppressing the insurrections of their subjects." At the same time, Lewis gained over the English ministers to his interest, by settling pensions on them to the amount of sixteen thousand crowns a year. Lord Hastings had two thousand; lord Howard, and others, had nearly the same proportion: nor were these great ministers ashamed to receive wages from a foreign prince. The two monarchs had afterwards an interview on the bridge of Pecquigni, where mutual professions of friendship passed between them; and the English had free access into the city of Amiens, where Lewis resided. But though the French king testified the utmost confidence in Edward, he, at the same time, artfully eluded the proposal of his making a journey to Paris. "Edward," said he privately to Comines, "is very handsome, and very amorous. Some lady at Paris may invite him to return in a less civil manner: it is better the sea should be between us." But notwithstanding the profound dissimulation of Lewis, he could not forbear throwing out some raileries on the easy simplicity of Edward, in allowing himself to be disarmed by money; but perceiving he was overheard by a Gascon who had settled in England, he was immediately sensible of his blunder. He sent a message to the gentleman, and engaged him to remain in France. "It is but just" said he, "that I pay the penalty of my talkativeness."

A. D. 1476. Edward being thus disengaged from foreign wars, applied himself to the administration of justice, and the pursuit of such measures as tended to fill his own coffers. The disbanning of the army lately returned from France, had filled the whole country with robbers; no person could travel without the utmost danger of losing his life or effects. Determined to remove this grievance, the king made a circuit, with his judges, through the kingdom, and exerted exerted himself with such vigour and impartiality in the distribution of justice, that he restored the public peace, and freed the roads from those gangs of banditti, by whom they were so lately infested. But Edward knew that these proceedings, however popular and necessary, would not be sufficient to procure him any subsidies from the parliament. The leading men of the nation were too highly offended by the miscarriage of the late expedition, from which they had formed such sanguine expectations, to think of granting any farther supplies. Recourse was therefore had by Edward to other methods for accumulating treasure. He engaged in commerce, which he carried on, with great advantage, as a private merchant. He sold the profits of vacant bishopricks. He demanded fines for the restitution of temporalities. He ransacked old records to find defective titles, and obliged the proprietors to pay large sums for their confirmation; and he imposed exorbitant taxes upon the clergy. These methods, assiduously pursued, brought very large sums into his treasury, and saved him the mortification of a refusal from his parliament.

A.D. 1477. The duke of Clarence, who had so greatly contributed to the restoration of Edward by his desertion from Warwick, could never regain the friendship of his brother; the levity and violence of his temper rendered him always suspected. Richard, duke of Gloucester, a close, reserved, and deliberate prince, was still a greater enemy to Clarence than the king. Gloucester had already formed the bloody design of seizing the crown on the death of Edward, whose health was daily declining by his excessive debauchery. He therefore became an enemy to Clarence from principle, because he stood before him in the order of succession. A combination between such potent adversaries could not fail of destroying Clarence; and it was determined to begin by attacking his friends, not doubting but his passion would betray him into measures which would give them sufficient advantage over him. The king hunting one day in the park of Burdet of Arrow, in Warwickshire, killed a white buck, which was a great favourite of its owner; and Burdet, transported with rage, wished the horns of the deer in the belly of the person who had advised Edward to commit that insult upon him. This pardonable expression of resentment was considered as a capital crime in a friend to the duke of Clarence, and he was publicly beheaded at Tyburn for this pretended offence. The next that fell a sacrifice to their resentment against Clarence, was John Stacy, an ecclesiastic; who being better acquainted with mathematics and astronomy than most men of that age, was considered by the vulgar as a magician, and his friendship with Clarence rendered him obnoxious to the court. He was tried for that imaginary crime, and put to death for his learning. The ignorance of the age furnished the government with pretences for exercising their passions and resentments.

These instances of cruelty and injustice, which Clarence could not help perceiving were pointed at him, excited in his breast a thorough detestation for the authors. But instead of endeavouring to render their malice abortive by silence and reserve, he loudly remonstrated against the iniquity of his persecutors, and defended, with unshaken firmness, the innocence of his friends.

A.D. 1478. His enemies had now obtained what they thought sufficient to convict him. He was arrested, and committed to the Tower. A parliament was also summoned. The king appeared personally as his brother's accuser, and pleaded the cause against him. The liberty of judgment was taken from the court by this strange method of proceeding; so that, though only some rash expressions were objected against him, he was condemned to suffer death. The Commons also meanly supported the injustice of the peers, by petitioning for his execution. It is astonishing that the parliament, which had long assumed the power of refusing the most necessary subsidies, should, in this instance, be so servilely submissive to the court. Can it be supposed, that the lives, even of the princes of the blood, were, in these times, less regarded than the public money? And yet this is the only method of accounting for their proceedings.

Edward, who had taken so much pains to convict his brother, did not suffer him to languish long in prison. The only favour he granted him, after his condemnation, was to leave him the choice of his own death, and he desired that he might be drowned in a butt of malmsey; a circumstance which shews, that he was extremely fond of that liquor, or that he was governed by caprice in every circumstance of his conduct. His behaviour to his last moments was expressive of his character. He left two children by the eldest daughter of the earl of Warwick; a son, created an earl by his grandfather's title; and a daughter, afterwards countess of Salisbury.

A.D. 1481. Edward now devoted his time to pleasure and amusement. He flumbered on the couch of indolence, and all the glories of his reign were absorbed in the whirlpool of effeminacy. Lewis saw his supine conduct with a secret pleasure; and being desirous of marrying the dauphin to the daughter of Maximilian of Austria, an infant only two years of age, the treaty was now concluded, though he had promised, by the treaty of Pecquigni, that the dauphin should marry the princess Elizabeth. Astonished and incensed at this unpardonable affront, Edward awoke from his lethargy, and vowed to take ample vengeance on Lewis for his perfidy. But that politic monarch, whose prudence was equal to his falsehood, foresaw the gathering storm, and had taken measures to break its force. He sent ambassadors to James III. of Scotland, offering him great advantages if he would break his truce with Edward, and carry his arms into the northern parts of England. James, who was a very weak prince, and lived on bad terms with his own nobility, imprudently listened to the artful suggestions of Lewis, and levied an army to execute a design to which he was far from being equal; but when his forces arrived on the borders of England, the barons conspiring against his favourites, put them to death with the form of a trial; and his whole army immediately dispersed. Soon after, the duke of Gloucester entered Scotland at the head of the English forces, made himself master of Berwick, and forced James to accept of a peace, by which that important fortress was ceded to the English.

A.D. 1483. The war in Scotland being thus happily terminated, Edward devoted his whole attention to the war he meditated against France; but while he was employed in making the necessary preparations, he was seized with a mortal distemper, which put an end to his life on the ninth of April, in the forty-second year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign.

The history of this prince sufficiently displays his genuine character. In his youth he was active and intrepid, but cruel and vindictive. He was more remarkable for his vigour than for either prudence or virtue. The latter part of his reign was wholly spent in indolence and pleasure; but the death of his brother sufficiently indicates, that his passion for cruelty continued amidst all the scenes of voluptuousness; and he left a throne polluted with blood to his successor.

Edward prince of Wales, and Richard duke of York, were the only sons that survived their father. The former was twelve, and the latter six years of age, when he paid the debt of nature. Four daughters survived him.

1. Elizabeth, promised in marriage to the dauphin of France, but afterwards married to Henry VII.
2. Cicely, betrothed to the prince of Scotland, but afterwards married to the lord Welles.
3. Anne of York, married to Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk, earl marshal and lord treasurer of England.
4. Catherine of York, married to William Courtney, earl of Devonshire.

E D W A R D V.

A.D. 1483. THE young prince, who had, for some time, resided at Ludlow-castle, in Shropshire, under the care of his uncle, the earl of Rivers, was proclaimed the very day of his father's death, in the streets of London, by the name of Edward V. But unhappily for him, two irreconcilable parties divided the court; that of the queen and her relations, particularly the earl of Rivers, her brother, the most accomplished nobleman in England; and the marquis of Dorset, her son by a former husband; and that of the ancient nobility, who envied the sudden exaltation and unlimited credit of the Wideville family. At the head of this party were the duke of Buckingham, lord Hastings the chamberlain, and the lords Howard and Stanley. The late king saw with regret the dreadful consequences that might result from these alarming divisions, during the minority of his son, and endeavoured to reconcile the contending parties. He sent for them as he lay on his death-bed, conjured them to lay aside their animosities, and labour to promote peace and unanimity in the kingdom during the tender years of his son; and prevailed upon them to embrace each other with all the marks of a cordial reconciliation. But his labours were in vain. His eyes were no sooner closed by death, than all their former animosities revived; they followed their separate interests, and each endeavoured to gain the duke of Gloucester, who had been appointed by his brother regent of the kingdom, over to their party. Gloucester, who was at once both cruel and ambitious, and capable of the most inhuman crimes, concealed his dark purposes under the mask of profound dissimulation and policy. He affected the greatest zeal for the service of the queen, that he might acquire a full influence over her conduct. The earl of Rivers had been intrusted by the deceased monarch with the care and education of his son; and the queen was now desirous that he should levy a body of troops, to conduct his young sovereign to London, in order to his being crowned with the usual solemnities. Gloucester persuaded the queen, that an armed force on this occasion might be dangerous, and was not at all necessary. An order was therefore sent to Rivers to bring the young king to London, with no greater retinue than was necessary to support his state and dignity.

The earl, who never suspected the treachery of Gloucester, readily obeyed. He was met at Northampton by that prince and the duke of Buckingham; and after passing a friendly evening with them, he was arrested the next day by Gloucester's orders, and, together with Sir Richard Gray, one of the queen's sons, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, who possessed a considerable post in the king's household, sent prisoners to Pontefract castle. In vain did the young monarch, with all the eloquence of tears and intreaties, intercede with his inhuman uncle for the release of persons so dear to him. Gloucester refused his request, and conducted Edward to London, where he was received, by the loudest acclamations, of the people.

The account of these tyrannical proceedings no sooner reached the ears of the queen, than she conceived the whole design of the duke of Gloucester; and considering her brother and two sons as irretrievably lost, she fled to the sanctuary of Westminster, with the duke of York, the marquis of Dorset, and the rest of her family; resolving there to await the returns of better fortune. Lord Hastings was then at London; and though he hated the queen and her relations, had still a sincere affection for his late master, and was unalterably devoted to the king and his brother. He was well acquainted with the design of seizing Rivers, and pleased that the scheme had taken effect; but he was confident that nothing more was intended than to suppress the queen's party. He entertained not the least suspicion of Gloucester's real design. Accordingly he wrote to Rotheram, archbishop of York, and then lord chancellor of England, desiring him not to be alarmed at what had happened, as every thing would tend to promote the peace and happiness of the kingdom.

On Gloucester's arrival, a council was summoned, to settle the administration, and he was declared protector of the realm, without waiting for the meeting of the parliament. The queen was the only person who yet suspected the duke's intentions. He had carefully concealed his sentiments from his intimate friends, under the artful veil of dissimulation; but he well knew, that unless he could find means to get the duke of York into his power, all his schemes must prove abortive. He therefore complained to the council, that the queen's ill-grounded apprehensions were an indignity to the government; and represented the necessity of the young prince's appearance at the coronation of his brother; proposing, that if the queen refused to listen to the voice of reason, he should be taken from the asylum by force. At the same time, he affirmed, that sanctuaries were intended only for the protection of malefactors; and were therefore utterly useless to a person who, by reason of his tender age, could lie under the burden of no crime, and who, for the same reason, was absolutely incapable of claiming security from any sacred retreat. Cardinal Bouchier, the primate, and Rotheram, archbishop of York, strenuously opposed the protector's reasons, and declared that sanctuaries were inviolable; but as they penetrated not the duke's design, they offered to use every argument in their power to induce the queen to comply with the wishes of the council. Both these prelates were persons of great integrity and honour: and the queen perceiving, that if she refused to comply, the young prince would be taken by force, she produced her son; and after bedewing him with her tears, and bidding him an eternal adieu, she delivered him to the cardinal, who carried him immediately to his uncle.

The treacherous and ambitious Gloucester seemed to be for ever excluded from the throne by unsurmountable obstacles. The numerous issue of Edward, and the two children of Clarence, had preferable titles to him. But no restraints were sufficient to withhold his violence; his fierce and savage nature was startled at no crimes; every thing gave way to his ambition. The death of the earl of Rivers, and the other prisoners confined in Pontefract castle, was first determined; and the protector found no difficulty in obtaining the consent of his party to that sanguinary measure; but fearing that a trial might fill the people with apprehensions, especially as the crimes that could be alledged against them were far from being capital, it was resolved to dispatch them without any legal process; and orders were immediately dispatched to Sir Ralph Ratcliffe, a man capable of the most enormous actions, to behead his noble prisoners.

The very day these bloody orders were executed, the protector summoned a council to meet in the Tower; and having already discovered, by his agents, that Hastings was unalterably attached to the children of his deceased master, he determined to ruin a man whose power and popularity were sufficient to render all his designs abortive. Hastings, not the least suspecting any design was formed against his life, repaired to the council, where he met the protector, whose behaviour was remarkably affable. After a short stay, Richard retired from the board, desiring the lords to continue their deliberations during his absence. He soon returned with an angry and enflamed countenance, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the marks of the most violent indignation. "My lords," said he, "what punishment do those deserve who have plotted against my life?" Hastings replied, that they deserved the punishment of traitors. "These traitors," replied the protector, "are the forerunners my brother's wife, and Jane Shore his mistress, with others their associates. See to what a condition they have reduced me by their incantations and witchcraft!" On uttering these words, he uncovered his arm, which was shrivelled and decayed. The members of the council, who well knew that his arm had always been in that condition, were confounded, and looked upon one another with astonishment. After a considerable pause, Hastings answered, "Certainly, my lord, if they are guilty of these crimes, they deserve the severest punishment." "And do you reply to me," said the protector, "with your ifs and your ands? You are the chief abettor of that witch Shore: you are yourself a traitor; and I swear by St. Paul, that I will not dine before your head be brought me!" He struck the table violently with his hand; a number of armed men rushed into the council-chamber, and seized the members. Hastings was led immediately to the green before the chapel of the Tower, where, after confession to a priest, who happened accidentally to be on the spot, he was beheaded on a timber log lying on the green. The archbishop of York, the bishop of Ely, and lord Stanley, who assisted at the council, were sent to different apartments in the Tower, and no person suffered to visit them.

Two hours after, the protector, apprehensive that the inhabitants of London, by whom Hastings was greatly beloved, would raise a tumult in the city, caused a proclamation, well penned, and fairly written, to be read to the populace, enumerating the crimes of Hastings, and apologizing for the precipitate manner of the execution, from the suddenness of the discovery. But the conduct of Richard could not deceive the people. It was observed, that the proclamation had certainly been drawn by the spirit of prophecy. Gloucester was, however, yet desirous of observing some consistence in his proceedings; and he therefore ordered Jane Shore to be apprehended, and tried before the council for sorcery and witchcraft. No proofs were, however, found against her, notwithstanding the ignorance and absurdity of the age, and she was acquitted of the charge. But the protector was determined she should not escape his vengeance. He caused her to be indicted before the spiritual court for lewdness and adultery; and she did penance, in a white sheet, at St. Paul's, before all the people. She, however, survived her misfortunes; and was alive in the reign of Henry VIII. when Sir Thomas Moore knew her. But though she had greatly recommended herself by acts of beneficence and humanity; though she had removed the stings of poverty from the breasts of the indigent, and applied the balm of comfort to the wounds of affliction, she found no friends in adversity, and spent the evening of her life in misery and want.

The death of the prisoners at Pontefract, and that of Hastings, exciting no insurrection among the people, Gloucester became more confident: he threw off the mask of dissimulation, openly aspired to the crown, and perpetrated other acts of injustice and violence. He propagated doubts with regard to the validity of Edward's marriage with the lady Elizabeth Wideville; pretending that he had, previous to that transaction, been privately married to the lady Eleanor Talbot, daughter to the earl of Shrewsbury. But this not gaining belief, he had recourse to a still more detestable calumny. He gave out, that both Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence, were illegitimate; that the dukes of York had received into her bed different lovers, who were the fathers of these children, and that Gloucester alone was the lawful offspring of the duke of York. Human nature must be sunk to the lowest degree of brutality, when it scruples not to throw such horrid calumnies on persons whom even instinct teaches to reverence. The dukes of York, his own mother, on whom so base an aspersion was thrown, was still alive, and a princess of irreproachable virtue. But no considerations could change the purpose of Gloucester. He caused these impudent assertions to be promulgated from the pulpit. Dr. Shaw, an eminent orator of those times, was appointed preacher in St. Paul's; and having chosen for his text the following passage from the Wisdom of Solomon, "Bastard slips shall not thrive," he enlarged upon all the arguments that had any tendency to throw an odium on the births of Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence. He afterwards extolled the virtues of the protector to the skies, representing him as the legal heir of the crown, and the only hope of the nation; concluding his panegyric, by crying aloud, "God save king Richard." The audience kept a profound silence, which greatly disconcerted both the protector and the preacher. Shaw lost all his popularity from this shameful prostitution of his talent, and Richard himself was beheld with contempt.

But Gloucester was not to be diverted from his purpose by one miscarriage. He had, indeed, proceeded too far, to think of receding. It was necessary for him to persevere: he must either gain the sceptre or perish. It was therefore agreed in the council, which now consisted wholly of Richard's creatures, that another attempt should be made to obtain the voice of the people in his favour. Accordingly the lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of London, were assembled at Guildhall; where the duke of Buckingham, in a studied harangue, expatiated on the virtues of the duke of Gloucester, and concluded with asking, Whether they would have that prince for their king? A profound silence reigned through the whole assembly. The duke repeated the substance of his harangue, and asked the same question; but the same silence was continued. The mayor desired the recorder might address the assembly, he being always considered as the mouth of the city. The experiment was accordingly tried, but with no better success; not a word escaped from the lips of the audience. "This is astonishing obstinacy," cried the duke; "declare your sentiments one way or other. But you ought to remember, that your consent is not considered as necessary. The lords and commons have sufficient authority to place whom they please on the throne; and when we ask your consent, it should be considered as a favour. However, I now demand, in plain terms, whether you will, or will not, have the protector for your sovereign?" This speech, which was considered rather as a menace than an appeal to their judgment, occasioned a general murmur through the whole audience. At length some of the meanest apprentices, incited by bribes from the government, set up a feeble cry of "Long live king Richard." This was considered as a sufficient declaration of the sentiments of the nation; the voice of the people was the voice of God; and Buckingham hastened to acquaint the protector, that he was called upon to assume the reins of government. Richard pretended to be astonished at the proposal. He declared he would observe inviolably his loyalty to his present sovereign, and exhorted them to imitate his example. He, however, suffered himself to be persuaded to accept the crown; and from that moment he acted as the legitimate and legal possessor of the English throne.

*Tyrrel and his Accomplices Smothering Edward 5th

These proceedings sufficiently indicated the fate of the two young princes. Their death was determined; and a commission sent to Sir Robert Brakenbury, constable of the Tower, to put a period to the lives of those innocent children. But that gentleman possessed too much virtue to be concerned in an office so shocking to humanity. Sir Walter Tyrrel, a man practised in the scenes of blood, was next applied to, and he accepted the inhuman commission. Tyrrel chose three associates, Slater, Dighton, and Forest; and having, by Richard's express order, obtained the keys of the Tower, he led his companions in iniquity to the door of the chamber where the two princes lodged, bidding them execute their orders. They found the unsuspecting innocents in a sound sleep, and after suffocating them with the bolster and pillows, they buried their bodies deep in the earth, at the stair-foot, under a heap of rubbish. These particulars were afterwards confessed by the perpetrators, in the following reign; though they were never punished for a crime that shocks human nature.

R I C H A R D III.

A. D. 1483. THE whole annals of history does not afford an instance of a more flagrant usurpation than that of Richard, nor of one more repugnant to every principle of justice and public interest. But no person of distinction stood forth in defence of injured innocence, so that the tyrant was suffered to wear a crown he had polluted with the blood of his own relations. He was, indeed, desirous of gaining over the nobility to his interest; but his actions had been too notorious and execrable to prevail on the more virtuous part of that powerful order. Buckingham, to whom he chiefly owed his crown, was loaded with preferments. But he either presumed too far upon his favour, or Richard thought it dangerous to augment his authority any farther, for he denied a request made by that powerful nobleman. Buckingham, haughty, violent and avaricious, was so highly offended, that he left the court and retired to his castle of Brecknock, where the bishop of Ely, who had been seized with lord Hastings, was then confined. This prelate, who was an able politician, and a zealous friend to the house of Lancaster, considered this disgust as a favourable incident to bring the duke over to his own party, especially as the duke's family had been zealous Lancastrians. He was not mistaken. Buckingham listened with great attention to the arguments of the prelate, and a scheme was formed for driving the tyrant from the seat of power, and placing on the throne the young earl of Richmond, who was to marry the princess Elizabeth, now the lawful successor of Edward IV. This alliance they thought could not fail of engaging the two families of York and Lancaster in their interest; and consequently extinguish the flames of civil discord which had so long spread desolation over the kingdom. It has been already observed, that the earl of Pembroke, soon after the battle of Tewkesbury, had fled to the court of Brittany, carrying with him his nephew, young Henry, earl of Richmond. That prince was now considered as the head of the Lancastrian party. He was heir, by the female line, to the house of Somerset, and grandson to Sir Owen Tudor, who had married Catharine of France, the widow of Henry V.

This project being formed, application was made to the queen dowager, who willingly gave her consent, hoping soon to be in a capacity of retaliating on the head of the usurper all the injuries he had inflicted on her family. The young earl of Richmond also engaged to celebrate his marriage with Elizabeth as soon as he arrived in England. Thus far every thing succeeded according to their wishes; but though the utmost care was taken to keep those designs an impenetrable secret, yet they escaped not the vigilance of Richard, and he hastened to put the kingdom in a posture of defence. He collected his troops, and began his march towards the western counties, where he was informed the earl of Richmond proposed to land, and where several of his friends were already in arms, expecting to be joined by the duke of Buckingham, at the head of his forces.

That nobleman had collected a powerful army, and was now advancing, by long and hasty marches, into the forest of Deane, in order to cross the Severn, and join his western friends at Salisbury. But on approaching the borders of that river, he found that the waters had overflowed their banks in a manner before unknown. The Welsh, alarmed with superstitious terrors at this extraordinary event, and, at the same time, distressed for want of provisions, abandoned his camp, and Buckingham in a few days was left only with one servant, who was faithful enough to attend his master in distress. He had now no other resource than that of concealing himself till the arrival of the earl of Richmond, or some other accident occasioned a revolution in the government. He accordingly disguised himself in the habit of a peasant, and took shelter in the house of an old servant of his family. But being discovered in his retreat, he was carried to Shrewsbury, and instantly beheaded without any form of trial.

The earl of Richmond had not been wanting on his part to join his friends on the day appointed. He embarked with five thousand men at St. Maloes, on board forty vessels, but being overtaken with a terrible storm, his fleet was separated, and he was obliged to return to the court of Brittany, where he learned the unwelcome news of the death of Buckingham, and the dispersion of his friends. Nothing but the abhorrence in which Richard was held by the greater part of the English, could have animated the earl and his friends to persevere in their design, and make another attempt to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the tyrant.

A. D. 1484. Richard flattered himself that he had crushed the rebellion in its bud, and therefore ventured to call a parliament, who had now no other choice than that of recognizing the usurper's authority, and acknowledge his title to the crown. His only son Edward, then twelve years of age, was created prince of Wales; the duties of tonnage and poundage were granted him for life; and Richard, in order, if possible, to reconcile the people to his government, passed several acts, which greatly tended to promote the happiness of the subject.

But the intended marriage between the earl of Richmond and the princess Elizabeth, filled the breast of Richard with uneasiness. He saw the danger of such a connection, and determined, if possible, to prevent it. In order to this, he paid his court to the queen dowager with such art and address, made so many professions of a sincere and unalterable friendship, that Elizabeth, tired with confinement, and thinking her former projects totally destroyed, listened to proposals of the murderer of her children, and even promised him her daughter in marriage; Richard having made way for this strange connection by carrying off his former wife by poison. The queen's consent being obtained, Richard applied to the court of Rome for a dispensation, for concluding an alliance, generally considered as incestuous. But before this papal instrument arrived, the face of affairs was suddenly changed, and Richard hurled from the feat of power.

A.D. 1485. The earl of Richmond, surrounded with many noble exiles from England, having received some troops from Charles VIII. who now filled the throne of France, sailed from Harfleur on the first of August, with a retinue of two thousand persons; and after a passage of six days, arrived at Milford-haven, in Wales, where he landed without opposition. The next day he continued his march to Haverfordwest, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants. As he advanced, he was continually joined by the partisans of both families, so that his camp soon wore a respectable aspect.

Richard, on the first intelligence that Henry, earl of Richmond, was preparing for another invasion, took post at Nottingham, as one of the most central towns of his kingdom, and proposed to march on the first alarm to the place which was most exposed to danger. But he should have remembered that he had much more to fear from his secret, than from his open enemies. The duke of Norfolk was the only nobleman sincerely attached to his interest; the rest were friends to the earl of Richmond, and only waited for a favourable opportunity to desert his standard. But the persons that gave Richard the greatest uneasiness, were lord Stanley, and his brother Sir William, whose connections with the earl of Richmond were strongly suspected by the usurper. He had, indeed, employed the former to levy a body of five thousand men, but insisted that he should leave his son, the lord Strange, as a hostage for his fidelity. This obliged lord Stanley to use the greatest precautions in his proceedings. He found means indeed of informing Henry of his friendly intentions; but his equivocal behaviour rendered his designs suspicious to both armies.

The continual increase of Henry's army alarmed Richard, and he determined to give him battle as soon as possible, and decide, by a general action, their dispute for the crown of England. Henry declined not the engagement, and the two armies came in sight of each other at Bosworth, a place in Leicestershire, rendered famous in history for the battle which terminated the quarrel between the houses of York and Lancaster. The royal army, which consisted of twelve thousand men, all veterans and well armed, were formed into two lines. The first was commanded by the duke of Norfolk; and the second by Richard in person, who appeared that day with the royal diadem on his head. The earl's army did not consist of more than five thousand men, but was also divided into two lines; the first commanded by the earl of Oxford, and the second by himself in person: Sir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left. While the two armies were preparing for battle, lord Stanley posted himself, at the head of four thousand men, on a piece of ground fronting the interval between the two armies, while his brother Sir William Stanley, with three thousand, stood facing him on the other side of the interval. Richard, suspecting Stanley's design, sent him an order to join his army; but receiving an equivocal answer, he was so enraged at his treachery, that he would have struck off the head of his son, had he not been dissuaded from that resolution by some of his chief officers, who represented to him, that such an act could be attended with no advantage, and would certainly provoke Stanley and his brother to join the enemy, though perhaps their intention at present might be to remain neuter, till near the conclusion of the battle, and then declare for the party that seemed to have gained the advantage. Richard submitted to these reasons, well knowing that a victory over the earl of Richmond would enable him to take ample revenge on all his enemies.

Both armies now moved forward, and the battle was begun by a general discharge of arrows; after which the combat became close and bloody. The duke of Norfolk made a motion to enclose the left wing of Richmond's army, which being perceived, by the earl of Oxford, he fell with the utmost fury upon Norfolk's division, but was in the utmost danger of being surrounded. Lord Stanley saw that it would be impossible for him to extricate himself from his present situation without assistance, and therefore advanced at the head of his forces, and joining Oxford's line secured his flank, and stood ready to receive the front of the line commanded by the king in person. At the same time Sir William Stanley fell upon the flank of Richard's line, and drove them back upon the main body. Norfolk, however, advanced to the charge with more fury than ever, and a dreadful carnage ensued. But the battle was no longer equal; the royal forces were intimidated by the desertion of Stanley and his brother; while it inspired Henry's with unusual courage. Sensible of his desperate situation, the furious tyrant threw his eyes around the field, and discovering his rival at no great distance, he soon opened himself a passage to the spot where Henry fought in person, killed Sir Henry Brandon, his standard-bearer, unhorsed Sir John Cheyney, and advanced against Henry with all the fury of despair. He called aloud to him to pay the forfeit of his treason, and rebellious invasion of his kingdom. Henry declined not the combat; but the two leaders were hardly engaged when Sir William Stanley, breaking in with his troops, surrounded Richard, who, after performing the most astonishing acts of valour, fell covered with wounds. The loss of the king put an end to the contest; the royalists, deprived of their leader, fought their safety in a precipitate flight.

The loss of the vanquished amounted to four thousand men, among whom were the duke of Norfolk, the lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir Robert Piercy, Sir Robert Brakenbury, Sir William Conyers, and Sir Richard Clendon. The earl of Richmond's loss did not exceed an hundred men: The body of Richard being found in a heap of slain; was thrown carelessly across a horse, and in that ignominious manner it was conveyed to Leicester, amid the shouts of the insulting populace, and buried without any ceremony, in the church of the Grey Friars.

Henry, by a policy that tended greatly to augment his power, pardoned all who submitted to him. Sir William Catesby, the tool of Richard's crimes, was the only person that suffered. He was discovered after the battle, and conveyed to Leicester, where he was beheaded. Lord Lovel, and the two Staffords, who had incurred the universal odium of the people for their attachment to the tyrant, would, in all probability, have suffered the same fate, had they fallen into the hands of the victor; but they fortunately made their escape.

Richard was the last of the Plantagenet family that possessed the crown of England; but not the last male heir; for the earl of Warwick, son to the duke of Clarence, was still alive, and the only branch of the numerous posterity of Edward the third, the rest having perished in the civil wars, which, after raging thirty years, was finally terminated by the battle of Bosworth. It would be superfluous to add any thing farther with regard to the character of Richard, the history of his reign being abundantly sufficient to display it; for whatever abilities he might possess as a general, a warrior, or a legislator, they were rendered detestable by his vices.

H E N R Y VII.

A. D. 1485. THE victory obtained by Henry at Bosworth put a final period to the dreadful wars between the two roses, which had so long manured the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants. The power of the house of York was now no more. This was so well known that the common soldiers were prompted, even in the field of battle, to bestow the title of king upon their general. Every quarter resounded with the acclamations of "Long live king Henry." Stanley, desirous of giving some appearance of formality to this popular election, brought the crown which had been taken from Richard, and placed it on the head of the victor:

This general voice of the army was considered as a circumstance of great importance in favour of Henry, whose title to the crown was by its means unexceptionable. The root of his family was John of Ghent, earl of Lancaster, fourth son to Edward III. That prince was thrice married; first, to Blanche of Lancaster, by whom he had two daughters; Philippa, married to John, king of Portugal; and Elizabeth, espoused to John Holland, duke of Exeter; and a son, who afterwards ascended the throne by the name of Henry IV. and whose male descendants became extinct in the person of Henry VI. secondly, to Constance, princess of Castile and Leon, who bore him one daughter, married to the king of Castile; and thirdly, to Catherine, widow of Sir Otter Swinford. This lady had for some years before her marriage, lived with John of Ghent as his mistress, and, during that interval, bore him four children, John Beaufort, duke of Somerset; Henry Beaufort, cardinal of Winchester; Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter; and Joan Beaufort, countess of Westmorland. These children were indeed afterwards legitimated by the parliament; but the same act which freed them from the opprobrious name of bastards, excluded them from the crown. John Beaufort, the eldest, left a son called by his own name, and enjoyed his title of duke of Somerset. The latter had only one daughter, named Margaret, who married Edmund Tudor, duke of Richmond, whose eldest son was Henry VII.

From this genealogical deduction it is sufficiently evident that Henry's slender title to the crown was subject to two material objections; the acknowledged priority of right in the house of York, and the illegitimacy of all John's children by his third marriage. Add to this, that Henry's mother, from whom he derived his right, was still alive, and evidently preceded him in the order of succession. Henry's projected marriage with the princess Elizabeth was therefore the only proper method by which he could overcome the difficulties attending his claim; as by that means the rights of both houses would be united. But as Henry was not inclined to be indebted to a woman for his crown, nor disposed to part with it to the next succession, should she die without issue, he resolved to take upon him the dignity of king by virtue of his popular election, joined with his being the head of the house of Lancaster, and to act as such before any formal coronation. At the same time his jealousy of the house of York, a weakness he constantly entertained, induced him to commit to the Tower, the earl of Warwick, an innocent prince then only ten years of years.

Henry entered London on the twenty-second of August, and was received with all those demonstrations of joy, which the hopes of being delivered from the miseries of civil wars could inspire. He repaired directly to St. Paul's, where he offered the standards he had taken in the late battle, and Te Deum was sung for his victory. He soon after assembled the chief of the nobility; and solemnly swore to marry the princess Elizabeth; a measure the more necessary as the people began to be alarmed at a report industriously propagated, that he had already engaged in a contract of marriage with Anne, daughter and heiress of Francis, duke of Brittany.

While the necessary preparations were making for the coronation of Henry, an epidemical distemper broke out in London. This dreadful disease, which swept away many thousands of the inhabitants, was, from the symptoms attending it, termed the sweating sickness, and is thought to have been the first time it ever appeared in the world. The confusion it occasioned delayed the ceremony, and Henry employed the interval in rewarding the services of his faithful friends and adherents. John de Vere, earl of Oxford, was made constable of the Tower; Jasper, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the king, and the tutor and guardian of his tender years, was created duke of Bedford; the lord Stanley, earl of Derby; and Sir Edward Courtney, earl of Devonshire.

As soon as the late alarming distemper was entirely ceased, Henry was crowned with great pomp and solemnity on the thirtieth of October, by cardinal Bouchier, archbishop of Canterbury. To augment the splendor of this ceremony, Henry instituted a body guard, consisting of fifty archers, called yeomen, under the command of a captain, to be always in attendance on his person: a precaution, which, in all probability, Henry considered as indispensably necessary to his own safety, though he prudently concealed his real sentiments, under the pretence of augmenting the grandeur of the English court.

On the seventh of November the parliament met at Westminster, and entailed the crown upon Henry, not by recognition or ordinance, but by settlement. It was enacted, "That the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in him and the heirs of his body;" and as he was under a sentence of attainder or outlawry, they extricated themselves from that difficulty by establishing it as a maxim, "That the crown takes away all attainders and corruptions of blood." Henry was, however, still so dissatisfied with his title, that he applied to Rome for a confirmation of it, as if the authority of that court extended to matters of this kind. Innocent VIII. who then filled the papal chair, made no difficulty of granting his request; he even denounced the sentence of excommunication against all those who should dare to disturb him or his successors in the possession of the crown.

The act of settlement being finished, a bill for reversing the attainders of one hundred and seven persons, who had suffered for their adherence to the house of Lancaster, was passed without any opposition. It was certainly laudable in Henry to procure the restoration of his friends to their honours and estates; but the revenge which he exercised against the retainers of the York family cannot surely be considered in that light. Yet, at his instigation, the parliament passed a bill of attainder against the late king himself, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surry, the viscount Lovel, the lords Zouche and Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Walter and Sir James Harrington, Sir William Berkeley, Sir Humphry Stafford, and about twenty other gentlemen, who had fought on Richard's side in the battle of Bosworth. The parliament must have been totally deaf to the voice of reason and justice, to declare persons guilty of treason who had done nothing more than supported a monarch in actual possession of the crown against the earl of Richmond, who had not then even pretended to claim the title. It is therefore no wonder that this measure, which was equally mean and imprudent, drew upon Henry the hatred of the English, who were greatly attached to the blood of their ancient kings.

Though Henry requested no supplies from the parliament, that assembly thought proper to settle on him for life the duty of tonnage and poundage, which had been enjoyed in the same manner by some of his immediate predecessors. But when they presented the bill for the royal assent, they petitioned his majesty to espouse the princess Elizabeth: they indeed thought proper to cover their real reason under the dutiful pretence of their having heirs of his body. The king promised to comply with their desires; and after having restored Edward Stafford, eldest son to the duke of Buckingham, who had forfeited in the late reign, to all the honours and estates of his family, he dissolved the parliament.

Though many of the partisans of the house of York had been attainted by the late statute, Henry thought proper to publish a proclamation, offering a general pardon to all that had carried arms against him, provided they submitted within a limited time. The offer was gladly embraced by many of that party, who immediately left their sanctuaries, and submitted to Henry's government. This act of clemency tended greatly to quiet the minds of the people, and introduce peace and harmony among all ranks and orders of men.

A. D. 1486. Henry did not long delay fulfilling the promise he had made to the parliament. He married the princess Elizabeth on the eighteenth of January. A prodigious concourse of people were assembled on this occasion, and exhibited a greater appearance of sincere joy than either at his first entry or coronation. Henry remarked this general favour shewn to the house of York with displeasure. It revived in his sullen mind the animosity he had so long entertained against that party, and destroyed all his domestic peace. Even the princess herself, tho' of a disposition truly amiable, and truly virtuous, felt the effect of the prejudices he had conceived against her family.

But though he entertained no cordial affection for the immediate descendants of the house of York, he was very desirous of conciliating the affections of the people to his government. He knew that the northern counties were particularly attached to that family, and therefore determined to make a progress into those parts, in order to remove their prejudices by his presence and conversation. But he had hardly reached Lincoln, before he was informed that lord Lovel, and his two brothers, the Staffords, had left their sanctuary of Colchester-abbey, and were once more in arms against the government; that the latter were marching to besiege the city of Worcester; and the former, at the head of three or four thousand men, was advancing to attack him in York. This intelligence did not intimidate Henry: he assembled a small body of troops, in whom he could confide, and sent them against the insurgents, under the command of the duke of Bedford. But that able general well knew that his little army were formidable only for their zealous attachment to their maker, and published a general pardon to all who should lay down their arms. This prudent measure produced the desired effect. Lovel, who was never celebrated for his courage and intrepidity, was so terrified with the fears of desertion among his troops, that he abandoned his army, and made his escape into Flanders, where he was protected by the dutchess of Burgundy. His forces immediately submitted; and the other body of insurgents, informed of this miscarriage, raised the siege of Worcester, and dispersed.

The two Staffords took sanctuary in the church of Colnham, a village near Abingdon; but the privilege of that asylum not extending to rebels, they were taken from the altar, and Humphrey, the elder, executed at Tyburn. The younger pleading that he acted under the influence of his brother, received a pardon.

The suppression of this insurrection did not, however, restore the tranquillity of the government. Henry was hardly returned to his capital, before he received information of another scheme of a still more dangerous nature, though, at the same time, of a very extraordinary and romantic kind. A report had, for some time, prevailed among the people, that Edward duke of York, youngest son to Edward IV. had eluded his uncle's cruelty, by making his escape from the Tower. The pleasure with which this intelligence was received by the people, encouraged one Richard Simon, a priest of Oxford, who wanted neither subtilty nor courage, to raise a fictitious prince to dispute with Henry the possession of the throne. The instrument of this imposture was Lambert Simnel, a youth of fifteen years of age. He was the son of a baker, but endowed with understanding and address far superior to his years and condition. The seditious priest had first instructed his pupil to personate the duke of York; but another report prevailing about that time, that the earl of Warwick had found means to leave the place of his confinement; and observing that this intelligence was still more acceptable to the people, Simnel, by the dexterity of Simon, was immediately converted into Warwick. However qualified the young impostor might be to sustain the character he was to personate, and however capable the priest might be of giving him the necessary instructions, there is great reason to think, that persons of a much higher rank had joined in this conspiracy; because it appears that Simnel had better information in matters relating to the royal family than he could have derived from a person in Simon's situation. It has even been suspected, that the queen dowager, discontented with the king, and offended at the state of absolute insignificance to which she was reduced, favoured this ridiculous enterprize. Henry himself seems to have been of this opinion; for he soon after caused the queen dowager to be closely confined in the monastery of Bermondesey, and seized all her lands and revenues: nor did she ever regain her liberty, but ended her life in poverty, solitude, and confinement.

Simnel having received sufficient instructions for supporting the character he was to personate, was sent to Ireland, where the deception was not so likely to be discovered, and where the house of York had a great number of partisans. The attempt succeeded. The impostor no sooner claimed the protection of the earl of Kildare, as the unfortunate Warwick, than that credulous nobleman received him as a true Plantagenet. The populace followed his example. Simnel was received with acclamations of joy, and crowned in Dublin, with a diadem taken from a statue of the Virgin, under the title of Edward VI. No opposition was made to these proceedings: the claim of Henry was totally forgotten.

The English government was alarmed at this revolt of Ireland; but Henry immediately conceived the measures he ought to pursue. He ordered Warwick to be taken from the Tower, and led in procession through the principal streets of London, that the people might be convinced of the absurdity of Simnel's pretensions. This expedient had its proper effect in England; but in Ireland it was thought that the king had produced a counterfeit Warwick; and Henry found it would be absolutely necessary to have recourse to arms, in order to suppress the rebellion. He was the more confirmed in this opinion, on being informed that John, earl of Lincoln, son of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and of Elizabeth, eldest sister of Edward IV. had engaged in this conspiracy. Lincoln was a nobleman of courage and capacity, capacity, and had formed very aspiring views. The rigour of Henry towards the earl of Warwick, and his jealousy of all the eminent persons among the friends of the house of York, had filled him with apprehensions, and he had retired to the court of the dutchess dowager of Burgundy for safety. That princess was descended from the house of York, and sympathised in all the misfortunes which had attended her family. The present revolt in favour of Simnel, seemed to offer a fair opportunity for making Henry feel the weight of her resentment.

A. D. 1487. She accordingly sent over into Ireland a body of two thousand veteran forces, under the command of Swart, a brave and experienced officer. The earl of Lincoln and lord Lovel embarked with these forces, and joined Simnel. Elated with this unexpected reinforcement, and encouraged by the countenance of persons of such high condition, the Irish determined to invade England, where they flattered themselves with being joined by all the partisans of the house of York. Henry was soon apprised of the rebels intention, and raised a considerable army to oppose them. The insurgents landed near Foudrey, in Lancashire, and directed their march towards York; but finding themselves disappointed in the hopes they had formed of being joined by multitudes of the English, it was determined to give Henry battle the first opportunity. They were encamped on a rising ground, at Stoke, a village near Newark, when Henry's army appeared. The insurgents, marching down the hill, began the engagement with great fury; and the battle was maintained for three hours, with equal valour on both sides; though the Irish were dreadfully galled by the arrows of the English, being wholly destitute of defensive armour. The English under the earl of Lincoln, and the Germans under Swart, made so noble a resistance, that the greater part of Henry's vanguard was cut in pieces; but at length the valour of the royal army bore down all resistance; and, after a bloody conflict, obtained a complete victory. The earl of Lincoln, Lovel, and Swart, fell in the action, with four thousand of their troops; but Simnel, and his tutor Simon, were taken prisoners. The latter being a priest, was condemned to a close imprisonment; but the former, as too contemptible to excite any apprehension in Henry, received a pardon, was made a scullion in the king's kitchen, and was afterwards raised to the post of a falconer. Such was the issue of Simnel's attempt to personate the duke of Warwick; which, however ridiculous in itself, threw the whole nation into confusion, and was at last terminated by a bloody engagement.

A. D. 1488. Henry, freed from all domestic disturbances, turned his thoughts to the affairs of Europe. Those of Britany particularly engaged his attention, as they were very interesting to England. The nobles of that province had revolted against their late duke, Francis II. on account of his being governed by a favourite of very mean extraction, who oppressed the people; and the king of France considered this rebellion as a favourable incident for annexing that dutchy to his crown, especially as he was invited by the States to assist them against the intrigues of the duke of Orleans; who being disgusted with the lady of Beaujeu, sister of Charles VIII. and regent of that kingdom, had retired into Britany, and greatly inflamed the discontented nobility. Charles accordingly sent an army into that dutchy, under pretence of delivering the nobles from oppression, but in reality to reduce the province. It was the interest of Charles to persuade the king of England, that no hostile designs were entertained against Britany; and ambassadors were sent to Henry for that purpose. But all his artifices were in vain: the English monarch saw clearly that France entertained a design of subduing Britany. But either persuaded that the attempt would prove abortive, or unwilling to incur the expences of a foreign war, Henry contented himself with observing a neutrality.

The French met with very little opposition in their progress, and the nobles began to be alarmed for their safety. They were now convinced, that instead of assisting them against the ambitious designs of the duke of Orleans, the army they had called in for the preservation of their liberty were labouring to render them slaves. They therefore retired from the French forces, collected an army of sixty thousand men, and obliged the French to raise the siege of Nantz. Elated with this success, they rashly engaged the French army at St. Aubin, and were totally defeated. The duke of Orleans himself fell into the hands of the victors, and the whole force of Britany was dissipated. Soon after this misfortune, Francis paid the debt of nature, and his death exposed his dominions to a total revolution.

The duke left an only daughter to succeed him; and it seemed evident that the marriage of that princess would decide the fate of Britany. But she was in no condition to oppose the arms of France: for notwithstanding the duke of Orleans was now a prisoner, and, consequently, the pretence for invading Britany no longer existed, the invaders continued their operations with the same avidity. Henry now thought proper to act as auxiliary to the princess Anne, but sent over no more than six thousand men, a force incapable of effecting any thing decisive against the numerous armies of France. They acted entirely on the defensive; and instead of relieving, plunged the dutchy into still greater distress.

A. D. 1490. But even this dangerous situation could not render the Britons unanimous among themselves. The object of dissention was the marriage of their dutchess. At last the party of Maximilian, king of the Romans, prevailed; and the marriage of the dutchess with that prince was celebrated by proxy, and Anne immediately assumed the title of Queen of the Romans. But Maximilian was in no condition to give assistance to his distressed consort: he was destitute both of troops and money, and embarrassed by continual revolts of the Flemings. The court of France now began to perceive their error. It was found that it would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to reduce the dutchy of Britany by arms; and that negotiation only could annex it firmly to the French crown. Charles, the young king of France, had formerly been affianced to the daughter of Maximilian; and that princess, though too young to consummate her marriage, had been sent to the court of France to be educated, and now actually bore the title of queen. But notwithstanding these engagements, it was now perceived, that it would be more advantageous for Charles to marry the dutchess of Britany, by which that rich province would be forever annexed to the crown of France. The whole art of persuasion was therefore secretly employed to convince the Britons, that they could never enjoy a happy tranquillity, but by being united to the French monarchy. The Britons were influenced by their suggestions; but the young dutchess herself had imbibed the strongest prejudices against Charles, whom she considered as the author of all the misfortunes of her family.

A. D. 1491. But notwithstanding her repugnance to this measure, she consented to sacrifice both her engagements and her prejudices to the interest of the people. The marriage was celebrated at Langey, in Touraine. The princess was then conducted to St. Denis, where she was crowned, and thence made her entrance into Paris amidst the joyful acclamations of the people. The daughter of Maximilian was sent back to her father, and the dutchy of Britany annexed to the crown of France; an acquisition of the utmost importance to that kingdom.

Maximilian, transported with rage at this double affront, threatened the most dreadful vengeance against Charles. Henry had also reason to reproach himself for his inaction: he ought to have supported the Britons with a force proportional to the importance of the union of Britany with France. His chagrin

chagrin stimulated him the more to revenge, as he piqued himself upon the depth of his policy. A war with France was always flattering and agreeable to the English; and Henry immediately summoned a parliament to obtain supplies. He opened the session with a speech from the throne; in which he told them, that the king of France, grown insolent with power, had treated the English with contempt, and refused to pay the tribute which Lewis XI. had stipulated with Edward IV. that he was determined to head his army in person; mentioned the victories of Cressy, Agincourt, and Poitiers; and expressed his expectations of being equally successful. The English were flattered with these pleasing ideas; a large subsidy was granted him; and Henry, though he well knew that war was not his province, and that Maximilian had neither money nor troops to second him, affected all the ardour of a conqueror.

A. D. 1492. Elated with the hopes of conquest, and of enriching themselves with the spoils of the enemy, the English prepared, with the greatest alacrity, to follow their prince; and many of them sold their estates, that they might appear in the field with greater splendor, and lead their followers in a manner becoming their rank. The English army, consisting of twenty-five thousand foot, and sixteen thousand horse, landed at Calais on the sixth of October. The lateness of the season being considered as an indication that the war would soon be terminated, Henry replied, "It is of little consequence at what season the invasion is begun, as one summer will not be sufficient for the reduction of France." But notwithstanding all his boasts of conquest, he had, at that very time, perhaps before he landed at Calais, begun a negotiation for a peace. In order, however, to save appearances, he laid siege to Boulogne; and engaged several persons of distinction in his army to present a petition, requesting him to accommodate his differences with France, on pretence that his allies were not in a condition to give him much assistance, and that it would be difficult to find subsistence for his troops during the winter. The French well knew that Henry wanted nothing but money; and Charles, who was very impatient of undertaking the conquest of Naples, was easily disposed to give him seven hundred and forty-five thousand crowns, and an annual pension of twenty-five thousand to himself and his heirs. Thus, as lord Bacon very justly observes, peace and war equally contributed to fill the coffers of Henry; the former giving him the money of his subjects, and the latter that of his enemies.

Henry had now great reason to think that the peace he had concluded with France would be lasting; and as he had nothing to fear from domestic enemies, he flattered himself with enjoying a long series of uninterrupted tranquillity. But he was mistaken: his enemies were indefatigable; and the dutchess of Burgundy in particular meditated vengeance against him. Careless of the means employed to satisfy her resentment, she determined to raise up another impostor, in order to shake the throne of Henry. By means of her emissaries, she propagated, or rather revived a report, that her nephew, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, had made his escape from the Tower, when his elder brother was murdered by the cruelty of his uncle, and still lay concealed in some secret retreat. She soon perceived that the report was received with pleasure; and that the people entertained the greatest expectations that he would soon make his appearance, and attempt to recover the throne of his ancestors. It was now necessary to procure a youth proper for personating Edward, and a young Jew seemed to answer her most sanguine wishes. He was the son of one Warbec, a Jew, who had been converted to christianity, and whose business having called him to London in the reign of Edward IV. his wife was there delivered of a son. He was called Perkin, or Peter; and Edward, who was suspected of carrying on a secret correspondence with Warbec's wife, was his godfather. The comeliness of his person, his insinuating manners, and the versatility of his genius, rendered him extremely well adapted to the part he was to act. He soon learned the lessons necessary for personating the duke of York; but as the season seemed not then favourable for appearing in the world, she sent him to Portugal, under the care of lady Brampton, where he continued a whole year, unknown to all the world.

When the dutchess found that a war between England and France was inevitable, she determined to produce the impostor; and he was accordingly sent over to Ireland, where he assumed the name of Richard Plantagenet. He wrote letters to the earls of Kildare and Desmond, inviting them to join his party. The vulgar received him with open arms; and the story of his escape from the cruelty of his uncle was soon spread over the whole kingdom, and procured him a multitude of partisans.

Charles VIII. imagined that this pretended prince might be of advantage to him during his war with Henry, and Perkin was accordingly invited to the court of France. He was there received with all the honours due to the heir of the English crown. A magnificent palace was assigned him, with a handsome pension, and a guard for his person. Numbers of English gentlemen came to Paris, in order to offer their service to Perkin, who now began to appear dangerous to the government. The countenance of the king of France gave great credit to a fiction extremely well calculated to please the people. But, on the conclusion of the peace with England, Charles found it necessary to dismiss the counterfeit Plantagenet.

A. D. 1493. Perkin, on his leaving France, retired to the court of the dutchess of Burgundy, under pretence of craving her protection. That princess affected a total ignorance of his pretensions, and seemed to examine every circumstance with the most scrupulous anxiety. After many affected doubts, and the severest scrutiny, she burst into a transport of tenderness, embraced him as her nephew, the sole heir of the Plantagenets, and the legitimate successor of Edward IV. She even assigned him guards, and a magnificent equipage, and honoured him with the title of the "White Rose of England." Many persons of rank and condition came to her court from England, to assist him in his enterprize, and share his fortune. Even Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain, who had been so instrumental in putting the crown upon the head of Henry, entertained the project of a revolt in his favour. Sir Robert Clifford went over to Flanders, and openly joined the impostor. The whole nation was thrown into a state of uncertainty. The murder of the two princes had been always doubted, the infernal deed having been committed under the impenetrable veil of night and secrecy; and the countenance given to Perkin by Charles of France and the dutchess dowager of Burgundy, gave countenance to the impostor. Henry saw his danger, and that the utmost prudence and precaution were necessary to divert the force of the impending storm.

Could Henry have ascertained the death of the real duke of York, the conspiracy must have fallen immediately to the ground; but of the five persons who had been employed in the base assassination, two only remained alive; so that their testimony, though they agreed in the same story, was not thought sufficient to put the fact beyond all doubt and controversy. Henry, however, found a clue, by means of his spies, which guided him through the labyrinth of this mystery. He discovered the pedigree and adventures of Perkin, and traced the whole conspiracy from its first formation. The story was immediately published for the satisfaction of the nation. He bribed Clifford himself, one of the chief persons in the court of the pretended prince, to discover the secrets of his party. Henry had no sooner procured the necessary intelligence, together with the names of the principal conspirators then in England; than they were arrested, and and their execution intimidated others. But the trial of Stanley required more solemn preparations. His rank and former services seemed to secure him against any accusation and punishment. It was feared that the death of so illustrious a person would be attended with many inconveniences, unless his crime was apparent to the whole nation. The king was, however, determined that he should not escape his vengeance. Clifford was directed to come over privately to England; and to accuse Stanley before the council. The treacherous insurgent obeyed. He threw himself at the king's feet while seated at the council-table; asked pardon for his past offences, and offered to atone for them by any services in his power. Henry told him; that the best proof he could give of his penitence, and the only service he could now render him, was to make a full confession of his guilt; and to name his accomplices. Clifford immediately accused Stanley, who was present, as the chief abettor of the conspiracy. Stanley himself could not discover more surmise than was affected by Henry on this occasion. Clifford insisted upon his charge, and offered to lay before the council the whole proof of his guilt. Henry seemed to hesitate, but at last ordered Stanley to be sent to prison, and he was soon after tried and beheaded.

A. D. 1495. The execution of Stanley struck the conspirators with terror. They perceived that all their secrets were discovered; and abandoned the idol they had worshipped to his fate. Perkin had no other resource than his despair. He embarked with his few followers, amounting to about six hundred men, and appeared on the coast of Kent. But the people were not now disposed to favour him: the whole account of his imposture was known, and the late executions had taught the people caution. Perkin mistrusting something of this kind, landed a small party only, in order to discover the true disposition of the Kentishmen, who were drawn up with great regularity to receive him. His retainers met with a very friendly reception; and Perkin himself was invited to land; but the wary youth suspecting the whole to be a deception, and that a design was formed to take him prisoner, refused to commit himself to their hands. Despairing of being able to make themselves masters of the impostor's person, the Kentish men took the whole party, consisting of one hundred and fifty persons, prisoners. These were all tried, condemned and executed; and their bodies hung upon gibbets along the coasts, as a terror to others. Disappointed in the reception he hoped to meet with, Perkin sailed to Corke in Ireland; but found no countenance there, except among the very lowest of the people, and was obliged to conceal himself with the wild Irish in the bogs and forests of that country.

Henry now convoked a parliament, where the estates of all persons convicted of having engaged in the support of Perkin, were confiscated; and the famous statute was enacted, wherein it was declared, "That no person who should by arms, or otherwise, assist the king for the time being, should ever afterwards, either by course of law, or act of parliament, be attainted for such an instance of obedience." This act, which Henry strenuously promoted on account of his disputed title, affords a glaring instance how far the prejudices, even of the wisest men, may carry them to obtain the object of their wishes. Henry was fearful that his example, when he ascended the throne, rather than this law, would be followed; and therefore endeavoured to bind the legislature itself, by prescribing rules to future parliaments; an attempt evidently repugnant to the very fundamental principles of all political government. The same parliament also authorised him to levy, by course of law, all the sums which any person had agreed to pay him by way of benevolence; an act which gave a sanction to that arbitrary method of exaction.

Charles VIII. whose family had long claimed the crown of Naples, had now, in pursuance of his right, undertaken the conquest of that kingdom.

His progress was amazingly rapid. The Neapolitans, long unused to arms, were in no condition of meeting the French veterans in the open field; so that Charles was soon master of the whole country, and even of the capital itself. The Italian states were now sufficiently alarmed for their own territories; and a powerful league was formed against him, in which Henry became one of the contracting parties. Charles, unable to support himself against so powerful a combination, was obliged to abandon all his conquests, and return ingloriously to France, with the loss of the greater part of his army.

A. D. 1496. Exasperated at the measures pursued by Henry, Charles recommended Perkin, who still lurked among the wild Irish, to the king of Scotland, who entertained no favourable disposition towards England. Perkin immediately abandoned his retreat, and repaired to the Scottish court, where he was received with the utmost kindness and hospitality. James IV. who was firmly attached to the interest of France, owned him as the son of Edward IV. and appeared to be so thoroughly convinced of his being the real duke of York; that he rejected the alliance which was now offered him by Henry. He even married the young adventurer to his niece, the lady Catherine Gordon, daughter to the earl of Huntly, and one of the most beautiful and accomplished ladies of the age. At the same time, he publicly declared, that he would assist him with all his forces, in recovering the inheritance of his ancestors; and it was agreed in the Scottish council to carry this design into immediate execution. A numerous army was accordingly assembled, under the command of the king in person, attended by the young adventurer. On their entering Northumberland, Perkin published a manifesto, in which he inveighed bitterly against Henry, as an usurper, a tyrant, and a murderer; and invited all his subjects to assist him in recovering the throne of his ancestors.

But this manifesto, though drawn up with great spirit and precision; produced very little effect: the claim of Perkin was grown obsolete, and his being assisted by the Scots rendered him an unwelcome visitor to the English. James soon perceived that he had undertaken a task he was unable to perform; and, desirous of repaying himself the expences of the expedition, ravaged Northumberland in the most cruel manner. Perkin pretended to be greatly affected with the miseries of his plundered subjects, and remonstrated strongly against the proceedings of the army. But all his representations were in vain. James told him, "That he was persuaded his concern was only employed in behalf of his enemy, and that he was anxious to preserve what would never belong to him." The depredations were accordingly continued without the least intermission, till advice arrived that a numerous army was advancing against them, when the Scots thought proper to retire into their own country.

A. D. 1497. Henry never lost an opportunity of extorting money from his subjects. The Scottish invasion furnished him with a sufficient pretence for demanding a supply from his parliament; and a subsidy, to the amount of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, with two fifteenths, were accordingly granted. His avarice, which was his ruling passion, rather than his necessities, induced him to this exaction; and the people, often disgusted with necessary taxes, were far from being disposed to submit to those which were useless to the state. The Cornishmen, who still preserved some remains of the ancient ferocity of their ancestors, were highly exasperated at being obliged to support so unnecessary a burden. They complained loudly against this imposition, from which they considered themselves exempted; as the northern counties had usually repelled the incursions of the Scots, without burdening the other parts of the kingdom. Michael Joseph, a farrier of Bodmin, who was considered as the leader of the multitude, greatly incited the ill-humour of the people by the most inflammatory reflections on the proceedings of the government. He was joined by Thomas Flammoc, a lawyer, who had long been considered as the oracle of the neighbourhood. He persuaded them, that they had no right to pay the tax, as the northern nobility were obliged, by the tenures of their estates, to defend the borders against the Scots; adding, that the only way to obtain redress was to deliver a petition to the king, and to second it with such a force as would give it authority; avoiding, at the same time, every species of oppression, in order to convince their fellow subjects, that the good of the people had induced them to have recourse to this method for procuring a redress of their grievances.

These speeches produced the desired effect. The multitude flocked together, armed with such weapons as are generally possessed by countrymen. Flammoc and Joseph were chosen their leaders, and the rabble marched directly towards the capital. At Wells they were joined by lord Audley, a nobleman descended from an ancient family, but of a very restless and ambitious temper. Audley, by his authority, kept the insurgents from committing the least violence or disorder during their march. When they reached Winchester, instead of continuing their route directly to London, as they at first intended, they marched into Kent, from a ridiculous notion, that the inhabitants of that country would join them in great numbers. But they soon found that their expectations were built on a chimerical expectation: not one of the Kentishmen would join their standard. They were not, however, intimidated by this disappointment; they continued their march to Blackheath, and encamped between Greenwich and Eltham.

The inhabitants of London were greatly alarmed; apprehending that their wealth might tempt the insurgents to plunder the city. Fortunately for them, as well as for Henry, the army intended to chastise the Scots, was ready for action, and immediately sent against the Cornish rebels. The troops were divided into three bodies; the first commanded by the earl of Oxford, the second by the king in person, and the third by lord d'Aubigny, a general in whose abilities and courage the soldiers placed the highest confidence.

Lord Oxford was directed to post the left wing of his division near Lewisham, and to extend his right towards Fooks-Cray, in order to secure all the roads and defiles by which it was possible to escape in that direction. Lord d'Aubigny was ordered to march directly against the front of the rebels, extending his right wing towards the left of the earl of Oxford's division. The king himself encamped in St. George's Fields, his troops forming a kind of body of reserve. This excellent disposition rendered it almost impossible for any of the rebels to escape, as they had no shipping to cross the Thames, the only passage that was left open.

It was given out that Henry intended to attack the insurgents on the Monday following, whereas the king really intended to give them battle on the Saturday. This false rumour occasioned a capital mistake among the Cornishmen; for while their main body was encamped on the middle of the heath, their advanced guard was posted at Deptford-bridge, without any intermediate detachment between them.

D'Aubigny advanced against the rebels about four in the afternoon, and attacked their advanced guard with the utmost fury, and after a very smart conflict, drove them from their post, and followed them so close up the hill, that he gained the summit before any assistance could be sent from the main body to oppose him. This advantage inspired d'Aubigny with a kind of contempt for the enemy, tho' they were formidable for their numbers, and far from being deficient in valour. He charged them at the head of his men with great impetuosity; but met with a resistance he did not expect: his valour carried him too far, and he was taken prisoner. Victory seemed now inclined to declare for the insurgents; but lord Oxford falling in the critical moment upon their rear, changed the fortune of the day; they could not stand the shock of these veteran forces, being wholly destitute both of horse and artillery. Fifteen hundred of them were cut to pieces, and the rest taken prisoners, with their leaders. Lord Audley was beheaded on Tower-hill; but Flammoc and Joseph were executed at Tyburn. The rest of the prisoners were dismissed without any punishment, a favour which Henry's character gave them no reason to expect. Perhaps their inoffensive behaviour pleaded sufficiently in their favour; or perhaps he hoped to obliterate the remembrance of his former severities by this instance of unusual lenity.

This commotion in England induced James to make a second invasion of the northern counties. He met with no opposition, and sat down before Norham castle. The earl of Surry commanded the few forces in those counties; and as soon as the Cornish rebellion was suppressed, Henry sent the best of his troops to join that nobleman in Yorkshire. With this reinforcement he advanced against the Scots, who immediately raised the siege, and retired with such precipitation that the earl could not overtake them. He, however, continued the pursuit; and made himself master of the strong castle of Ayton, situated between Berwick and Edinburgh. A new negotiation was now entered into for a peace, but the conferences were rendered abortive: only a truce for a few months was concluded.

The principal reason that prevented a truce from taking place between the two kingdoms, was James's refusal to give up Perkin Warbeck. But though he would not consent to sacrifice the person he had engaged to protect, he desired him to quit his dominions. The unhappy fugitive was now reduced to a melancholy situation. Flanders could no longer furnish him with an asylum, as the Flemish, having suffered considerably by the interruption of their trade with England, had made an accommodation with Henry. He had therefore no other resource than to return to Ireland, where he again resided among his partizans, who still continued firm to his interest.

A.D. 1498. The Cornish rebels, on their return to their country, boasted that they owed not their pardon to Henry's clemency, but to his fear that their punishment would have roused the whole nation; the people being ready to take up arms against the government. Animated by these representations, the people again assembled; and hearing that Perkin was in Ireland, it was agreed to invite him over, and place him at their head. The young adventurer listened to their proposals, and having prevailed upon a few persons to follow his fortune, he landed in Whitland-bay on the coast of Cornwall. He repaired immediately to Bodmin, where, being joined by three or four thousand men, he issued a proclamation, in which he assumed the title of king of England, by the name of Richard IV.

Strangers to discipline, and strangers to the danger of supporting themselves against the attacks of a regular army, they were persuaded that their force was invincible, and resolved to undertake the siege of Exeter, which they promised themselves would fall an easy conquest to their arms. They carried this wild project into execution; but being destitute of artillery, and almost every other requisite necessary for forming a regular siege; the assailants, who attempted to scale the walls, were repulsed in every attack. While the rebels were thus employed in an attempt that exceeded their power, several of the nobility and gentry of Devonshire, formed an association in defence of Henry's government, and raised forces in order to drive the insurgents from the walls of Exeter. Henry also dispatched the lord d'Aubigny, at the head of four thousand men, to the relief of that city; and followed himself with a more numerous army.

Perkin was now intimidated; and, raising the siege of Exeter, he retired to Taunton in Somersetshire. His army, when he lay before Exeter, consisted of about seven thousand men, but many of these having joined him from the hopes of plunder, left the army when he raised the siege. The young adventurer perceiving that the number of his followers daily decreased, and that lord d'Aubenev was in full march to attack him, did not think proper to venture a battle. He fled with three-score horse to the monastery of Beaulieu, in the New Forest, where he and his retinue registered themselves, as persons entitled to the benefit of that sanctuary. Lord d'Aubenev was no sooner informed of their flight, than he detached a party of three hundred horse in pursuit of the fugitives; but finding they were already within the walls, he surrounded the asylum, till he received further instructions from Henry. In the mean time the rebels, finding themselves deserted by their leader, submitted to the mercy of the king, and received a pardon. The lady Catherine Gordon, wife of Perkin, fell into the hands of Henry, who treated her with a kindness that does him honour. He soothed her mind with many tokens of regard, placed her in a reputable station about the queen, and assigned her a pension, which she enjoyed till her death, which happened during the reign of his successor.

But the fate of Perkin himself was not so easily determined; he had taken shelter in a sanctuary which had never been violated. Some of the council advised the king to drag him from the altar by force, and inflict upon him the punishment he so justly deserved for his temerity. But Henry thought the remedy too violent: he was unwilling to offend the whole body of the clergy, who considered these religious retreats as sacred and inviolable. At the same time he was desirous of convincing, even the most bigotted part of his people, that Perkin was an impostor, which would effectually put an end to his pretensions, without depriving him of his life. He therefore caused secret applications to be made to the young adventurer, offering him his pardon, if he would quit his sanctuary, and deliver himself into the king's hands. Perkin, destitute of all assistance, listened to the proposals; he was conducted in a kind of mock triumph to London, and committed to the Tower.

A.D. 1499. The volatile genius of Perkin was, however, ill adapted to confinement; he made his escape from the Tower, and fled to the sanctuary at Shene. The prior of that religious retirement interceded with Henry, and obtained his pardon. Perkin was again sent a prisoner to the Tower. But the spirit of intrigue had taken possession of his mind. He found means to open a correspondence with the young earl of Warwick, who having been kept in confinement from his earliest infancy, was ignorant even of the common transactions of life. He was therefore unable to see the consequence of listening to the suggestions of Perkin: he engaged with the impostor to make their escape. Their plot, however, was discovered, and Perkin, having now rendered himself unworthy of all favour, was condemned and executed. Nor did Henry omit so favourable an opportunity of freeing himself from a prince he had always beheld with malevolence. He caused the unfortunate earl of Warwick, the only male remaining of the Plantagenet family, to be accused of forming designs to disturb the government. He was easily found guilty, and Henry suffered him to be executed. This act of tyranny was thought, even by Henry himself, to stand in need of some apology; and it was accordingly pretended, that Ferdinand, king of Arragon, would not consent to the marriage of his daughter, with the prince of Wales, while any prince of the house of York remained alive. But this apology was far from satisfying the people: they exclaimed against the injustice of this cruel proceeding: they beheld with detestation a prince, who scrupled not to sacrifice every principle of humanity to the dictates of an avaricious policy.

A.D. 1502. The marriage between Arthur, prince of Wales, and the princess Catherine of Aragon, was celebrated soon after the death of Warwick; but the prince, who was then about sixteen years of age, did not long survive his nuptials; he died of a consumption, and, it was said, without consummating his marriage. Henry, unwilling to restore Catherine's dowry, which was two hundred thousand ducats, obliged Henry, his second son, whom he now created prince of Wales, to marry the princess, a dispensation from the pope being obtained for that purpose. This marriage occasioned very remarkable events in the following reign: About the same time Henry married his eldest daughter Margaret, to James IV. king of Scotland; an event which gave occasion to one of the members of the council to remark, that England, in consequence of this alliance, might possibly fall under the dominion of Scotland. "No," replied Henry with some vivacity, "Scotland, in that case, would only become an acquisition to England." He spoke not by the spirit of prophecy; but the event actually happened in the beginning of the succeeding century.

The plague, during these transactions, raged with uncommon violence; upwards of thirty thousand persons were swept away by it in the city of London. Among many others who fell victims to its fury, was cardinal Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, a prelate of great parts and experience in business; but so entirely devoted to the avaricious will of his master, and at the same time so fertile in devising oppressive methods to fleece the people, that he was beheld with detestation, and died without receiving the tribute of a tear.

But the loss of his favourite minister diverted not the thoughts of Henry from his darling pursuit of heaping up riches. Avarice was always the ruling passion of his soul, and was now increased by age to an immoderate degree. He was already possessed of more personal riches than any other sovereign in Europe; but his desire of acquisition seemed to increase in proportion as it was gratified. He now issued out commissions for imposing fines and redemptions upon all persons in the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, and Devon, that should be found to have favoured the Cornish rebels under lord Audley and Perkin Warbec. At the same time he issued orders to all the sheriffs, to summon every gentleman possessed of forty pounds a year in land to repair to court, within a limited time, and receive the order of knighthood. These oppressive methods procured him the hatred of his subjects, though this hatred was, by his great abilities, tinged deeply with fear. All the powers on the continent courted his alliance; and all the malecontents of England were over-awed into a peaceful acquiescence.

The busy, restless, and furious passion of jealousy, however, still encroached upon his repose. Henry was of a disposition never to be easy under the smallest ground of apprehension, and an accident happened which greatly disturbed his peace. Edmund de la Pole, second son of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, sister of Edward IV. was, on the death of his elder brother, considered as the next lineal heir to the crown, whenever the lines of Edward and of George, duke of Clarence, should become extinct. Edmund had claimed the inheritance of his title and estates on the death of his brother, who perished in the battle of Stokefield; but his extravagance having rendered him unable to support the title of duke, he was obliged to resign that dignity, and Henry, in consequence of that cession, allowed him to retain the lands of the earldom, with the dignity of earl of Suffolk. Edmund was of a very passionate disposition, and happened, in one of his furious sallies, to kill a man. He applied to the king for a pardon, which was not refused; but being little indulgent to persons connected with the house of York, he obliged him to appear personally before the court of King's-Bench, and plead his pardon like a common felon. Suffolk so highly resented this affront, that he fled over to Flanders, and was protected by the dutchess of Burgundy. Henry was alarmed at his retreat; he thought he saw a new pretender ready to dispute his throne; and in order to prevent any design from being formed against him, he dispatched some of his emissaries to Flanders, promising him every advantage he could desire, if he would return. The offer was accepted: the earl came over to England, where he plunged into all his former excesses, to the ruin of his credit and fortune: he was obliged to retire into Flanders, where he again renewed the fears and jealousy of Henry.

A. D. 1503. Finding all his offers to prevail upon Suffolk to return ineffectual, and persuaded that he was forming designs against the government, he had recourse to the same artifice he had so successfully used in the case of Perkin Warbec. He applied to Sir Robert Curson, governor of the castle of Hammes, near Calais, to attempt the discovery of Suffolk's secret intentions. He accordingly abandoned his post, under pretence of disaffection to the government, retired into Flanders, and offered his service to the earl of Suffolk. That nobleman received him with particular marks of esteem, formed a very intimate connection with him, and shewed him, in confidence, several letters he had received from his correspondents, in which the measures of Henry were treated with great freedom. Curson immediately informed Henry of the discoveries he had made, in consequence of which the earl of Devonshire, William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, and Sir James Windham, were taken into custody, and the two latter were afterwards condemned and executed. The death of Tyrrel gave universal satisfaction, on account of his participation in the murder of the two young princes, sons to Edward IV. Suffolk was, however, beyond the reach of Henry; but that nobleman, finding the dutchess of Burgundy was now become indifferent with regard to the partizans of the house of York, he retired to the court of Philip, archduke of Austria, where he was received with great marks of kindness and regard.

Henry was still employed in inventing new schemes for satisfying his avarice. His agents in this complicated scene of extortion, were Sir Richard Empson and Edward Dudley. The former was the son of a sieve-maker, and by the boldness of his measures endeavoured to conceal the meanness of his birth: the latter was a person of fortune and family, as well as of great abilities; circumstances which render his memory still more execrable, if possible, than that of his partner in iniquity. The insolence of these two ministers were carried to that height, that they did not even observe the common forms of justice; they fleeced the subject with the most arbitrary licentiousness. Such as refused tamely to yield up their property, were imprisoned, fined, and some of them executed, in consequence of private trials, without any fair examination, or the verdict of a jury. Henry, who shared the fruits of this oppression, covered the authors with the shield of his authority. Informers, spies, and other vermin of a similar kind, filled every part of the kingdom; while Henry was deaf to the groans of the oppressed, and insensible to the reproaches of his people.

A. D. 1505. An event which now happened in Spain, for some time diverted Henry's thoughts from oppression. Isabella, queen of Castile, paid the debt of nature, and it was foreseen that this incident would greatly affect the fortunes of her husband Ferdinand, king of Arragon. Henry's situation was, in some particulars, similar to that of Ferdinand, and therefore he regarded the issue of these transactions as a precedent for himself. Joan, the daughter of Ferdinand by Isabella, was married to the archduke

Philip, and being, in right of her mother, heiress of Castile, seemed entitled to dispute with Ferdinand the present administration of that kingdom. It was of the utmost importance for Henry to support the pretensions of Ferdinand. He was very sensible that the greater part of his subjects were convinced of the superiority of his wife's title to the crown; and he dreaded lest the prince of Wales, who was every day advancing towards manhood, might be tempted by his own ambition, and the example of the archduke, to lay immediate claim to the crown.

A. D. 1506, Ferdinand, though so closely connected with Henry, soon found that it would be impossible for him to continue in the administration. His former exactions and impositions had rendered him very unpopular, and a resolution was taken to declare Philip and Joan, king and queen of Castile. Philip therefore embarked with his consort for Spain, on the sixth of January; but being overtaken by a dreadful storm, he was obliged to put into the harbour of Weymouth for safety. Spent with the fatigues of a turbulent voyage, the duke and his consort went on shore to procure some refreshment, contrary to the advice of his council, who strongly opposed the resolution.

Alarmed at hearing that a large fleet had, for some days, been seen on the coast, Sir John Trenchard, a gentleman of considerable property in the county of Dorset, assembled a body of forces, and being joined by Sir John Cary, who was also at the head of a few troops, they came to that town. As no accommodations could be expected fit for entertaining persons of their dignity, he invited them to his house, and immediately dispatched an express to inform the court of this important incident. Henry sent the earl of Arundel to compliment them in his name; to assure them that he hoped soon to have the pleasure of embracing them, and that, in the mean time, they might command in his dominions. Philip would willingly have declined the honour of an interview; but he well knew that he must not now depart without the king's consent, and therefore set out immediately for the court, which was then at Windsor, where he and his consort were received by Henry with all the marks of the most cordial friendship. But the English monarch was determined to draw some advantages from this fortunate event; and accordingly hinted to Philip, that as he had changed his condition, by accepting the crown of Castile, the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries ought to be renewed. No objections were made to this proposal, and a new treaty was drawn up and signed by both princes.

But though this treaty was very advantageous to England, Henry was far more desirous of succeeding in another attempt, which regarded himself only. He had been very uneasy at the reception the earl of Suffolk had met with at Philip's court, and was determined to employ the present opportunity of procuring that fugitive to be sent back to his own country. Accordingly he complained to Philip, that his subjects found an asylum in his dominions, particularly the earl of Suffolk. "I really thought," replied the king of Castile, "that a person of so little consequence was incapable of giving you the least uneasiness. But to convince you, that I am desirous of giving you all the satisfaction in my power, I will banish him from my territories." "You will greatly increase the obligation," said the king, "by carrying your complaisance a little farther, and deliver Suffolk into my hands: I can then depend upon his submission and obedience." "If I grant your request," said Philip, "I shall bring a stain of dishonour upon us both. It will be said that I was treated as a prisoner in your dominions." "Then there is no farther dispute," replied Henry, "I will take all the dishonour upon myself." Philip perceived that Henry was determined to carry his point, and therefore gave his consent, on condition that no attempt should be made against his life. Henry very readily agreed to this restriction, restriction, and even condescended to write a letter to the earl with his own hand; assuring the unfortunate exile, that he should meet with the kindest reception in England. This invitation, added to that of Philip, who was persuaded that Henry would make no difficulty of granting his pardon, produced the desired effect. Suffolk returned to England; but on his appearance, was immediately committed to the Tower, where he continued till the next reign, when he fell a sacrifice to the detestable jealousies of the state.

Philip was now suffered to proceed on his voyage, after being detained in England above three months. He was joyfully received by his subjects. Ferdinand withdrew to his own kingdom of Arragon; and Philip was placed upon the throne of Castile, amidst the acclamations of the people. But he did not long enjoy his crown. He died on the twenty-fifth of September, after a reign of about three months; and his consort was so afflicted at his loss, that she fell into a deep melancholy, which rendered her incapable of holding the reins of government. Philip therefore resumed the administration during the minority of Charles of Luxembourg, afterwards so well known by the name of Charles V.

A.D. 1507. The Flemings having thus lost their prince, invited the emperor Maximilian to resume the government of the Low Countries during the minority of his grandson. He accepted the invitation; but being engaged in affairs of importance, which detained him in Germany, he sent his daughter Margaret, widow to the duke of Savoy, with the character of governante of the Low Countries, till his arrival. A provisional treaty of commerce was soon after concluded between Margaret and Henry, until some differences which had arisen between the English and Flemings could be amicably adjusted.

But no business of state, except where his jealousy was concerned, could divert the attention of Henry from his avaricious proceedings; and the oppressions of Empson and Dudley were more flagitious than ever. Sir William Capel, who had been lord-mayor of London about four years since, was now prosecuted upon a frivolous charge of not having punished a person who had paid him false money during the time of his mayoralty, and fined two thousand pounds. He refused to pay so exorbitant a sum, and was immediately sent to the Tower, where he continued till the death of Henry. Laurence Aylmer, lord mayor of London, and his two sheriffs, were also prosecuted upon charges equally frivolous, and each fined a thousand pounds. But they imitating the example of Capel, were committed to the King's-bench prison. Several other gentlemen were prosecuted in the same manner; so that it is no wonder the names of Empson and Dudley became obnoxious to the people. By these iniquitous practices, Henry amassed the enormous sum of two millions, seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds, an amazing quantity in those times. His rigid economy daily augmented this heap of wealth; and the more he advanced in years, the more detestable he became by his avarice; a vice never found in a great and cultivated mind.

A.D. 1508. But Henry now began to perceive, that neither riches, power, nor success, could secure him from the misfortunes incident to human nature. He had for some years laboured under a consumptive disorder, too inveterate to be conquered by the prescriptions of the healing art, which had exerted all its powers in preserving a life Henry was so unwilling to resign. At length his disorder became desperate: he found his end was approaching. The thoughts of death effected what reason had attempted in vain. Henry entered deep into himself, and trembled at the gloomy prospect that now opened before him. He now saw the wickedness and folly of accumulating riches by violence and extortion, and was desirous of performing some actions that might recommend him to the mercy of the Deity, and obtain, in some measure, the applause of his people.

He distributed large sums in charity; released, at his own expence, all prisoners confined for debts under forty shillings; and ordered, by his last will, that restitution, as far as possible, should be made to those who had suffered by the infamous agents of his oppressive avarice. But these measures, however commendable in themselves, are more efficacious in relieving the consciences of the unjust, than in satisfying the Deity. There is little merit in abandoning what we can no longer enjoy.

A.D. 1509. In this manner Henry passed the last months of his life; and paid the debt of nature on the twenty-fourth of April, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, and the fifty-second of his age.

The reign of Henry was more advantageous to his people than honourable to himself. He put a final period to the civil wars which had so long distracted the kingdom. He maintained order and regularity in the state: he depressed the exorbitant power of the nobility; and by his firmness and intrepidity, together with the friendship and alliances he contracted with foreign princes, he became one of the greatest monarchs in Europe. His reign, in some measure, humanized the ferocious manners of the English. He inherited a fund of good sense, which was greatly improved by study and experience. His judgment was sound, and his sagacity remarkable. His prudence and valour surmounted every difficulty. These shining qualities acquired him the esteem of all the princes of Europe, and he was generally known by the appellation of the English Solomon. But his activity and firmness, his wisdom, his love of peace, and his courage in war, cannot wipe away the stains which the odious vice of avarice left upon his memory.

Henry had six children by his queen; but only three survived him; one son, and two daughters:

1. Henry Tudor, born at Greenwich on the twenty-fourth of February, 1491, and succeeded his father by the name of Henry VIII.

2. Margaret Tudor, born on the twenty-ninth of November, 1489: first married to James IV. king of Scotland; and afterwards to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus. She left children by both.

3. Mary Tudor, born in the year 1498: married first to Lewis XII. king of France; and after his decease, to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

The great object of Henry's policy was to humble the nobility, and to keep them in a proper degree of subordination. Accordingly he abolished, by his vigour and firmness, the practice of having retainers, which had been long an object of pride to the nobility, and who, by this method, engaged a multitude of people in their service. These became the tools of their injustice and rebellion. He also passed an act of parliament, by which the nobility were enabled to alienate their possessions, without paying the enormous fines before necessary. This enabled the people to purchase estates, and, consequently, to augment their power; while it diminished that of the barons, by furnishing them with the means of prodigality and expence. Commerce and industry were every day advancing in their progress, though the real methods of encouraging trade were entirely unknown. The interest of money, the profits of exchange, and the exportation of plate and bullion, were prohibited. Prices were fixed for woollen cloths, for hats, and the wages of labourers: nor could any person bind his children apprentices, who did not possess twenty shillings a year in land. These were so many obstacles which impeded the progress of commerce and industry. Henry, however, passed several wise laws for the execution of justice, for the punishment of murderers, and for subjecting the clergy to capital punishments on the commission of grosser enormities.

The arts and sciences now began to emerge from that obscurity under which they had been so long concealed. The city of Constantinople was taken by the Turks in the year 1453; and the Greeks, among whom some remains of learning were still preserved, being scattered by these enthusiastic barbarians, took shelter in Italy, and imported, together with their admirable language, a tincture of their science, and their refined taste in poetry and eloquence. The purity of the Latin tongue was also revived; the study of antiquity became fashionable; and the esteem for literature gradually propagated itself through every nation in Europe. But what still more contributed to disseminate the sciences, was the discovery of the art of printing, which spreads with such rapidity, from country to country, the wisdom and follies of men. William Caxton, citizen and mercer of London, being sent ambassador by Edward IV. to the duke of Burgundy, learned that useful art during his abode in the Low Countries, and introduced it into England about the year 1474. He translated several books from the French, and printed them himself in one of the chapels of Westminster-abbey, by permission of John Islip the abbot. The book on "The Game of Chesse," dated 1474, but without Caxton's name, is generally reckoned the first production of the English press. The invention was soon purchased by the monasteries, and presses were set up at Oxford, Cambridge, St. Albans, and other places.

The dawn of literature was ushered in by the discovery of a new world. Christopher Columbus, a native of Genoa, one of those bold and original geniuses born for the instruction of mankind, undertook to extend the limits which ignorance had set to the world. His knowledge of the true figure of the earth, however obtained, was far superior to that of any of his contemporaries; and he generously determined not to suffer the discoveries he had made to continue in obscurity. He conceived a project of sailing to the Indies by a western course, and of opening to his country a new source of opulence and power. But the Genoese rejected this notion as chimerical; they considered it as impossible for a western coast to lead to the Indies. Stung with disappointment and indignation, Columbus retired from Genoa; and, after a series of difficulties, obtained a small fleet from Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. He sailed on the third of August, 1492, on the most adventurous attempt ever undertaken by man, and in the fate of which the inhabitants of two worlds were interested. He was successful; and the consequence was the discovery of America. Soon after, the Portuguese found a passage to the East-Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, by which they carried on an advantageous trade with the inhabitants of the East. Discoveries of this important kind roused the torpid genius of mankind; and improvements were daily made in geography, navigation, and astronomy. New ideas opened to the human mind, the faculties were extended, and advances were continually made in useful and ornamental learning. The art of artillery and engineering were brought to some degree of perfection, and changed intirely the operations of war.

Among the men of genius and learning that flourished in these times, were Sir John Fortescue and Sir Thomas Lyttleton. The former was one of the most learned men of his age: he was lord chief justice of the King's-bench in the reign of Henry VI. and constituted chancellor to that unfortunate prince after Edward IV. had taken possession of the throne. He followed the fortunes of the house of Lancaster, and was many years in exile with queen Margaret, and prince Edward her son. Soon after the decisive battle of Tewksbury, he was thrown into prison, and attainted, with other Lancastrians, but found means to procure his pardon from Edward IV. His celebrated book, "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," was written for the use of prince Edward. His treatise on the "Difference between an absolute and a limited Monarchy," was not published till the year 1714.

Sir Thomas Lyttleton was judge of the Common Pleas, and a knight of the Bath, in the reign of Edward IV. He was the author of the celebrated book of "Tenures or Titles," by which all estates were anciently held in England. The first edition of this work was published at Rouen about the year 1533. Sir Edward Coke's Book of Institutes is a comment on this work.

From the accession of Henry VIII. to the death of Queen Elizabeth.

H E N R Y VIII.

A. D. 1509. THE English, who had long groaned under the avaricious tyranny of Henry VII. considered the accession of his son to the throne as an event pregnant with happiness; so that young Henry ascended the throne with every advantage which nature and fortune could bestow. Amiable in his person and address, in the bloom of youth, blessed with uncommon talents, and possessed of immense wealth, he saw himself at the head of a flourishing kingdom, where the arts and sciences wanted only a liberal benefactor to promote their progress; and as the public tranquillity was secured by a long peace and powerful alliances, the people had already formed the greatest expectations from his distinguished abilities. It was not immediately perceived that his passions would render him a tyrant; nor was he tinctured with the vice of avarice. He was no sooner seated on the throne, than his dispositions appeared to be the reverse of his father: he displayed a liberality that bordered on profusion.

Henry had been educated as an ecclesiastic; there being no hopes of his ever ascending the throne till the death of his elder brother removed the difficulty, and rendered him heir apparent to the English crown. By this means he very early imbibed a taste for literature, particularly for theology, which he ever after cultivated with great attention. This qualified him for the many disputes he afterwards carried on with Luther and the pope; and to this, perhaps, all his measures, with regard to religion, were owing.

But however opposite the dispositions of young Henry were to those of his father, he did not think it necessary to displace those statesmen who had served with fidelity in the preceding reign. His grandmother, the countess of Richmond, was still alive; and as she was highly esteemed for her prudence and virtue, he wisely listened to her advice in the establishment of his new council. It was composed of Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, and lord-chancellor; Fox, bishop of Winchester, secretary and lord privy-seal; Howard, earl of Surry, lord treasurer; Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, lord-steward of the household; lord Herbert, chamberlain; Sir Thomas Lovel, master of the wards, and constable of the Tower; Sir Edward Poinings, knight of the garter, comptroller; Sir Henry Manny, afterwards lord Manny; Sir Thomas Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; and Sir Henry Wyat. These were thoroughly experienced in business; nor had they borne any part of the public odium during the life of the late king.

The gay and spirited disposition of Henry soon changed the aspect of the court: the scenes of economy and avarice now gave way to those of dissipation and profusion. One party of pleasure succeeded another. Feasts, tournaments, and carousals, were exhibited with all the magnificence of that age; and the prodigious treasures amassed by the late king were dissipated in the giddy expences of his successor.

Henry did not, however, forget the complaints of his people. He published a proclamation to encourage complaints against all who had made use of the royal authority to the prejudice of his subjects. The opportunity was embraced with avidity; the spies and informers, who had so long exercised an unbounded tyranny over the kingdom, now felt the weight of justice, and fell victims to the resentment of the public. Empson and Dudley, who had been so often loaded with execrations, were cited before the council, to answer for their conduct. But it was soon found, that however obnoxious they were rendered by their late conduct, they could not be condemned by the laws of their country. Empson artfully observed, that the only crime of which both himself and Dudley were accused, consisted in their having enforced a strict execution of the laws; that they had acted entirely in obedience to the king, to whom the execution of the laws was entrusted by the constitution; that it belonged not to them, who were merely instruments in the hands of the supreme power, what laws were recent or obsolete, expedient or hurtful, since they were all equally valid while they remained unrepealed by the legislature. The council perceived Empson's arguments were unanswerable, and therefore thought proper to commit these obnoxious ministers to the Tower, till a new accusation could be formed against them. After some deliberation, it was determined to accuse them of high-treason. It was said, "That, conscious of the popular odium incurred by their unjust proceedings, they had summoned their friends, while the late king lay on his death-bed, to consult them on the measures necessary to be taken to secure them from the resentment of the public." These measures were construed into a conspiracy to seize the person of the new king, and to take up arms in defence of themselves and their party. This strange accusation, however absurd and improbable, was sufficient to convict them of the crime laid to their charge, and they fell victims to the just resentment of an injured people.

While the public attention was engaged in the prosecution of these obnoxious ministers, the council was employed in deliberating on the expedience of the king's consummating his marriage with Catherine of Arragon. Fox, bishop of Winchester, a zealous prelate, and violently attached to the papal authority, strongly supported the interest of the princess. Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, urged, that it was contrary to a positive command of the Deity himself, for a man to marry his brother's widow, and, consequently, that the pope's dispensation was invalid. Fox opposed to this argument the unlimited authority of Christ's vicar, and that the pope's dispensation was abundantly sufficient. To this weak argument he added others of a much stronger tendency, founded on political motives. He represented the danger of forcing Ferdinand into an alliance with France, and of the two monarchs joining to resent the affront offered to the king of Arragon in the person of his daughter, after she had been so long affianced to Henry. He expatiated on the known virtue, modesty, and noble dispositions of the princess; her affection for the king, the large dowry he brought, and the necessity of forming a close alliance with Spain, Spain, in order to counterbalance the great power of France. These arguments prevailed, and the marriage was accordingly consummated.

But though the bishop of Winchester had been successful with regard to the consummation of Henry's marriage, he soon perceived that his power began to decline. He had acquired such habits of caution and frugality during the preceding reign, that he could not now lay them wholly aside. He remonstrated against the schemes of dissipation and expence pursued by the young monarch, and by that means lost his favour: while Surry, who made his own interest the sole motive of his conduct, was very officious in promoting the liberality, pleasure, and magnificence which now prevailed. Winchester expostulated with him on his remarkable change of conduct, but without effect: Surry derived great advantages from the dissipation of his master, and at the same time engaged him in such a course of idleness, that he became negligent of the affairs of state, and willing to entrust the government to the care of his ministers. Fox was highly exasperated against Surry, and determined to introduce some person who might be a spy upon his actions. He cast his eyes upon Dr. Thomas Woolsey, as a person well qualified to answer his purpose. He was the son of a butcher at Ipswich, but distinguished by his prudence, his talents, and his learning. Woolsey had recommended himself by his address to Henry VII. who had employed him with advantage in some difficult commissions. Nor was it long before the young courtier gained the favour of his master. His insinuating address, his taste for pleasure, and his love of letters, could not fail of rendering him very acceptable to Henry. We shall soon see him at the head of the administration.

A. D. 1510. The wars in Italy still raged with the utmost violence, and attracted the attention of all the princes in Europe. A league had been formed at Cambray between the pope, the emperor and the kings of France and Spain, for stripping the republic of Venice of her territories on the continent. Julius II. that warlike and imperious pontiff, had planned this confederacy. Forgetting the cares of religion, in order to increase the power of the holy see, he scrupled not to involve Italy in all the horrors of war, and deluge, with christian blood, the countries over which he presided as vicar of the Prince of Peace. The French soon reduced the Venetians to extremities, and recovered the territories claimed by the contracting princes. But the pope had no sooner obtained possession of the dominions he pretended to belong to the church, than he determined to break the league of Cambray, and reduce the power of Lewis, which he now considered as too formidable. In order to this, he endeavoured to excite the states of Europe against the French monarch, and was particularly desirous of engaging young Henry in his favour. He sent that monarch a consecrated golden rose, a favour never bestowed by the popes but on their most favourite princes. He engaged Ferdinand to assist him, and entered into a treaty with the Swiss cantons.

Having formed so powerful a confederacy, he attacked the duke of Ferrara, an ally of France. Lewis, who never imagined a design was formed for attacking his territories, made no preparations for repelling the attempts of the enemy; but determining not to abandon his ally, he sent orders to Chamont his general, and governor of Milan, to support the duke with all his forces. Chamont prepared immediately to obey the commands of his sovereign, and hearing that the pontiff was arrived at Boulogne, he resolved to surprize him. He accordingly led his army towards the city, and had he not been amused with some of the pope's envoys, he would, in all probability, have put an end to all the projects of this enterprising pontiff; but instead of pushing the siege with vigour, he listened to proposals offered by Julius, which that artful churchman never intended to perform. This suspension of hostilities furnished an opportunity for a body of Venetian troops to throw themselves into the castle, and Chamont, being destitute of artillery sufficient for taking the fortress, was obliged to abandon the undertaking.

Lewis, after trying every method in his power to bring about a treaty of peace with this imperious pontiff, determined to subdue him by force of arms, and to depose him in a council summoned to meet at Pisa. But no danger could intimidate the old pontiff; he laid siege to Mirandola in person; and tho' he was then seventy years of age, he mounted the trenches, visited the works, encouraged the engineers, and at length entered the breach with the foremost of his forces.

While the pope, worn out with age, was fighting at the head of his forces, Lewis, still in the vigour of life, was debating in his council. He laboured to stir up all the clergy in Europe, and the pope all the soldiers. The general council was summoned to meet at Pisa, where a few cardinals, who were enemies to the pontiff, made their appearance. But this council proved an idle undertaking, while the papal war was very successful. Julius, without suspending for a moment his military operations, fulminated anathemas against the bishops assembled at Pisa.

A. D. 1512. Henry was courted by both parties, but at last, by the instigations of Ferdinand, who had joined the pontiff, declared against France. The glory of serving the pope, and of conquering provinces, excited the ambition of the young monarch; and the parliament readily granted supplies for an enterprise that was agreeable to the people. Ferdinand, always attentive to his own interest, while he seemed to be acting for that of others, persuaded Henry that it would be more for his advantage not to land his troops at Calais, but at Fontenabia, where he might easily make a conquest of Guienne, and where he promised to assist him with a Spanish army. But the real intention of Ferdinand was to turn this force to the acquisition of the kingdom of Navarre. Julius had excommunicated John d'Albert, its present king, as an adherent to the council of Pisa; and the dominions of an excommunicated prince were an object worthy to excite the violence and rapacity of Ferdinand and the catholic.

Henry, who suspected not the designs of Ferdinand, agreed to the proposal. The marquis of Dorset was appointed general of the land forces, which were landed in the province of Guipuscoa, about the middle of June. The English admiral, in his return, made several successful descents on the coast of Britany, and being joined by a squadron of ships commanded by Sir Thomas Knivet, the depredations were continued with advantages. Alarmed at the attempts of the English, the French fleet of thirty-nine ships, was ordered to sail from Brest under the command of Primauger, an admiral of great courage and conduct. The two fleets soon after met, and a furious engagement ensued. At length Primauger's ship was set on fire, and determining not to perish alone, he bore down upon the English admiral, and grappling with her, both ships soon became involved in the same inevitable destruction. This dreadful scene suspended the action between the other ships; they were struck with astonishment at so frightful a scene of horror and confusion. After some time the French ship blew up, and the dreadful explosion destroyed the English. This alarming catastrophe, in which above sixteen hundred men perished, so affected both parties, that the engagement was not renewed; the French retired to Brest, and the English continued cruising in the Channel.

The duke of Alva, who commanded the Spanish forces, having joined the English, preparations were made for opening the campaign. But Dorset, who was no stranger to Ferdinand's intentions, was surprized prized to find, that instead of pursuing the conquest of Guienne, his army moved towards the frontiers of Navarre. The English general complained to Ferdinand, that instead of undertaking the siege of Bayonne, which would open a passage into Guienne, the forces had taken a different rout. Ferdinand replied, that as the king of Navarre was connected with France, he thought it would not be advisable to form the siege of Bayonne, till measures were taken for preventing that prince from cutting off their provisions, by forming a camp between the sea and the mountains of Navarre. Dorset agreed to these proposals, and an English officer was sent to that prince to know his intentions. D'Albert declared that he would observe an exact neutrality, and give no obstruction to the attempts of the English. Ferdinand pretended not to be satisfied with this answer, he insisted that the king of Navarre should join the combined army, or deliver into his hands six of the most considerable places in his dominions, together with his eldest son as an hostage. The artful Spaniard well knew that these terms could not be complied with, and on the return of the messenger with intelligence that the proposal was rejected, orders were sent to the duke of Alva to invade Navarre, and reduce the whole kingdom to subjection. The English general now perceived the interests of his master were to be sacrificed to the ambitious views of the Spaniard, and refused to assist in the reduction of Navarre. He retired to his camp at Fontarabia, resolving there to wait for fresh orders from England. But even his inaction answered the views of Ferdinand. It kept the French army in awe; and by preventing Lewis from assisting d'Albert, the kingdom of Navarre fell into the hands of Ferdinand. The season was too far advanced, and the French had taken too many precautions in putting Bayonne in a proper posture of defence, for Dorset to think of making any progress in the reduction of Guienne: he returned to England without having had an opportunity of leading his forces against the enemy. Henry was highly displeased at the ill success of the enterprize; and Dorset found the utmost difficulty to convince him that the miscarriage was entirely owing to the fraudulent designs of Ferdinand, who was now stiled in Spain, "the wise, the prudent;" in Italy, "the pious;" in France and in England, "the perfidious."

A. D. 1513. But though this war was attended only with disgrace to the English arms, yet it served to weaken France. Lewis was obliged to recall his troops to the defence of his own dominions, and by that means lost all his Italian conquests. Julius triumphed in the disgrace of the French monarch; but he did not long enjoy his good fortune: he paid the debt of nature on the twenty-first of February, and was succeeded in the papal chair by John de Medici, under the appellation of Leo X. one of the greatest princes that ever filled the pontifical seat. He was the patron of arts, and the friend of learning. Desirous of attaching Henry firmly to his interest, he sent him a vessel loaded with hams and wine. The arrival of this vessel, which carried the papal banner, in the Thames, filled the English with exultation, and excited their natural antipathy against France.

The famous Wolsey was now at the head of the English ministry; and perceiving the ardour of Henry for war, he exerted all his abilities to provide an army that might retrieve the martial glory of his countrymen. Hostilities were first commenced at sea, but without any advantage to either of the contending princes. It was on the continent that the decisive blows were intended to be struck. The van of the army, consisting of eight thousand men, was led by the earl of Shrewsbury, assisted by the earl of Derby, the lords Fitzwalter, Hastings, and Cobham, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light horse. This division being landed at Calais, was soon followed by another body of six thousand men, under the command of lord Herbert, chamberlain, attended by the earls of Northumberland and Kent, the lords Audley and Delawar, together with Carew, Curson, and other gentlemen. Henry now prepared to follow his forces; but before his departure, he caused the unfortunate earl of Suffolk to be beheaded. What reasons induced Henry to commit this cruel action, is not absolutely known. The French historians tell us, that it was in obedience to the dying commands of his father; while others think, that Henry, exasperated at the conduct of his brother Edward de la Pole, who had accepted a command in the French service, satiated his vengeance on the unhappy Suffolk.

About the thirtieth of June, Henry landed at Calais with the third division of his army, consisting of twelve thousand men. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, and many others of the principal nobility. But he soon perceived the little reliance he ought to place on the engagements of princes; for among all his allies, the Swiss only performed the conditions of the treaty. The emperor Maximilian had promised to join them with a body of eight thousand men; but though he had received from Henry one hundred and twenty thousand crowns for that purpose, he failed in his engagements. He made some atonement, however, to the English monarch, by joining him, in the Low Countries, with some German and Flemish soldiers, who were of great service. In giving an example of discipline to Henry's new-raised forces. The emperor himself enlisted as a volunteer in the English army, and blushed not to receive an hundred crowns a day for his service. He was, however, treated with the highest respect by Henry, and in reality directed all the operations of the combined army.

The earl of Shrewsbury, and lord Herbert, before the landing of Henry, had formed the siege of Terrouenne, a town situated on the borders of Picardy. The garrison, which consisted of not more than a thousand men, commanded by Teligini and Crequi, made a noble defence. The town was, however, at last reduced to extremities, for want of ammunition and provisions; and Lewis determined, if possible, to send a supply. Eight hundred cavalry were chosen for making this dangerous attempt, each of whom carried behind him a sack of gunpowder and two quarters of bacon. Thus equipped, and headed by Fontrailles, they made a sudden irruption into the English camp, surmounted all resistance, and advanced to the fosse of the town, where each horseman threw down his burden. Then returning on a gallop, they again forced themselves a passage with very little loss.

This insult was, however, soon revenged. Informed that a large body of French horse was approaching, Henry ordered some troops to pass the Lis, and give them battle. The contest was soon decided. The French cavalry, though consisting chiefly of gentlemen who had behaved with the greatest intrepidity in many desperate encounters, were seized with so unaccountable a panic, that they immediately betook themselves to flight, and were pursued by the English. The duke of Longueville, Buffi d'Amboise, Clermont, Imbercourt, the chevalier Bayard, and several other persons of distinction, were taken prisoners in endeavouring to rally their forces. This action is sometimes called the battle of Guinegate, but more frequently the "Battle of the Spurs," because the French that day made more use of their spurs than their swords.

Henry, who was now at the head of an army of fifty thousand men, instead of profiting by this victory, and marching into the heart of France, as he might easily have done, returned to the siege of Terrouenne, while the French were struck with astonishment at this shameful behaviour of their cavalry. They would have been less alarmed, if the whole body had been cut to pieces. They prognosticated a fatal termination to the war with England, and were fearful that Henry would revive the dreadful scenes of Poitiers and Agincourt. But his supine negligence revived their spirits: Terouane soon after surrendered, and Henry invested Tournay, a place always incorporated with France, and the cradle of the French monarchy.

That city was incapable of making any long defence, the garrison being almost destitute of military stores and provisions. Accordingly the place was hardly invested before the garrison offered to capitulate. The terms were accepted, and Henry entered the city in triumph. Sir Edward Poinings was appointed governor, and the bishop's see being then vacant, Henry conferred it on his favourite Wolsey, who immediately took possession of the revenues, which were very considerable.

While Henry was thus engaged in reducing the towns of France, the Swiss entered Burgundy, and laid siege to Dijon, which was in no condition to resist so formidable an army. Ferdinand seemed desirous of taking advantage of the distress of Lewis; whose dominions were now surrounded by enemies. Tremouille, governor of Burgundy, perceived the dangerous situation of his master, and seduced the Swiss into a negotiation. He made no objection to the terms they offered, persuaded that his conduct would be disavowed by Lewis: and the enemy, without making the least enquiry into the powers of that nobleman, agreed to withdraw their army, on the promise of being paid four hundred thousand crowns. The retreat of the Swiss accelerated the departure of Henry. He arrived in England on the seventeenth of October, highly satisfied with the success of his first campaign.

While the English monarch was employed in reducing the towns of France, James IV. of Scotland, who had declared for Lewis, was ravaging the northern parts of Northumberland, at the head of fifty thousand men. He made himself master of the castles of Norham, Etal, Werk, Ford, and other fortresses of less importance. The earl of Surry, who commanded the English forces, marched into the northern counties to stop the ravages of the invaders. His army consisted of about twenty-six thousand men, five thousand of which had been sent over from the army in France. The Scots were encamped on the high grounds near Chivior hills, in a very advantageous situation. The river Till ran in their front; nor could their camp be approached but by one narrow pass, which was defended by their artillery.

Surry, perceiving that it would be madness to attack the enemy in their present situation, dispatched an herald to the Scottish monarch, offering to meet him in the plain of Milfield, appointing a day for the combat, and inviting him to try the valour of his forces on equal ground. But the answer he received was far from being satisfactory, and he determined to have recourse to a stratagem, in order, if possible, to draw the Scots from their advantageous situation. He made a feint of marching towards Berwick, in order to retaliate the ravages of the enemy, and cut off their provisions.

This motion occasioned a council of war to be summoned in the Scottish camp, where an old nobleman, who had learned prudence from experience, advised James to return immediately to Scotland with his booty. He observed, that enough had been done to fulfil his engagements with France; that it would be imprudent to hazard a battle with the English in their own country; and that, in serving France, Scotland was not to be neglected merely to please the French ambassador, who was desirous of engaging others in the most dangerous enterprises, in order to relieve his master from his present distress. But James listened not to this prudent advice; he determined to give battle to the English the first favourable opportunity. The army was accordingly put in motion, the huts in which the soldiers had been quartered were set on fire, and the Scots descended in disorder from the hills. Surry observed the precipitate decampment of the Scottish army, and the smoke of the huts concealing his motions from the enemy, he passed the Till with his van-guard and train of artillery, at the bridge of Twifel, while the rest of his army crossed the stream at a ford farther up the river.

As soon as the smoke was a little evaporated, James perceived that a battle was inevitable, and that he had now lost his advantageous situation. He immediately drew up his army in three divisions. The right was commanded by the earl of Huntley, assisted by lord Hume; the left by the earls of Lenox and Argyle; and the center by the king in person: a fourth body under the earl of Bothwell, formed a corps de reserve. The English army was divided into two lines: the main body of the first was led by lord Howard; the right wing by Sir Edmund Howard, and the left by Sir Marmaduke Constable. The main body of the second line was commanded by the earl of Surry himself; the right wing by lord Dacres, and the left by Sir Edward Stanley. In this position the armies approached each other, and met in Floudon field. The battle was begun by the earl of Huntley, who charged with such fury, that he broke the left wing of the English, and drove them off the field. But the same success did not attend the other commanders: they could not support the shock of the English; and Huntley at his return found the Scottish army in great disorder. Elated with the success of the wing commanded by Huntley, the division under Lenox and Argyle, had broke their ranks, and notwithstanding the remonstrances of La Motte, the French ambassador, had rushed headlong on the enemy, imagining themselves sure of victory. But they soon found their mistake. Sir Edward Stanley's division stood firm; while Dacres, who commanded in the second line, wheeling about during the action, attacked them so furiously in the rear, that they could not sustain the shock; the greater part of them were cut to pieces, and the rest escaped by a disorderly flight. This misfortune did not, however, intimidate the divisions under the king and Bothwell. Animated by the valour of their leaders, they still made head against the English; and forming themselves into a circle continued the engagement till night put an end to the slaughter. The slain on both sides were nearly equal, being about five thousand men: but the morning soon discovered that the two armies were now unequal. The English had lost very few officers, while the whole flower of the Scottish nobility were slain. The king himself was missing; but whether he fell by the sword of the English, or by the poniard of an assassin, is not known. A body supposed to be that of the Scottish monarch, was found among the dead, and conveyed to London in a leaden coffin, where it remained some time unburied, as James lay under the sentence of excommunication, on account of his confederacy with France, and opposition to the Holy See. Henry, however, obtained his absolution from the pontiff, and the body was accordingly interred.

Such was the event of the battle of Floudon; and Henry had now a fair opportunity of insisting on his own terms with Scotland, perhaps of conquering the whole country. But he generously listened to the request of his sister, who, on the death of her husband, became regent of the kingdom of Scotland during the minority of her son, and concluded with her a treaty of peace. At the same time he created the earl of Surry, duke of Norfolk; Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk; Charles Somerset, lord Herbert, earl of Worcester; and Sir Edward Stanley, lord Monteagle; Margaret of York, daughter to the duke of Clarence, obtained the title of countess of Salisbury, as heiress to her brother the earl of Warwick, beheaded by Henry VII. Wolsey, who was both the favourite and minister of Henry, was promoted to the bishopric of Lincoln, and the pope permitted him to retain the revenues of the bishopric of Tournay.

an honourable peace, the sword of destruction. He appeared Leo X. by renouncing the council of Pisa, which had been transferred to Lyons; and the pontiff, in return, took off the excommunication that had been denounced against him and his kingdom. He offered to Ferdinand to give in marriage to either of his grandchildren, his daughter Renee, and to cede with her his claim to the duchy of Milan; and he engaged the emperor Maximilian in the same views, and that prince was easily induced to consent to proposals that were advantageous to his family. Henry was not averse to a peace; the perfidious conduct of his allies had convinced him that they were more intent on promoting their own interests, than in fulfilling their promises. A negotiation was therefore opened between the two princes, and a peace soon after concluded on the following conditions: That Tournay should remain in the hands of the English; that Richard de la Pole should be banished to Metz, and reside there on a pension assigned by Lewis; that Henry should receive a million of crowns, being the arrears due by treaty to his father and himself; and that Lewis should marry the princess Mary, Henry's sister, who should bring four hundred thousand crowns as her portion, and enjoy as large a jointure as even the former queen of France, who was heiress of Brittany. It was also stipulated, that the two princes should mutually assist each other with troops in case either of them was attacked by an enemy. The princess Mary, one of the most beautiful and accomplished women of the age, was then in her twentieth year, and Lewis in his fifty-sixth. He met her at Abbeville, where the nuptials were celebrated with the utmost magnificence; but his passion for this amiable princess cost him his life. His constitution was too much impaired to withstand the excesses of pleasure into which he plunged. He died in less than three months after his marriage, and left his people to bewail his loss with the tears of affection. He was sincerely beloved by his subjects, and deservedly acquired the honourable appellation of "Father of his Country." His young queen soon after married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1515. While Wolsey was conducting the negotiation for a peace with France, the archbishop of York was poisoned at Rome by his chaplain, in revenge for a blow the prelate had given him. Information was immediately sent to Henry, informing him of this catastrophe, and that the pope had determined to keep the see of York vacant, till the king's pleasure should be known. He did not wait long, Henry immediately conferred it upon Wolsey, and the pontiff confirmed his election. That celebrated churchman now governed the kingdom, tho' he affected only to follow the inclinations of Henry. He seemed to be only the companion of his pleasures, but held in reality the reins of government. Preferments were heaped upon him with unbounded profusion. He was not only archbishop of York, but also bishop of Durham and Lincoln, and farmed, on very easy terms, the bishoprics of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, which were enjoyed by Italians who resided abroad. He soon after obtained a cardinal's hat, which augmented at once his pride and ostentation. His household was composed of eight hundred persons, among whom were several of the nobility. He was the first clergyman who wore silk and gold. But still his ambition was not satisfied; he wanted the great seal of England, then in the hands of Warham, archbishop of Canterbury. The primate was a person of great prudence and conduct; he had never engaged in any court intrigues; nor even gave offence to any party. Wolsey therefore did not attempt to deprive him of his post of chancellor, which perhaps he could not have effected, but took every opportunity of mortifying him, in order to provoke him to resign.

In order to this he prevailed upon the pope to appoint him legate a latere, which gave him precedence in the province of Canterbury; and being thus empowered to have the legantine cross borne before him; he caused also that of York to be carried with it in an erect position. This privilege had formerly occasioned violent disputes between the two metropolitans; and was at last decided by the king's laying his express command on the archbishops of York, not to have the cross carried before them in the province of Canterbury. Warham remonstrated with Wolsey on his conduct in this particular, but without effect; and the primate being of a peaceable disposition, chose rather to retire to his see, and employ himself wholly to the duties of his office, than remain at court, where he was every day affronted. Accordingly he resigned the great seal into the hands of Henry, who, two days after, committed it to the custody of Wolsey. Fox, bishop of Winchester, who had so long directed the affairs of government, and even introduced Wolsey to the king's favour; could not bear to find himself neglected. He accordingly obtained leave to retire to his bishopric; and at leaving the council-board he told the king, that "he hoped he would not suffer the servant to be greater than the master." "Fear not, my good lord bishop," replied Henry, "it shall be my care that subjects shall obey, and not command."

Francis I. who ascended the throne of France on the death of Lewis XII. was a prince of great courage, and wanted only the talent of discretion to render him superior to all the princes of Europe. He renewed the treaty made by his predecessor with Henry, and, induced by the ardour of conquest, he passed into Italy. His design was to conquer the duchy of Milan, which Lewis XII. had lost, and to wrest it once more from the unhappy family of Sforza. He was supported by the Venetians, who wanted at least to recover the Veronese, of which they had been stripped by the emperor Maximilian. His opposers were pope Leo X. an active and intriguing prince, and Maximilian, worn out with age and infirmities: but his most dangerous enemies were the Swiss, irritated against France, by the refusal of Lewis XII. to fulfil the treaty concluded before Dijon, and inflamed with the harangues of Matthew Schaner, cardinal of Sion. They had assumed the title of "Defenders of the popes, and protectors of princes;" and indeed for the last ten years this appellation was not merely imaginary.

The French monarch on his march to Milan continued to negotiate with that nation. Practised in the art of dissimulation, which they had learned from the cardinal of Sion, they amused the king with empty promises, till they received advice that the military chest of France was arrived, when they descended from their mountains into the plain, though destitute of cavalry, and opposed themselves to the progress of the French arms. A dreadful battle ensued at Marignan near Milan. The victory was contested with a perseverance hitherto unknown; and it required all the heroic valour of Francis to inspire his troops with courage to support themselves against the desperate assaults of these mountaineers. After a bloody action in the evening, night and darkness parted the combatants. The king slept on the carriage of a cannon within fifty paces of a Swiss battalion. As soon as the dawn appeared, the action was renewed with redoubled fury; and it was not till the Swiss had lost their bravest troops, that they could be prevailed upon to retire. The field was strewed with twenty thousand slain on both sides; and the old marshal Trivulcio, who had been present at eighteen pitched battles, used to call this "The Battle of the Giants."

The victory of Marignan was followed by the reduction of the Milanese. Both the pope and the Swiss became allies of Francis. He compelled Maximilian to restore the Veronese to the Venetians; and procured for Leo X. the duchy of Urbino, which still belongs to the church. Sforza himself, tired with with the vicissitudes of fortune, disgusted with the tyranny of the Swiss, and desirous of privacy and repose, put himself into the hands of Francis; and after stipulating for an annual pension of thirty thousand ducats, resigned his pretensions to the duchy of Milan, and retired into France.

The glory acquired by Francis in this expedition excited the jealousy of the English monarch; and it was the interest of Wolsey to cherish this discord. The cardinal enjoyed the revenues of the bishopric of Tournay; but saw with regret, that the titular bishop of that see was protected at the court of France. The resentment and disgust of a minister are too often sufficient to kindle the flames of discord between two nations. An ambassador was sent to Maximilian, to engage him to renew the war in Italy. He made no difficulty of complying; but the enterprize was unsuccessful: the Germans were driven out of Italy. This unfortunate expedition disappointed Henry and Wolsey in their designs to lessen the power of France.

A.D. 1516. In the mean time, Charles V. the successor of Ferdinand the Catholic, who was born with superior talents, and who had been carefully educated, seemed desirous, though very young, to give disturbance to the French monarch; but thought it prudent to conceal his real design till his authority in his new dominions was sufficiently established. Francis appeared disposed to take advantage of this opportunity; but Charles diverted the storm, by making him an offer which gained his friendship. He engaged to marry the daughter of Francis, then an infant of a year old; to receive, as her dowry, all her father's pretensions to the kingdom of Naples; to pay him an hundred thousand crowns a year till the consummation of the marriage; and to give the king of Navarre satisfaction with regard to his dominions.

A.D. 1518. But notwithstanding this alliance, the increasing power of Charles gave Francis great uneasiness; and he was desirous of gaining the confidence and friendship of the English monarch; and took the only method of succeeding, by assiduously labouring to gain the affections of Wolsey. He flattered his pride, affected to consult him in his most secret affairs, and endeavoured to persuade him that he considered his directions as so many oracles. As soon as he perceived he had gained the cardinal's favour, Bonnivert, admiral of France, was sent ambassador to the court of London. That able politician addressed himself with so much art to the passions of the haughty cardinal, that he negotiated a treaty, in which the restitution of Tournay was one of the articles. It was stipulated, that the princess Mary of England should espouse the dauphin, though they were both infants; that Tournay should be her dowry; that Francis should pay Henry six hundred thousand crowns, as a reimbursement of his expences in building a citadel at Tournay; and that he should pay Wolsey an annual pension of twelve thousand livres, as an equivalent for the revenues of his bishopric.

While these negotiations were carrying on between the courts of France and England, Germany was agitated with those religious disputes which produced the Reformation. Leo X. by the encouragement he had given to learning, furnished arms against himself. Cardinal Pole complimented him upon his success in the propagation of the sciences; but at the same time reminded him, that it might be of dangerous consequence to make mankind too learned. The pontiff, however, proceeded in the noble course he had begun; and, by his magnificence, gave occasion to that remarkable revolution that happened in the Christian world during his pontificate. His predecessor, Julius II. under whose reign painting and architecture were so greatly improved, was desirous that Rome should be adorned with a structure superior to that of St. Sophia at Constantinople. He had the courage to undertake what he never could finish. Leo X. was extremely fond of this noble project; but it required prodigious sums of money, and his magnificence had exhausted his treasury. He had therefore recourse to the sale of indulgences, in order to fill his coffers, and be enabled to carry on his intended design. A favourable opportunity offered. The Turks had just defeated the Mamelucks in Egypt, and it was apprehended that they would now turn their whole force against the Christians.

It was still believed that the pope, out of the inexhaustible treasure of the church, arising from the merits of Christ and the works of supererogation of the saints, had a power of distributing indulgences on certain conditions prescribed by him, to the greatest and most profligate of mortals, for a plenary remission of sin. These indulgences were at first supposed to extend only to the relaxation of penances and ecclesiastical discipline. Urban II. in the beginning of the eleventh century, was the first that granted a full remission of all sins to those who should take up arms for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Infidels. This practice was continued by his successors; some of whom extended the benefit of their indulgences to such persons, who being unwilling, or unable to carry arms in person, maintained a soldier in their room. At length, these spiritual favours were distributed to those who took the field against heretics, or enemies to the Romish church. Great sums were raised by these means, but seldom applied to the purposes intended. The Augustins, as being most in favour with the lower class of people, were made the brokers of this scandalous commerce. Each friar, or agent, was entrusted with a set of indulgences of all prices, of all denominations, in all cases, and for all sins: and the better to collect the money arising from the sale of this pontifical merchandize, all Christendom was divided into different departments, in each of which a certain number of these priests were commissioned to recommend and enforce the utility of indulgences.

But Leo X. who now attempted to fill his treasury by this species of traffic, employed the Dominicans, who distinguished themselves by exaggerating the benefits to be derived from indulgences. The Augustin friars were highly affronted because this occupation was not, as usual, entrusted to them; especially as they had some time since been employed for the same purpose in Saxony, and had thence acquired both reputation and profit. Martin Luther, an Augustin friar, and professor of divinity at Wittenberg, stimulated to revenge, was loud in his declamations against the church of Rome. He was a person of great learning, genius, and spirit, inflexible and opinative; and there was no want of abuses whereon to found his invectives. A prodigious number of vain and superstitious ceremonies had been introduced into the exercise of religion: divinity was corrupted with subtilties: the clergy were given up to indolence and pleasure; and the court of Rome had been guilty of numberless frauds and usurpations. Religion, often prostituted, had become a cloak for the most fordid rapacity, and the most unpardonable ambition. An incessant cry of reformation resounded from all quarters, and Luther knew how to take advantage of it. He, however, confined himself, in his first writings, to expose the doctrine of indulgences, and, perhaps, had then no other design. But he went farther than he at first intended, as is the case in all disputes, and in almost all transactions. It has been said, and with an air of probability, that the best method of inducing this zealous reformer to change his opinion, would have been to have sent him a cardinal's hat; but the contempt in which he was held by the church of Rome, proved fatal to her power.

Luther no longer kept any measures with the pontiff. He exhorted all princes to throw off the papal yoke: he railed against private masses; and met with the greater applause, as he inveighed against the

the public sale of them. His writings, full of zeal and fury, spread over Europe; and were the more attended to, as he supported his opinions from scripture; and other ancient writings of the Christian church. The doctrines he inculcated were flattering to the princes of Europe, because they furnished them with a pretence for throwing off the pope's authority, and for enriching themselves with the wealth of the ecclesiastics. They flattered the vulgar by their novelty, and by the lessons they taught of equality and liberty; and by the rigour and austerity they inculcated, they served to excite chimerical ideas of perfection, almost as seducing to self-love as the tenet of a total relaxation of manners.

The Dominicans, supported by the pope's nuncios in Germany, caused his books to be burnt. The pontiff thundered out a new bull against him; but Luther, now protected by the princes of Germany, was not to be intimidated: he even ordered the pope's bull and the decretals to be burnt in the public market-place of Wirtemberg.

During these disputes in Germany, the English were cultivating with avidity the blessing of peace. The arts found encouragement; trade was improved; manufactures were carried on with success. Cardinal Wolsey made the noblest use of his power; he exerted it for the good of his country. His post of chancellor placed him at the fountain of justice, and never was it better administered. He was particularly careful to punish perjury, the worst of crimes: he was a firm supporter of the poor, and enforced several excellent laws for the protection of the mercantile and industrious part of the people. We have already observed, that he was a great friend to literature. At this time the English had very little learning, and were wholly destitute of taste. Wolsey saw this, and laboured assiduously to improve the one, and introduce the other. He spared no pains to discover persons of literary accomplishments, nor thought any reward too great to bestow upon them. He employed no ministers but such as were scholars; and under his administration the dignified offices of the law, the church, and the state, were filled with men whose literary merit was their only recommendation. He also founded lectures at Oxford for the improvement of learning; and Henry very readily gave his countenance to the noble and patriotic views of his favourite.

A. D. 1519. The death of the emperor Maximilian recalled the attention of Wolsey from his literary pursuits. Francis I. and Charles V. declared themselves candidates for the imperial throne. These competitors were worthy of each other: the former was distinguished by his candour, his generosity, and his valour; the latter by his prudence, his discretion, and his policy. Henry used all his interest to support the election of Charles; and by his assistance he was elected by a majority of one voice among the electors. The addition of the imperial crown seemed to have placed Charles on the summit of human grandeur. He before possessed the dominions of Spain, those belonging to the house of Austria, Burgundy, and Navarre, besides his vast acquisitions in the New World.

These two great rivals had contended for the imperial throne without discovering the least signs of personal enmity; but the preference given to the one could not fail of being disagreeable to the other. Henry was courted by both these princes; and he might have held the balance of power between them, had his policy been equal to his strength. But a monarch who is perpetually the dupe of his own passions, cannot pursue, with the requisite steadiness, the interests of his crown.

A. D. 1520. The character of Henry was well known to Francis, and he hoped to be able to gain his friendship and confidence by familiar conversation: he therefore solicited an interview near Calais. Wolsey, fond of displaying his riches, magnificence and power, seconded the request of the monarch; and Henry, who was equally fond of pomp and honour, consented to the proposal. Charles was alarmed at this intended interview, and determined, if possible, to prevent its consequences: but he well knew, that unless he could gain Wolsey over to his interest, all his attempts to procure the favour of Henry would be in vain. The cardinal now directed all the affairs of government; he had no competitor in the cabinet. Nor was his pomp less remarkable than his power: he celebrated masques with all the state and magnificence of the Roman pontiff: he was served by bishops; and even earls and dukes presented him with the water and the towel. His dress was superbly magnificent: he wore regal vestments; his shoes were of silver gilt, set with pearls and precious stones. When he went abroad, two large crosses of massy silver, the legantine and that of York, were carried before him by two tall priests; together with two pole-axes, two pillars of massy silver, golden cushions, and a train of stately horses. Nor was he content with the great power, wealth, and authority he enjoyed in England, while there was one degree of ecclesiastical dignity to which he had not attained. He already began to concert measures for obtaining the papal throne. He established a legantine court, whose arbitrary authority resembled that of the inquisition. Though remarkable himself for the licentiousness of his manners, Wolsey became a rigid reformer of the actions of the laity; and what is, perhaps, still more singular, he joined with him, as a judge in that court, a man whom he himself, as chancellor, had condemned for perjury. The whole kingdom dreaded his power; and his vanity rose to such a height, that he considered even the archbishop of Canterbury as far beneath him. That prelate having wrote a letter to him, in which he subscribed himself, "Your loving brother." Wolsey complained of his presumption. The primate, when informed of the offence he had given, said coolly, "Know ye not that this man is intoxicated with prosperity?" But despotic exertions, when applied against the liberty of men's lives and manners, are particularly offensive. The complaints of the people at last reached the ears of the sovereign: he discovered his dissatisfaction, and Wolsey set bounds to his authority: the decisions of his court were made with more care and deliberation.

Such was the situation of Wolsey, when Charles V. in order to procure an interview with Henry, previous to that concerted with Francis I. landed at Dover. Wolsey was immediately dispatched to compliment his Imperial Majesty; and the next day he was met by Henry in person, who conducted him to Canterbury, where he was entertained with the utmost pomp and splendour. Charles paid his court to Wolsey in the most artful manner; and promised him his assistance in procuring the papacy, whenever there should happen a vacancy in the pontifical throne. There was, however, little appearance of this promise being claimed. Leo X. was a young man, and likely to fill the chair of St. Peter when Wolsey was no more. It soothed, however, the ambition of that powerful prelate, who, in consequence, devoted himself solely to the interest of the emperor.

The very day that Charles left England, Henry passed over to Calais, with his queen, and the whole court. Francis, attended in the same manner, came to Ardres, a small town a few miles distant from Calais. The interviews were at first carried on with remarkable precaution; the number of guards on each side were carefully counted, and every step was scrupulously measured and adjusted. Francis, whose soul was above distrust, determined to break through such idle ceremonies: he visited the English monarch without guards or attendants; and Henry, desirous to be excelled in so noble an instance of confidence, followed the example. From that moment they visited each other without the least precaution; a generous disdain of suspicion supplied the use of precaution. They passed their time in feasts and tournaments, where they respectively distinguished themselves by their dexterity and address in those martial diversions; but they parted without entering into any serious business.

Though the emperor received daily information from the cardinal, of what passed at this interview, he was very uneasy with regard to the event. He came to Gravelines, where he was met by Henry, and the most cordial assurances of friendship and esteem passed between the two monarchs. At the same time, the emperor renewed his promises of assisting Wolsey in obtaining the papacy, and put him immediately in possession of the revenues belonging to the bishoprics of Bajadox and Palencia in Castile; an acquisition which rendered the revenues of Wolsey nearly equal to those of the crown itself.

A. D. 1521. But notwithstanding all the endeavours of Henry to prevent any ill consequences resulting from the enmity that had been for some time visible between Charles and Francis, it was not long before the sparks of that fire which was to extend its flames through all Europe were visible. The French sent an army into Navarre to re-place the family of d'Albert on the throne of that kingdom. Had the French general confined himself to the reduction of Navarre, his conduct could not have been considered as a breach of the peace between Charles and Francis; but he had no sooner subdued that country, than, finding the kingdom of Spain itself was in the utmost disorder from an insurrection of the people, he thought the opportunity too favourable to be neglected, and immediately laid siege to Logrogno in Castile. The Castilians were now convinced of their folly; the appearance of a foreign enemy put a period to their domestic dissensions; they attacked the French with so much fury, that they drove them from their intrenchments, and even expelled them from Navarre. Robert de la Marck, duke of Bouillon, had the imprudence to attack the emperor's dominions in the Low Countries; and Charles, not doubting but that Robert was instigated by Francis, raised a powerful army, and openly commenced hostilities against the French monarch.

Henry affected to observe an exact neutrality; and the two monarchs, having satisfied their revenge by committing the most dreadful ravages and devastations on the territories of each other, carried their complaints to Henry, as the proper arbiter between them. Conferences were accordingly opened at Calais; but Charles, who depended on the favour of Wolsey, demanded possession of Burgundy, and required to be freed from the homage which his ancestors had paid for Flanders and Artois. The emperor well knew that these proposals would be rejected; he made them with that intention, and, it is said, with the approbation of Wolsey. But however that be, the conferences were broke off, and the cardinal of York soon after made a journey to Bruges, where he was received by the emperor with the same state, magnificence and respect, as if he had been the king of England himself. And he concluded, in the name of his master, an offensive alliance with the pope and the emperor against France.

Soon after the return of Wolsey, he commenced a prosecution against the duke of Buckingham, constable of England, the first nobleman both for family and fortune in the kingdom, who had unfortunately given the cardinal some cause of disgust. He was descended by a female line from the duke of Gloucester, son of Edward III. and being infatuated with the whims of judicial astrology, and the vain predictions of a visionary monk, he had flattered himself with the hopes of one day succeeding to the crown, and even meditated some project against the life of the king. He was tried by a jury of his peers, and declared guilty. But as his crime was rather founded on imprudence than malice, the execution of the sentence was generally imputed to the malice and revenge of the cardinal.

The religious disputes in Germany still continued, and several of the princes had already declared in favour of Luther's reformation. England also, where there were still a great many Lollards, who inculcated nearly the same tenets, would also have followed the German princes, had not the government firmly opposed the doctrines of the Wirtemberg professor. Capricious fate, which sports with the affairs of the world, so ordered it, that Henry himself should be engaged in this dispute. He had been strictly educated in an attachment to the court of Rome, and had contracted an aversion to Luther, because he had spoken disrespectfully of Thomas Aquinas, his favourite author. Vanity and resentment, more than zeal for religion, induced Henry to become an author, and to combat the doctrines of the German monk. The book was soon finished and sent to Rome, where it was received with rapture by the pope, who bestowed the title of "Defenders of the Faith" upon Henry and his successors. Luther, who made no difference between noble and ignoble writers, soon wrote an answer to Henry, and treated him with all the acrimony of stile, to which, in the course of his dispute, he had been so long accustomed. The controversy now became more illustrious by Henry's entering the lists; it engaged still more the attention of mankind; and the Lutheran party acquired daily new converts in every part of Europe. It became a matter of competition to insult, with most indecency, the pope and the church. They called the pontiff antichrist, denominated his communion the scarlet whore, and gave to Rome the appellation of Babylon; expressions which however applied, were to be found in the scriptures, and therefore better calculated to act on the ignorant multitude than the most solid arguments.

Luther's cause found very few supporters in Italy. That ingenious nation, wholly intent upon intrigues and pleasures, took no share in these troubles. The Spaniards, notwithstanding their learning kept themselves quiet. The French, though they have the sensibility of those nations with a stronger passion for novelties, were a long time before they engaged in these disputes. It is a great problem whether Charles V. ought to have embraced or opposed the reformation. By throwing off the yoke of Rome, he would at once have taken ample revenge for all the injuries which the papal tiaræ had offered to the imperial crown, upwards of four hundred years; but, on the other hand, he would have been in danger of losing Italy. He was obliged to keep fair with the pope, who was to join him against Francis I. Besides, the inhabitants of his hereditary dominions were all catholics. At length it became absolutely necessary for him to declare himself either for or against the reformation; he chose the latter, tho' perhaps he really thought some of Luther's opinions were well grounded.

Charles summoned that reformer to come and give an account of his doctrine before the imperial diet at Worms. Luther, having obtained the emperor's safe conduct, made no scruple to appear, though he exposed himself to the same fate as John Huss; but this assembly being composed of princes, he trusted to their honour. He spoke before the emperor and diet, and defended his tenets with great resolution. It is said, that Charles V. was solicited by Alexander, the pope's nuncio, to order Luther to be seized, notwithstanding his safe conduct; as Sigismund had delivered up John Huss without paying any regard to public faith: but that Charles made answer, "he did not chuse to have cause to blush like Sigismund."

A little after this dispute with Luther, Leo X. paid the debt of nature in the flower of his age, and in the ninth year of his pontificate. He was a prince well qualified by his sound judgment, moderation and temper, to have retarded the progress of the reformation, which now made a very rapid progress. He was succeeded in the papal throne by Adrian VI. who had been tutor to Charles, the present emperor. This pontiff was a person of great integrity, candour, dour, and simplicity of manners; but the prejudices of the reformers were so violent against the church, that he rather hurt the cause by his imprudent exercise of those virtues. He frankly confessed, that many abominable and detestable practices prevailed in the court of Rome.

A. D. 1522. Wolsey was not without hopes of being at this time chosen to fill the vacant chair, and had actually, at different scrutinies, nine, twelve, and nineteen voices. He, however, lost his election; but the advanced age, and numerous infirmities of Adrian, still allowed him to hope, that he should soon be able to satisfy his ambition. Charles V. never intended to place Wolsey in St. Peter's chair. He was desirous of having a pope who would be wholly at his devotion; and he was too well acquainted with the imperious temper of the cardinal of York, to think he would ever be submissive to the will of any person whatever. But in order to dissipate the chagrin of that haughty minister, he paid a new visit to the court of England; where, besides flattering the vanity of the king and cardinal, he repeated to Wolsey all the promises he had formerly made him of seconding his pretensions to the papal throne. The insinuating address of Charles produced the desired effect; Wolsey concealed his resentment, the late treaty was renewed, and it was determined in the English council to declare war against France.

Clarenceux, king at arms, was accordingly sent to the French court, with a declaration, that his master looked upon Francis as the first aggressor, and therefore found himself under a necessity of taking part with the emperor. The bloody standard of war was now displayed; the ambassadors on both sides were recalled; the effects of the merchants were seized in both countries; and Henry fitted out a strong fleet for making prizes of the enemy's ships, and protecting the English commerce. The command of this fleet was given to the earl of Surry, who was now made lord high admiral of England; and the emperor also created him high admiral of his dominions. Surry, after taking some towns in Britany, landed at Calais, and laid siege to Hesden, but was not able to take the place.

The allies were, however, more fortunate in Italy, where the pope was entirely in their interest. A little before the death of Leo X. the artful cardinal of Sion found means to corrupt the Swiss in the French pay, and to bring them over to the interest of the allies, who were by that means vastly superior to the French army. Prosper Colonna, the pope's general, passed the Adda, and surprised Milan, where he had for some time held a correspondence with several of the principal inhabitants. This was followed by the reduction of Pavia, Lodi, Parma, Placentia, and several other places in the Milanese.

A. D. 1523. The duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, having renewed the ancient league with France, now made preparations for invading the northern counties of England. The earl of Surry was sent with an army to prevent his design. Surry entered Scotland, where he committed the most dreadful ravages, burnt the town of Jedburgh, with several villages and castles in that neighbourhood, and returned to Newcastle. Albany now approached the English borders, and sent a herald to Surry, offering to give him battle; but Surry telling him that he should never decline an engagement, though he did not chuse to follow the counsel of an enemy, Albany passed the Tweed, and invested the castle of Werk, with a part of his army. Sir William Lisle, the governor, knowing that the fortress was in no condition to support a long siege, made a desperate sally upon the enemy, and drove them from the works, with the loss of three hundred men. This so intimidated the Scots, that they returned into their own country, and a truce for one year was concluded between the two kingdoms.

The war with Scotland had prevented the army from passing over to Calais before the middle of August. The duke of Suffolk was appointed commander; and on his arrival at St. Omer, he was joined by three thousand foot, and five hundred horse, in the Imperial service. It was now determined to march along the banks of the Somme, and, if possible, to provoke the enemy to a decisive engagement: but the French had learned prudence from past misfortunes; they contented themselves with harassing the van of the English army with flying parties; and depended on the strength of their frontier garrisons, and the advanced season of the year, to prevent the English from taking up their winter quarters in their country.

They were not deceived: for though the duke of Suffolk made himself master of Bray, Montdidier, Roye, and several other considerable places; and even advanced within eleven leagues of Paris, he found it would be impossible for him to canton his troops in the places he had conquered, as the duke of Vendome lay in Paris with a large body of troops, and the marshal Tremouille was forming another army by draughts from the garrisons of Picardy. He was therefore obliged to return to Calais, in order to put his army into winter quarters; but before he reached that fortress, many of his soldiers perished by the inclemency of the weather. In consequence of this retreat, most of the places he had taken during the campaign fell again into the hands of the French. Nor had Charles any better success in the attempt he made, at the same time, upon Gascony. His forces invested Bayonne; but the French general, Leutrec, made such a noble defence, that the Spaniards, after ravaging the adjacent country, were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

These miscarriages animated the French to exert themselves against the powerful alliance that was formed against their country; and, in all probability, Francis would have been able to have supported himself against all the efforts of his enemies, had not the constable of Bourbon, the most able of all his generals, persecuted by the hatred of the duchess of Angouleme, the king's mother, sacrificed to his resentment his duty and the love of his country, and entered into the service of Charles V. He was immediately created generalissimo of the emperor's armies, and marched into the dutchy of Milan, which the French had again invaded under admiral Bonnivet, his greatest enemy. A general thoroughly acquainted with the French troops, their strength and weakness, must have been of considerable advantage to Charles: but there were other circumstances still more in his favour. Most of the princes of Italy were in his interest. The people hated the French government; and he was assisted by the best generals in Europe, particularly the marquis of Pescara, Lannoy, and John of Medicis, names still famous in Europe.

Bonnivet was but an indifferent soldier, and a worse statesman. He crossed the Alps at the head of thirty-three thousand men, and made himself master of Novaro, and some other places of less importance in Italy; and had he marched directly to Milan, he might, perhaps, have recovered that city for his master; but he lost so much time in treating with the inhabitants, that the constable of Bourbon had an opportunity of putting the place into a posture of defence. The rest of the campaign was spent in several fruitless attempts upon Cremona, and other places, none of which he was able to reduce. The Italian generals saw his inabilities, and took care to cut off his provisions; so that Bonnivet was obliged to retire into Piedmont, where he put his army into winter quarters.

During these transactions, pope Adrian VI. paid the debt of nature; and Clement VI. of the Medicean family, was elected in his place, by the interest of the imperial party. Wolsey was now convinced of the insincerity of the emperor; and justly concluded, that he must never hope to mount the papal throne by his interest. He, however, dissembled his resentment, congratulated the new pope on his election, and applied for a continuation of the legantine powers he had enjoyed under the two last pontiffs. Clement well knew the necessity of maintaining the friendship of this imperious minister, and not only granted his request, but sent him a commission for life; a very unusual concession, and by which Wolsey obtained the whole papal authority in England. He, however, made a noble use of this extensive power. He erected two colleges, one at Oxford, and another at Ipswich. He invited learned men from every part of Europe, to fill the chairs of these colleges; and, in order to bestow endowments on them, he suppressed some of the lesser monasteries, and distributed the monks into other convents. These proceedings were countenanced at Rome: there was now an immediate necessity for learned men to defend the church against the forcible attacks of the reformers.

A. D. 1524. Bonnivet, the French general in Italy, having given offence to the Swiss by his haughty carriage, these hardy mountaineers abandoned the French army, and returned to their own country. Deserted by these forces, Bonnivet saw the necessity of a retreat. He left his camp, and was followed by the allied army. A sharp action ensued, in which the greater part of Bonnivet's rear was cut to pieces. The chevalier Bayard was mortally wounded in this contest: he was considered as the model of soldiers and men of honour; and obtained the title of the "Knight without fear, and without reproach." When this brave gentleman could no longer support himself on horseback, he ordered his attendants to set him under a tree, and turn his face towards the enemy, that he might die in that posture. Every person seemed to share in his misfortunes. The soldiers, as they passed, dropped a tear; and the allied generals, and among the rest the constable of Bourbon, came round him, and expressed their concern for his present condition. "Pity not me," cried he to Bourbon, "I die in the discharge of my duty: they alone are the objects of pity, who fight against their prince and their country."

Clement was now alarmed for Italy: the emperor seemed a more dangerous enemy than the French. The Florentines and Venetians were also satisfied with the advantage already obtained, and thought it prudent not to prosecute their victory. The pope proceeded so far in his opposition to Charles, that he ordered his muncio at London to mediate a reconciliation between France and England. But however exasperated the cardinal might be against the emperor, he determined to have the whole honour himself in bringing about so great an alteration. Accordingly he persuaded Henry to refuse the pope's mediation; and a new treaty was concluded between Henry and Charles for the invasion of France.

Accordingly the constable of Bourbon passed the Alps, and entered Provence at the head of ten thousand foot, two thousand horse, and eighteen pieces of cannon. The defenceless towns of Antibes, Frejus, Vignolles, and Aix, fell an easy conquest; and the constable sat down, on the nineteenth of August, before Marseilles, which was defended by a garrison of three thousand foot, and two hundred men at arms, besides nine thousand inhabitants, who took up arms on this occasion. About the same time, the Spanish admiral, who had been sent with a strong fleet from Genoa to assist the land forces, made himself master of Toulon. The siege was carried on with the utmost vigour for about a month; when the approach of Francis, at the head of forty thousand men, obliged the constable to abandon the enterprise, and retreat, with some precipitation, into Italy.

Had Charles been satisfied with defending his own dominions, in all probability, he might have rendered all the designs of his enemies abortive; especially as the English were by no means sanguine for carrying on the war with vigour. But he was desirous of recovering the Milanese, and accordingly crossed the Alps at Mount Cenis; and the constable being in no condition to oppose him, he marched immediately to the capital of that duchy, and entered the city without opposition. The imperial forces fled to Lodi; and were preparing to abandon that place, when advice arrived that Francis had undertaken the siege of Pavia, one of the strongest fortresses in Italy, and well provided for making a stout defence. Francis pushed the siege with the utmost fury, and made several breaches in the walls; but the vigilance of Leyva, the governor, rendered all his attempts abortive; he instantly threw up new intrenchments behind the breaches.

A. D. 1525. The emperor, notwithstanding his immense possessions, had not money to pay his troops; so little progress had industry and commerce as yet made in Europe. Bourbon pawned his jewels; and with that money, assisted by his personal interest, he levied twelve thousand men, and joined the imperial generals Pescara and Lannoy, who had gathered forces from all parts of Italy. The junction being completed, the army advanced to raise the siege of Pavia, where Francis, as imprudent as he was brave, persisted in his design, though he met with invincible obstacles. Had Francis raised the siege, the imperial generals would, doubtless, have dispersed, and he might have reduced the duchy of Milan without any difficulty; but thinking his honour concerned, he resolved either to make himself master of Pavia, or lose his army in the attempt.

The French camp was surrounded with such strong intrenchments, that the imperial generals contented themselves with cannonading the enemy for several days; when the Swiss having recalled their troops from the French army, they attacked the intrenchments of the besiegers about midnight of the twenty-fifth of February. Upon the first alarm, Francis put himself at the head of two thousand cavalry, and fell with such impetuosity upon a body of troops commanded by Pescara, that the general was unhorsed, and dangerously wounded; and the whole corps would have been totally ruined, had not the duke of Bourbon, who had already made a dreadful slaughter in another part of the camp, hastened to his assistance. The contest was now unequal; but the French, to defend the person of their king; gathered round him, and fought with all the fury of men driven to despair. La Plèffe, la Tremouille, Galcas de San Severino, and admiral Bonnivet, were slain by his side. The king defended himself with astonishing vigour: his horse was killed under him, and he received a desperate wound in his leg; but he started up, and still fought on foot with amazing valour.

Pomerant, an officer of some distinction, who had followed the duke of Bourbon in his revolt, came up at that instant; and seeing the king in such a dangerous situation, drew his sword; and placing himself by the side of Francis, assisted him in keeping off the soldiers, who pressed forward to take him alive. At the same time, he desired that the duke of Bourbon might be called, to receive the king as a prisoner. But Francis, transported with rage, declared, that he would sooner perish than deliver his sword to a traitor. "Send for Lannoy, viceroy of Naples," continued he; "to him I will surrender." That officer accordingly appeared; and the king said to him, "M. de Lannoy, take this sword; it is that of a king, who is not a prisoner from cowardice, but the accidents of fortune." Lannoy received the sword upon his knee, kissed his hand with the profoundest respect, and presented him his own sword, saying, "I beg your Majesty will be so good as to receive mine, which has this day spared the lives of many Frenchmen. It does not become an officer of the emperor to leave a king disarmed, though a prisoner." Lannoy did not, however, think Francis safe in the army. He feared the German forces might seize his person as a security for their pay; and therefore carried him immediately to the strong castle of Pizzighitona, where he remained for some time under Italy; a confederacy of which the king of England was declared the protector.

Irritated at this league, Charles determined to take ample vengeance on those allies that had deserted him in the time of danger; particularly the Roman pontiff, who, though he had chiefly owed his election to the good offices of the emperor, had so ungratefully abandoned the interest of his benefactor. He accordingly ordered the duke of Bourbon to advance towards Rome, and attack the pope in his capital. Bourbon executed the emperor's commands with the greatest bravery and conduct, but was killed as he was mounting a ladder to scale the walls. His death inspired his followers with fury and revenge. Rome, taken by assault, was pillaged, and became a scene of the most shocking barbarities. That renowned city never suffered more, even from Barbarians, than now from the hands of Christians. Whatever was respectable in modesty, whatever was sacred in religion, seemed only to increase the brutality of the soldiers. The pope himself was taken prisoner, and treated with every indignity. When intelligence was brought the emperor of the success of his arms against the Roman capital, he affected the utmost sorrow, put himself and his whole court into mourning, and ordered prayers to be offered up for the deliverance of the pope. But the artifice was too gross to impose even upon the ignorant and superstitious multitude. It was remarked, even by the vulgar, that a letter under his own hand, to his generals in Italy, would be more effectual than all his prayers.

It was very different with Francis and Henry: they were extremely concerned for the misfortunes of the pontiff, and determined to carry their arms into Italy. Wolsey himself crossed the seas to have an interview with Francis, who met him at Amiens; where it was stipulated, that the duke of Orleans should marry the princess Mary: and as it was apprehended that Charles would immediately summon a general council, both monarchs agreed not to acknowledge it, but to govern the churches in their respective dominions by their own authority, during the pope's imprisonment. Soon after, a new treaty was negotiated between the two monarchs; by which Henry renounced his ancient pretensions to the crown of France; and Charles, in return, bound himself and his successors to pay annually the sum of fifty thousand crowns. Spain was now become the terror of the English; and the animosity so long entertained against the French entirely subsided.

Charles, though alarmed at this alliance between France and England, refused to submit to the conditions insisted upon by the allies. He receded, indeed, from his demand of Burgundy, as the ransom for the two princes; but insisted that Francis should evacuate all his Italian conquests before they should recover their liberty. The conditions being rejected, the English and French heralds, pursuant to their instructions, declared war against the emperor, and set him at defiance. Charles answered the English herald with great moderation; but reproached the Frenchman with his master's breach of faith, and answered him with insults. The French monarch retaliated this charge, by giving the emperor the lie; and challenges were formally sent to each other by these great princes. But though they were both undoubtedly brave, no duel took place. The practice of single combat was, however, at this time, very common in Europe, and even countenanced, in several cases, by the law. It was still the common method of terminating disputes between discontented warriors; and the challenges which reciprocally passed between Charles and Francis, greatly increased the evil.

During these transactions on the continent, the passions of Henry produced events as remarkable as any that are found in the history of any country. His consort, Catherine of Arragon, who was six years older than Henry, had lost his affections. She was the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, and niece to Charles V. had been married to Henry eighteen years, and brought him three children; one of whom, the princess Mary, afterwards queen of England, was still living. The queen could neither be reproached with barrenness, with bad conduct, nor even with that peevish humour which so frequently accompanies female virtue. But all her gentle and amiable accomplishments could not fix a heart devoted to pleasure. She had been first married to prince Arthur, elder brother to Henry; and upon his death, she was betrothed to him. This marriage had always been considered as illegal by most of the foreign states; had been strongly opposed as such by Warham, archbishop of Canterbury; and his opinion had been confirmed by the two houses of Convocation. These authorities strengthened Henry's scruples; and it was thought that the pope had no power to dispense with a positive law of the Deity. Henry was the more affected, because all his children by Catherine, Mary excepted, had died in their infancy; and the curse of being childless is threatened in the Levitical law against the person who shall espouse his brother's widow. He considered himself as obnoxious to this malediction; and the more he was inclined to a divorce, he was the more solicitous to convince himself of the illegitimacy of his marriage. The great progress Henry had made in casuistical divinity, enabled him to examine this question thoroughly. The celebrated Thomas Aquinas, whose authority was great in the church, and absolute with Henry, had treated of that very case, and expressly declared against the lawfulness of such marriages. "The prohibitions (says that famous casuist) contained in Leviticus; and among the rest, that of marrying a brother's widow, are moral, eternal, and founded on a divine sanction; and though the pope may dispense with the rules of the church, the laws of God cannot be set aside by any authority less than that which enacted them."

This decision was sufficient to convince Henry, that his marriage was unlawful; and an incident that now happened determined him to procure a divorce from Catherine. Anne Boleyn, a young lady celebrated for her beauty and mental accomplishments, had been lately created maid of honour to the queen, and soon acquired an entire ascendant over the affections of Henry. He endeavoured, by every method, to seduce her, but the virtue or ambition of Anne resisted all his arts; and the king perceiving that there was no other method of gratifying his passion, determined to make her his partner in the throne. But it was no easy task to repudiate the aunt of Charles V. Many difficulties opposed every step of the process.

A. D. 1527. Before any advances could be made, it was necessary that the bull of pope Julius should be annulled at Rome; a proceeding which no pontiff would be willing to adopt. Clement, though still a prisoner to Charles, was desirous of procuring the favour of Henry, who was alone able to assist him in his distress: he therefore listened to the proposals of that monarch, and seemed willing to annul the bull of his predecessor. He granted a commission to Wolsey to examine, as legate, the validity of the marriage, and promised to expedite a bull of divorce. But Clement, with all his dexterity and address, wanted intrepidity, firmness, and integrity. Charles V. discovered his intentions; and threatened, if he favoured the English monarch, to summon a general council, and cause him to be deposed, on account of his being a natural son of Julian of Medicis. At the same time, he flattered him with the hopes of re-establishing his family in the duchy of Florence, if he complied with his desires. The offers and threatenings of Charles were too powerful for Clement to withstand: he granted a new commission, in which cardinal Campeggio was joined with Wolsey, for trying the validity of the king's marriage. But he could not be induced to promise, that he would not recall recall this commission. Campeggio artfully protracted his departure for England; and when he arrived there with a bull in the file requested by Henry, he refused to communicate it to any person except the king and Wolsey. Nor could this bull be executed till the marriage was pronounced illegal; and accordingly the two legates proceeded to examine the validity of the marriage.

A. D. 1529. The king and queen were both cited to appear before this tribunal; and Henry, when called, answered readily to his name. But the queen, instead of answering to her's, rose from her seat, threw herself at the feet of her husband, and addressed him in the most pathetic terms. She began with observing, that she was a stranger in his dominions, destitute of friends, of counsel, of assistance; exposed to all the injustice which her enemies were pleased to heap upon her. She told him, that her conduct, ever since their marriage, had been irreproachable; and protested, that he had received her a virgin to his bed. She added, that in espousing him, she had followed the advice of those able princes, Henry VII. and Ferdinand the Catholic. She expressed her suspicion of the legates, appealed from them to the pope; and, after making the king a low reverence, she left the court, nor would she ever after appear before the legates. Henry did not attempt to reproach her with any crime: on the contrary, he declared that she had ever been a dutiful and affectionate wife, and that the whole tenor of her behaviour had been conformable to the strictest rules of probity and honour. But he still insisted on the scruples with which he had been agitated. He mentioned the consummation of her marriage with his brother Arthur; declared his doubts of the validity of pope Julius's dispensation; and expressed his desire that the court might give judgment according to the rules of equity and religion.

The legates now proceeded in their commission, and first examined into the proofs of the consummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine. And it must be owned by every impartial enquirer, that the fact was established as far as the nature of the transaction would admit of proof. Every person now expected that the sentence of divorce would be soon pronounced, but that moment was still at a great distance. Campeggio spun out the trial, till he received his final instructions from Rome; when he burnt the decretal bull, and declared that the cause was evoked to Rome. Henry thought himself sure of obtaining his wishes, when he was informed of this mortifying transaction. He suspected Wolsey of treachery, and from that moment we may justly date the fall of that powerful minister. Both the emperor and Catherine made the utmost efforts to ruin him in the king's opinion: they were at great pains to propagate reports, by means of their agents, wholly calculated to accomplish his destruction. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, at the head of a powerful party, exerted all their influence to supplant him in the royal favour, and embraced every opportunity of misrepresenting his actions. But, perhaps, all their endeavours, added to the envy and malignancy of the world, would not have been sufficient to have effected his disgrace, without the powerful assistance of Anne Boleyn, who had now gained an entire ascendancy over the mind of her royal lover. Afflicted by her powerful influence, Wolsey sunk under the complicated weight.

Every body expected that the disgrace of the cardinal would have immediately followed the evocation of the cause to Rome; but they were deceived. Henry had so much command over his passion, as not to intimate any dislike to the proceedings of his minister; but Campeggio had no sooner received his audience of leave, than Henry, in order to divert the chagrin resulting from his disappointment, made a progress through several of the counties adjacent to his capital, without taking the cardinal with him. From this neglect Wolsey prognosticated that his fall was at no great distance. He, however, still continued to discharge the duties of his office; and observing no alteration in the behaviour of the courtiers towards him; he began to flatter himself that his disgrace was not absolutely determined. But his enemies, with Anne Boleyn at their head, had so prepossessed the king, during his absence, against the minister, that on his return to London, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, both sworn enemies to Wolsey, were sent to demand the great seal, which Wolsey thought proper to refuse, asserting, that he held it by patent during his life. The next day they returned with orders under the king's signet; and Wolsey immediately delivered the seal into their hands. The king immediately gave it to Sir Thomas More, a man of letters, virtue, and integrity. Wolsey was ordered to retire from York palace, which, though it belonged to the archiepiscopal see, was seized by Henry, and became afterwards the residence of the kings of England, under the title of Whitehall. A cupboard of massy gold, a thousand pieces of holland, which had belonged to him, with all his rich furniture, were converted to the king's use. Wolsey himself retired to Ather, a country-seat he possessed on the banks of the Thames, where he dismissed his numerous retinue.

Henry was, however, for some time, willing to suspend the blow which overwhelmed his favourite; but his enemies, particularly Anne Boleyn, so exasperated the king against him by false accusations, that he gave him up to the prosecution of the parliament. The House of Lords presented an accusation against the cardinal, consisting of forty-four articles; but all of them so vague and indeterminate, that the Commons rejected the bill. Thomas Cromwell, formerly one of his domestics, defended him in that assembly with a force and courage which, instead of hurting his fortune, as might have been expected, laid the foundation of that favour which he afterwards enjoyed with the king. True merit sometimes acquires an ascendant over vicious minds. But the opposition of the Commons was not sufficient to divert the dreadful storm that threatened to overwhelm this once powerful minister. He was condemned, on pretence of his having solicited bulls from Rome, though the king had given his consent to that measure; and the cardinal was never able to recover from this disgrace: he fell a sacrifice to the envy and malevolence of his enemies. The king, however, would not suffer this prosecution to be carried to extremities: he even granted him a pardon for all offences; restored him part of his plate and furniture; and continued, from time to time, to intimate, that he still entertained for him his former affections.

Clement, by his duplicity, greatly augmented the prejudices already entertained by the English against the Romish church. This was sufficiently evident by the conduct of the parliament. The utmost freedoms were used with the characters of the sacred colleges. Some members of the House of Commons having attacked the impositions of the clergy, and the various attempts they had made to usurp an authority in civil matters, no offence was taken, though their invectives were remarkably severe. One of them had even the boldness to advance such tenets, that even the deists of our times would scruple to defend publicly. He said, That as the vast variety of theological opinions which had, at different times, prevailed in the world, could not possibly be known and examined by individuals, their wisest method was to suspend their judgment with regard to all; and that the only religion obligatory on the human race, was the belief of one Supreme Being, and the practice of virtue. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, complained, on this occasion, of the temerity of the Commons; and accused them of having formed a design, founded on heretical and Lutheran principles, of robbing the church of her patrimony, and overturning the national religion. The duke of Norfolk undertook their defence, but made use of terms perhaps perhaps somewhat indecent. He said, "That the greatest clerks were not always the wisest men." "Your observation may be right," replied Rochester, "but I have not known, in my time, any fools that have proved great clerks." This reflection displeased the Commons, who complained of it to the king, and the bishop was obliged to put a favourable construction on his words. So greatly was the power of the hierarchy fallen in the opinion of this capricious monarch.

Henry, instead of condemning the Commons for their severe attacks, was pleased to find that the clergy must depend solely on his power. He had more than once determined to throw off all dependence upon Rome, though, at the same time, he trembled at the thoughts of heresy. He had defended the Catholic Church against Luther, and his pride would not suffer him to acknowledge that he was now convinced of his error. He had no hopes of succeeding in his solicitations for a divorce from Rome. The policy of Clement VII. and the intrigues and power of Charles V. had abundantly convinced him, that every attempt of that kind would prove abortive. A treaty had been lately concluded between the emperor and the pope; by which it was stipulated, "That the emperor should restore to the family of Medicis the duchy of Florence, on the same footing as before the war: that he should cause Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to the pope: that he should put him in possession of Modena and Reggio: that he should assist him in making himself master of Ferrara: that Francisco Sforza should be restored to Milan: that the pope and the emperor should employ their temporal and spiritual arms against the heretics of Germany: that Alexander de Medicis should espouse Margaret, the emperor's natural daughter: that the pope should grant the emperor a fourth of the ecclesiastical revenues in his dominions, in order to enable him to carry on the war against the Turks; and that he should absolve all who had been any way concerned in the taking and sacking of Rome."

This treaty was soon after followed by another, between the emperor and Francis I. on the basis of that concluded at Madrid. By this treaty the emperor agreed to wave, for the present, his claim upon Burgundy. Francis engaged to pay two millions of crowns for the ransom of his children; to withdraw his troops from Italy; to cede to Charles the government of Flanders and Artois; to restore the county of Asti, with all that he still retained in the kingdom of Naples; to espouse Eleanor, queen-dowager of Portugal, the emperor's sister; and to re-establish the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon in all the estates of that family, which had been confiscated.

These treaties restored peace to Italy, and Clement no longer depended on Henry's assistance. It was therefore necessary to have recourse to some other expedient, or drop all thoughts of obtaining a divorce from Catherine. Dr. Thomas Cranmer, a fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, discovered a method which seemed to promise the removal of every difficulty. He proposed to consult all the universities of Europe with regard to this controverted point; alledging, that if they agreed to approve the king's marriage with Catherine, his Majesty's scruples must cease of course; if they condemned it, the pope would find it difficult to resist the opinion of all the learned, when joined with the solicitations of so great a monarch. Henry was highly delighted with this proposal, and determined to carry it immediately into execution. He also found, upon inquiry, that Cranmer was a person of acknowledged piety, learning, and moderation, and therefore determined to have him near his person. Accordingly he sent for him to court, entered into conversation with him, and conceived an high opinion of his parts and understanding. In the mean time, he dispatched his agents to collect the opinions of the universities of Europe,

A.D. 1530. It was not long before Henry obtained his desire. The universities of Paris, Orleans, Bourges, Thoulouse, Angiers, Venice, Ferrara, Padua, Bologna, Oxford and Cambridge, pronounced a decision agreeable to his wishes. They maintained, "That the marriage of a person with his brother's widow was contrary to the divine law; and, consequently, could not be authorized by any dispensation."

But this decision had no effect upon the court of Rome; they still refused to listen to Henry's remonstrances. A spirited letter was therefore written to the pope, signed by the principal prelates and nobility of England; in which, after mentioning the many good offices which the king had formerly done for his Holiness, the judgment of so many learned universities, and the little regard he had paid to all these weighty considerations; they plainly told him, "that if he continued to amuse and deceive the English monarch in the affair of the divorce, they would renounce their connections with the see of Rome, and do themselves that justice which they had so long demanded in vain from his Holiness."

During these transactions, Wolsey resided at a country-house at Richmond, a seat he had received as a present from Henry, in return for Hampton-Court. He had been reinstated in the revenues of his archbishopric, and those of the see of Winchester. He even entertained hopes of again recovering the king's favour. The courtiers were alarmed, and procured an order for him to remove to his archiepiscopal see. He immediately obeyed, and retired to Cawood, in Yorkshire, where he applied himself strictly to execute the duties of his ecclesiastical charge. Nor did he labour in vain. The assiduity with which he discharged his pastoral duties, his charity to the poor, his hospitality, and the obliging reception he gave to all who visited him in his retreat, soon gained him the love and esteem of all orders of men in the neighbourhood of his residence. Wolsey, for the first time, now became truly popular. But he was not long suffered to enjoy this happiness unmolested. The earl of Northumberland and Sir Peter Walshe were sent down to arrest him for high-treason, and to conduct him to London. No regard was paid to his ecclesiastical character; the privileges of the church were no longer regarded.

Wolsey made no opposition to the royal orders; he immediately set out for London with some degree of cheerfulness. They were met upon the road by Sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower, at the head of a party of the guards. But the cardinal, partly by the fatigues of his journey, and partly by the great anxiety of his mind, was seized with a disorder, which soon turned to a dysentery; so that he reached Leicester-abbey with the utmost difficulty. He perceived his dissolution was approaching; and told the abbot and monks, who advanced to receive him with great respect, that he was come to lay his bones among them. He was immediately carried to his bed, from which he never more arose. The folly of ambitious pursuits, and the vanity of human grandeur, now appeared in their genuine colours; and he sincerely regretted the time he had spent in assiduously studying the headstrong passions of an ungrateful prince. "Had I" said he, "served my God as diligently as I served my king, he would not have forsaken me in my grey hairs." With these reflections Wolsey paid the debt of nature on the twenty-third of November, in the sixtieth year of his age; and was interred, at his own request, in the chapel of Leicester-abbey.

This great minister exhibits a striking example of the folly and weakness of those who mistake the paths of ambition for the paths of happiness. His character has been loaded, perhaps unjustly, with the most violent reproaches. Great allowances should certainly be made for the obstinacy and violence of Henry's temper: Wolsey was often obliged to pursue measures his better judgment condemned. His successors efforts could not hold the helm of government with so steady a hand: they were far more criminal than the cardinal. The ambition he entertained of filling St. Peter's chair proceeded, perhaps, in part at least, from a desire he entertained of being serviceable to his country in that important station. Henry himself, when informed of the death of the cardinal, regretted his loss, and spoke of him in the most favourable terms: and it should be remembered, that a minister who is odious to the nation he governs, cannot be transmitted, in very favourable colours, to posterity.

A. D. 1531. The parliament that met soon after the death of Wolsey, made use of the same act that had destroyed the cardinal, to enrich the crown, at the expence of the clergy. The legantine power of Wolsey, though exercised with the king's consent, had been the cause of his fall; and the clergy were considered as having participated in his guilt, because they had submitted to an authority now declared illegal. The example of Wolsey had sufficiently convinced the ecclesiastics, that it would be in vain to offer any apology for their conduct: they submitted to the king's pleasure, and were glad to purchase a pardon at the expence of one hundred and eighteen thousand, eight hundred and forty pounds. It was also required of them, that they should acknowledge Henry "the protector, and supreme head of the church of England." Some of them, indeed, procured a clause to be inserted, which invalidated the whole concession: it ran in these terms, "So far as is permitted by the law of Christ."

The whole proceedings of Henry sufficiently shewed, that he was determined to humble his clergy. He knew he should be supported in all his measures by the Commons, who shewed a strong desire to mortify the ecclesiastics; nor did he apprehend any opposition from the temporal lords. The Protestant religion was at this time secretly favoured by many persons in England, where the writings and sermons of Wickliff and his disciples had, many years since, dissipated, in part, the mist of ignorance and superstition from the minds of the people; who being, at the same time, oppressed by the pope's usurpations, and scandalized by the lewd and immoral bulls of the late pontiffs who had filled St. Peter's chair, were very desirous of an opportunity to deliver themselves from such an intolerable and disgraceful yoke. But however desirous the Commons might be of humbling the clergy, they were greatly alarmed at the king's having revived the obsolete statute of provisors. Most of them had, in some manner or other, maintained causes in the legantine court, and therefore were as liable to the penalties of that statute as the clergy themselves; and the rigour with which Henry had treated that body, made them apprehensive for their own safety. They therefore presented a petition to the king, requesting that they might be included in the pardon preparing to be issued for the clergy. Their desire was granted, and the Commons extolled the clemency of Henry to the skies.

A. D. 1532. The parliament proceeded still farther at their next meeting, with regard to the power of the Roman pontiff in England. An act was passed against levying the annates, or first fruits, a tax hitherto paid to the pope for granting bulls to the new prelates. This statute declared, "That the kingdom was impoverished by the great sums paid to the Roman pontiff: that, since the second year of the late reign, above one hundred and sixty thousand pounds had been sent to Rome on account of annates or first-fruits, palls and bulls for bishoprics: that the annates had been originally designed as a contribution for supporting a war against the infidels; but as they were not applied to that purpose, it was decreed, that they should not be paid for the future: that no more than five per cent. of the annual revenue should be given for the bulls of bishoprics: that if the pope should refuse to grant them upon these terms, the bishop elect should be presented by the king to the metropolitan of the province; in order to be consecrated; but should the metropolitan refuse consecration, on pretence of wanting palls and bulls, two prelates appointed by the king should perform the ceremony, and the elect should then be considered as lawfully consecrated. The parliament, however, at the same time, declared, that the king should be at liberty to annul or confirm this act, within a limited time; and if, in that interval, he should compromise his difference with the court of Rome, it should obtain the force of a law; but should the pope, on account of this act, endeavour to disturb the peace of the kingdom with the sentences of excommunication and interdict, these censures should be utterly disregarded. All ecclesiastics were forbid to receive or publish such censures, and enjoined to celebrate divine service in the same manner as if they had never been issued." After passing this act, they proceeded to examine the oath to the pope, administered to the bishops on their installation; and were on the point of abolishing it, when the breaking out of the plague at Westminster occasioned their being prorogued.

It was now sufficiently evident to the whole nation, that Henry's intention was to marry Anne Boleyn; and either force the pope to agree to his measures, or withdraw his obedience from the holy see. The chancellor, Sir Thomas More, a man of strict virtue, incapable of making his religion submissive to his interest, and, at the same time, too much a philosopher to be over solicitous to advance his fortune, begged leave to resign the seals, and retired from that elevated station with more joy than an ambitious person would have felt in being placed in that exalted seat of power. Soon after the resignation, Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature; an event which gave Henry no small satisfaction, as he flattered himself he should now easily procure the affair of his divorce to be determined in his own dominions. For though the deceased prelate was convinced that Henry's marriage with Catherine was unlawful, yet he was too much devoted to the see of Rome to do any act, or exert his own authority in opposition to the papal power. The king named for his successor Dr. Thomas Cranmer, and he was soon after placed in the archiepiscopal chair.

Henry had exerted all his influence to prevail upon Catherine to withdraw her appeal from Rome; but all his attempts proving abortive, and a treaty of offensive alliance being concluded with Francis I. he privately married Anne Boleyn on the fourteenth of November. Her father, mother, and brother, together with her uncle the duke of Norfolk, and archbishop Cranmer, were present at the ceremony.

A. D. 1533. The queen soon became pregnant, and Henry publicly owned his marriage. This circumstance rendered it necessary that Catherine's divorce should now be finished; and it was determined in the council, that the archbishop should pronounce the sentence. Accordingly Cranmer repaired to Dunstable, in the neighbourhood of which the queen resided, and cited Catherine to appear. As she took not the least notice of the citation, she was declared contumacious, and the primate proceeded to the examination of the cause. The evidences of Arthur's consummation of his marriage were produced; the opinions of the universities were read; together with the judgment pronounced two years before by the convocations both of Canterbury and York: and after these preparatory steps, Cranmer annulled the king's marriage with Catherine, as unlawful. He also, by a subsequent sentence, ratified the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was soon after publicly crowned with the greatest pomp and ceremony. On the seventh of September, the new queen was safely delivered of a daughter, who received the name of Elizabeth, and afterwards swayed the sceptre of England with such honour and applause. Henry immediately conferred on her the title of prince of Wales, though she was only the presumptive heir to the crown.

The intelligence of these transactions no sooner reached Rome, than the whole consistory was in the most violent ferment. The cardinals of the imperial faction urged the pope to launch the dreadful bolt of excommunication against the English monarch; but the pontiff could not be prevailed upon to proceed any farther than to threaten Henry with that sentence, if he annulled not the criminal acts he had committed within a limited time. The mediation of Francis I. who had entered into a negotiation with Clement for the marriage of his second son, the duke of Orleans, with Catherine of Medicis, the pope's niece, seemed, however, likely to produce an accommodation. Henry was prevailed upon to submit his cause to the holy see, provided the cardinals of the imperial party were excluded from the Roman consistory during the trial; and the pope was disposed to gratify his desire. A day was even appointed for the return of the messenger with Henry's definitive answer; but the courier who carried the king's acquiescence in writing, was detained by accident beyond the limited time. In vain did the bishop of Paris request the pope to wait a few days for the messenger: Clement was so highly exasperated, that he would listen to no remonstrances. He entered the consistory enflamed with anger; and, with a precipitation fatal to the power of the Roman see, pronounced the legitimacy of Henry's marriage with Catherine, and declared him excommunicated if he refused to obey the sentence. Two days after, the messenger arrived; but the evil was not to be redressed. The obedience of England, one of the richest jewels in the papal crown, was lost by this hasty decision. A kingdom the most devoted of any in Europe to the apostolical see, was become its irreconcilable enemy. Two days patience would have prevented this alarming event.

A.D. 1534. The parliament met on the fifteenth of January, and continued to enact laws wholly subversive of the papal authority. They had already proscribed all appeals to Rome, and all the rights and regulations of the apostolic chamber. The people had for some years been persuaded, that a general council was far superior to the Roman pontiff; it was now publicly maintained, that the pope was only a bishop, and that his power extended no farther than the limits of his own diocese. The people, the parliament, and even the clergy, adopted this opinion. The statute of Henry IV. against heretics was moderated. By another statute it was declared, that no synod or convocation of the clergy should be assembled without the king's permission; that his majesty should nominate sixteen persons from the parliament, and as many from the clergy, to examine the canons and constitutions of the church, with a power to abolish such as were useless, and confirm those that were necessary. The parliament next confirmed the statute against annates: it was enacted, "That for the future the pope should have no share in the election or confirmation of bishops; but that, when a see became vacant, the king should send to the chapter a congéd'elire, or licence, to elect a new bishop; and if the election should not be made in twelve days after the date of the licence, the right of choosing should fall to the king: that the bishop elect should swear fealty to his majesty: that no person should presume to apply to the bishop of Rome for bulls, palls, or any other religious purpose: that Peter-pence, together with all procurations, delegations, bulls, and dispensations, issued by the court of Rome, should be entirely abolished: that the archbishop of Canterbury should be empowered to grant such dispensations as were consistent with the law of God, provided that part of the money thence arising should be paid into the king's exchequer: that all religious houses, whether exempted or non-exempted, should be subject to the visitation of the archbishop: that the king's marriage with Catherine should be deemed null and void; and that the succession should be settled upon the issue of his lawful wife Anne, whether male or female." This parliament also passed an act of attainder against Elizabeth Barton, commonly called, "The holy Maid of Kent," and her accomplices, in a treasonable attempt to raise disturbances in the kingdom.

This woman had been long subject to hysteric fits, during which her body was thrown into unusual convulsions, and she frequently uttered many strange and incoherent expressions; whence the ignorant and credulous multitude were induced to believe that she spoke by the inspiration of heaven. The party who still supported the pope's authority, considered this person as a proper instrument to gain proselytes to their party, and condemn the methods that had been taken to procure the divorce. They, however, waited till the belief of her having an immediate intercourse with heaven was established with the people. This being effected, they taught her to declaim against the new doctrines, which she called heresy; against innovations in ecclesiastical government, and against the king's divorce from Catherine. She even at last had the boldness to assert, "that if the king prosecuted his divorce, and married another woman, he should not wear the crown a month longer, but should die the death of a villain." Henry, for some time, neglected to take any notice of this woman; he considered her pretended prophecies as the effects of a disordered brain, and which would be disregarded as soon as they ceased to be a novelty. But finding that she was supported, not only by the monks, but also by the pope's agents in England, he resolved to proceed against her with the utmost severity. Both the maid herself and her accomplices were accordingly examined in the Star-chamber, where they readily confessed all the particulars of their guilt, and suffered the punishment inflicted by the parliament. The detection of this imposture tended greatly to injure the credit of the ecclesiastics, especially the monks, who now became the objects of Henry's resentment.

During these transactions, intelligence of the excommunication fulminated by Clement reached England, and added greatly to the general ferment. The appeal of the king to a general council of the clergy was affixed to all the gates of the churches. The convocation declared, that the bishop of Rome had no authority in England; and that the power which he and his predecessors had hitherto exercised there, was nothing more than an usurpation tolerated by its kings. Thus was the church of England totally separated from the authority of the Roman see; and those who pretended that no great kingdom could throw off the subjection of the pope without the most imminent danger, now saw that a single blow was sufficient to overthrow this venerable Colossus.

Soon after the rising of the parliament, Henry sent commissioners through the whole kingdom, to administer the oath of allegiance and succession to all his subjects; and Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, refusing to take it, were committed to the Tower. But though Henry had renounced the pope's authority, he was far from being a friend to the reformers. Their tenets were, however, embraced by great numbers of the English, and all ranks of men were disposed to favour their attempts to remove many of the superstitious practices from the public worship. The king's book against Luther had done him honour with the Catholics; and the answer of that reformer, who treated him with a sovereign contempt, failed not to wound his vanity. He did not, therefore, abandon the tenets of the Roman church, though he denied the authority of the pontiff. His ministers and courtiers knew not which religion to adopt; they wavered between both, and seemed extremely cautious of declaring their real opinions. The duke of Norfolk, and Gardener, bishop of Winchester, who were firmly attached to the ancient religion, though they pretended to acknowledge the king's supremacy, used every method in their power to exasperate Henry against the reformers. On the other hand, the new queen, with archbishop Cranmer, and secretary Cromwell, Cromwell, who were friends to the protestants, artfully excited his resentment against the Holy See, while they themselves professed the established faith. Thus the professors of both religions were equally obnoxious to persecution. It was as criminal to acknowledge the pope's supremacy as to embrace the tenets of Luther. The prior of the Carthusian monks, the prior of Hexham, Benafe, a monk of Sion college, and John Haile, vicar of Illeworth, together with three monks of the Charterhouse, were put to death for denying the king's supremacy. This severity was a prelude to those sanguinary scenes that disgrace the close of Henry's reign.

At the same time, the reformers felt the weight of Henry's violent hand. The spirit of liberty cherished by that whole sect alarmed the rapacious monarch, and he was determined to employ persecution and violence against them; but he should have remembered, that the zeal of sectaries is always increased by opposition. A gentleman of the Temple, and a clergyman, having embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, were seized by the government, and put to the torture. Their sufferings proved too strong for their zeal; they abjured the tenets of Luther, and were set at liberty. But feeling afterwards the deepest compunctions for their timidity, they boldly preached against the superstitions of the established religion, and were condemned to the flames. It was expected by their enemies, that they would again recant when brought to the stake; but they were mistaken: they suffered with the most unshaken intrepidity; and even in the midst of their torments, gloried in the tenets they had before inculcated. Another disciple of the reformers, when surrounded with the flames, embraced, with a transport of joy, the faggots which were to put a period to his life. It was not, indeed, easy to avoid the danger of incurring the king's displeasure; his misplaced zeal considered the most innocent actions as heretical. To teach children the Lord's prayer in the vulgar tongue, to read the translation of the New Testament, to speak against pilgrimages, and to neglect the fasts of the church, were considered as highly criminal, and punished with the utmost severity. The jealousy and cruelty of the Spanish inquisition seemed to direct the proceedings of the English government.

Nor were these instances of his zeal for the tenets of the Romish church sufficient to satisfy the Catholics: they considered his revolt from the pope to be equally criminal with denying the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. One Peyto, a Franciscan friar, who preached before him, had the boldness to declare, "That many lying prophets had deceived him, but he, as the true Micajah, warned him, that the dogs should lick his blood, as they had done the blood of Ahab." The king, notwithstanding the violence of his temper, took no notice of this insult. But the next Sunday, he ordered Dr. Corren to preach in the Royal Chapel; and he justified the king's proceedings, and called Peyto a rebel, a slanderer, a dog and a traitor. He was interrupted in the midst of his harangue by another Franciscan, who told him he was one of the lying prophets, who endeavoured to establish the succession to the crown by adultery. Henry imposed silence on this petulant churchman, and he was summoned before the council. But this did not intimidate the friar: for being told by one of the counsellors, that he ought to be thrown into the Thames, he answered, "That the road to heaven was not longer by water than by land."

A. D. 1535. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, were still confined in the Tower. They were both men of great parts and learning. Fisher had, for many years, enjoyed the confidence of Henry, and was a prelate of great virtue and erudition. The pope, who considered his sufferings as the consequence of his attachment to the holy see, sent him a cardinal's hat during his confinement in the Tower. But this promotion could not exempt him from punishment. He was at last brought to his trial; and refusing to take the oath of supremacy, was found guilty, and condemned to lose his life. He received the notice of his execution with great composure, and submitted to the fatal blow with calmness and intrepidity. Great pains had been used to prevail upon Sir Thomas More to take the oath of supremacy; but he refused every offer, and fell a victim to the sanguinary malevolence of Henry. When conducted to the scaffold, neither the serenity of his mind, nor the usual cheerfulness of his temper, forsook him. He begged the executioner to stay till he had put aside his beard, "for (added he) it never committed treason." The humour, the virtue, and the resolution of this great man, will be remembered with applause, while the malevolence of his enemies will be recollected with detestation.

Paul III. who had lately succeeded Clement VII. in the papal chair, had flattered himself with being able to reconcile Henry to the Roman see. He had always favoured Henry's cause before his advancement to the papacy, and even gained the friendship of that capricious monarch. Sensible of the loss the apostolic see must sustain by a breach with England, he was very desirous of putting a friendly period to this alarming dispute. A negotiation was accordingly opened, and seemed to promise a favourable issue, when the news of Fisher's execution re-kindled the rage of the sacred college. A cardinal put to death in defence of the rights of the holy see, merited the severest vengeance, and the pontiff hastened to fulminate the thunders of the Vatican. Henry was cited to appear at the pope's tribunal, with all his adherents, within ninety days; and in case of disobedience, the king was declared to be excommunicated, and his marriage with Anne Boleyn illegitimate; his subjects were freed from all oaths of allegiance; his kingdom was given up to the ambition of the first invader; and his leagues with all Catholic princes were dissolved. Paul, however, thought proper to delay the publication of these censures till it should appear that an accommodation with England was absolutely desperate; and till Charles V. at this time violently pressed by the Turks and the protestant princes of Germany, should be in a condition to execute the violent measures of the consistory.

Henry was not in the least intimidated by the threatenings of the pope: the thunder of the Vatican was no longer terrible to the English. The league of Smalcalde, in which the German reformers assumed the name of Protestants, had composed a formidable barrier to the ambition of Charles V. The kings of France and England made some advances to be admitted into this confederacy. They well knew, that a conformity of sentiments, as well as of political interests, was necessary for this purpose; and the rigid treatment their reformed subjects had experienced in both kingdoms, must induce the German princes to think they could not rely upon them as sincere allies. Francis and Henry, therefore, pretended to a conformity of sentiments with them, and that they were desirous of establishing the Reformation in their dominions. But as the German princes suspected the sincerity of their declarations, they refused to enter into an alliance with them, but upon certain conditions. Those delivered to the English ambassadors were in substance as follows:

"That Henry should approve and embrace the Augsborg confession of faith, and defend it in a free council with all his power: that he should approve of no place for holding a council without their consent; that if the pope should call a council by his own authority, Henry should join with them in protesting against it: that he should accept of the title of Protector of the League: that he should never return to the obedience of the pope: that he should not assist their enemies; and that he should pay one hundred thousand crowns towards the defence of the league; but if any part of that sum remained at the conclusion of the war, it should be restored." These articles, however disagreeable, were not rejected by Henry; but it soon appeared, that their sentiments, with regard to religion, were so very different, that no alliance could be concluded between them.

A.D. 1536. While the greatest powers of Europe were thus agitated with religious disputes, queen Catherine was seized with a dangerous distemper, which put a period to her life on the sixth of January, in the fiftieth year of her age. A little before she expired, she wrote a very tender and pathetic letter to the king, whom she styled "her most dear lord, king, and husband." Henry was greatly affected with this last proof of Catherine's affection, given at a time when she was tottering on the brink of eternity, and just going to appear before the Judge of the whole earth. The queen's behaviour was very different: she openly expressed her satisfaction at the death of Catherine, and seemed to take a pleasure in communicating it to the public. She little thought that she herself would soon fall a victim to the unbounded passion of her husband. The remains of the unfortunate Catherine were deposited in the abbey-church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an episcopal cathedral.

The great breach between Charles and Henry had been chiefly occasioned by the exertions of the former to revenge the dishonour of his aunt. But as that prince's was now no more, the emperor considered himself at full liberty to regain, if possible, the friendship of Henry. He accordingly offered to renew the former amity, on these conditions: That he should be reconciled to the court of Rome; that he should assist him in his war against the Turks; and that he should join him against Francis I. who was preparing to conquer Milan. But Henry had too often experienced the duplicity of that prince to form an alliance with him, and therefore politely refused his advances. He declared, that he should not refuse the friendship of the emperor, provided he would acknowledge, that the former breach between them proceeded entirely from himself; that his conduct with regard to the pope had been just, was ratified by the parliament, and could not now be revoked; that when peace was firmly established among the princes of Christendom, he should very readily join in a war against the infidels; and that when the former friendship between him and the emperor was restored, he should not fail to employ his good offices to reconcile him with Francis; or, if these proved ineffectual, to assist the injured party with all his forces. Charles, though defeated with regard to his attempt of forming an alliance with Henry, lost not sight of the projects he had formed. He invaded Provence and Picardy, but was repulsed with loss. He himself laid siege to Marseilles, and his generals to Peronne, but neither of them succeeded.

Henry now determined to take a severe revenge for all the affronts he had received from the monkish clergy. That numerous body of men, knowing that their power was so closely connected with that of the Roman see, that they must stand or fall together, exerted all their influence to depreciate the Reformation, and load Henry with the most atrocious crimes. They declaimed, with the utmost violence, against the followers of Luther; while the religionists, in their turn, imputed to the monks those frequent faults which oppressed the industrious to enrich the idle; those superstitious rites of devotion which were often considered as more meritorious than a discharge of the moral duties; those vain subtilties which adulterated theology; and that captious casuistry which tyrannized over the reason and consciences of men. But, perhaps, the revenues of the convents had inspired him with a desire of being master of their riches. He was, however, fearful of the consequences that might result from this attempt, as religious retreats had so long been considered as sacred and inviolable. A council was therefore summoned, where the affair was considered with the utmost attention; and it was resolved, that a general visitation should be made of all the monasteries; that a strict inquest should be taken of all their titles and revenues; and that the morals of the religious, and the regulations observed in each order, should be closely inspected. Cromwell was created vicar-general, and inquisitor-general of all the monasteries, and other privileged places. The visitation was accordingly performed with the utmost rigour; and, if credit may be given to the reports of the visitors themselves, they discovered such abominations and scenes of vice, debauchery, and imposture, as were not only disgraceful to religion, but even shocking to human nature. The report of the visitors was published, in order the more effectually to excite the horror and detestation of the people.

Recourse was now had to the parliament, where an act for the dissolution of the lesser monasteries was passed into a law. The preamble to this bill declares, "That small religious houses, under the number of twelve persons, had been long and notoriously guilty of the most abominable vices, and consumed and wasted the church lands belonging to them: that for above two hundred years, many visitations for reforming these abuses had been made without success, their vicious method of life daily increasing; so that unless the small houses were dissolved, and the religious distributed into the greater monasteries, no reformation could be expected." It was therefore declared, that all houses, whose revenues did not exceed two hundred pounds a year, should be suppressed, their revenues converted to better uses, and the religious compelled to reform themselves.

This act was no sooner passed, than orders were issued, that all nuns and friars under twenty-four years of age should be immediately dismissed and absolved from their vows; and that all others above that age should have free liberty to leave their houses and retire wherever they pleased. No less than three hundred and seventy-six of these lesser monasteries were thus dissolved; and their revenues, which amounted to thirty-two thousand pounds a year, were given to the king, together with their goods, chattels, and plate, computed at one hundred thousand pounds. While the parliament was engaged in passing an act for suppressing the lesser monasteries, the convocation deliberated upon a proposition of the utmost importance to the reformers. This was a new translation of the Bible. Tindal, some years before, had published a version of the scriptures; but it being found, upon examination, to be inaccurate and unfaithful, it had been committed publicly to the flames by order of the government. It was therefore now proposed to publish a new translation, which should be free from those objections. This motion was strongly opposed by the popish party, and as warmly supported by the friends of the Reformation, who considered it as the only means of discovering to the people the many errors and superstitious absurdities of the church of Rome. After a long contest, the motion was carried, and a new translation of the Scriptures was ordered to be made by persons esteemed equal to the undertaking.

But the reforming party now lost their principal support. Anne Boleyn, who had so long continued her ascendancy over the heart of Henry, had now lost the power of pleasing. Jane Seymour, one of the maids of honour to the queen, and a lady of singular beauty and merit, had inspired him with a new passion, and he was determined to sacrifice every thing to the gratification of his appetite. Anne was of a lively and gay disposition; and, though strictly virtuous, she was not sufficiently careful of her behaviour. She had been bred at the court of France, and contracted the easy carriage so familiar to that sprightly people. Calumny converted her imprudence into vice; and the Austrian party, who had been exasperated at the divorce of Catherine, improved the report, to render the king suspicious of her virtue. The passions of Henry were all in the extremes: he had no sooner conceived a jealousy of the queen, than her destruction was determined. He caused her to be arrested, and accused her of adultery before a committee of the House of Lords, on such slight circumstances, that to mention them is sufficient to confute them. The countess of Rochford, who had married the queen's brother, a woman of the most infamous character, accused her of carrying on a criminal correspondence with her own brother, but was not able to bring the least proof of her assertion. The parliament, however, always subservient to the monarch's passions, passed sentence of death upon the queen, though no evidence was produced against her. She protested her innocence to the last, and sent the king, as she was going to mount the scaffold, a very pathetic letter, which at once indicates the serenity of her mind, and that she met death with that decent confidence which always attends a mind conscious of its own integrity. "You have (said she) been continually raising me: from a private gentlewoman, you made me a marchioness; from a marchioness, a queen; and as you can raise me no higher in this world, you are this day sending me to be a saint in heaven." She was beheaded on the nineteenth of May, and buried privately in the Tower.

Thus fell the celebrated Anne Boleyn, who had so long reigned sovereign of Henry's affections. Her unhappy fate was deplored by the people, who considered her as the innocent victim of her husband's inordinate passion. If this opinion needed any confirmation, the behaviour of Henry himself was sufficient for that purpose. He married the lady Jane Seymour the very next day after her execution, so eager was he to satisfy his brutal appetite. His obdurate heart was not the least affected by the bloody catastrophe of a person who had for several years been the object of his most tender affections. Nor was he satisfied with this sanguinary action: he caused his marriage with Anne to be declared illegal, under pretence of a pre-contract of marriage with the earl of Northumberland. By this cruel process, Elizabeth, as well as Mary, became illegitimate.

Elizabeth was about three years of age when her mother fell a sacrifice to Henry's jealousy. She had been hitherto styled princess of Wales, but was now divested of that title. The princess Mary, whom he had treated with great severity on account of her tender attachment to her mother, and her refusing to renounce the pope's supremacy, was now persuaded by the Romish party to attempt a reconciliation with her father. Accordingly she subscribed to the king's supremacy, renounced the authority of the bishop of Rome, and acknowledged the illegality of her mother's marriage, in order the more effectually to remove the princess Elizabeth from the king's presence and affections. But Henry, though he was reconciled to Mary, continued his affection to Elizabeth: he caused her to be educated at court with all the care and tenderness of a father.

The late events rendered it necessary for the king to call a new parliament; and he soon found that the same obsequiousness prevailed in this as in the former assembly. They confirmed the late queen's divorce, declared the children by the king's two first marriages illegitimate, and adjudged the crown, after his decease, to the issue of his present queen, or any other person he might marry after her death. At the same time, they gave Henry full power to settle the mode of such succession, either by will, or letters patent under the great seal; and pronounced all those who maintained the validity of his two former marriages guilty of high-treason.

The suppression of the lesser monasteries now occasioned great disturbances in different parts of the kingdom; and the pope having repeated the sentence of excommunication against Henry, laid the kingdom under an interdict, and forbid his subjects to pay him any obedience. The monks exerted all their influence to persuade the people, that they were under an indispensable duty of taking up arms against a prince who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. The ignorant multitude eagerly listened to these insinuations; they had been always taught to consider as sacred what was now devoted to destruction. Upwards of twenty thousand men assembled in Lincolnshire, under the command of Thomas Mackerel, prior of Barlings. This undisciplined multitude published their grievances in a petition to the king, complaining of the suppression of the monasteries, the subversion of the ancient religion, the establishing new tenets, &c. Henry sent an answer to this petition, and dispatched the duke of Suffolk, at the head of a small body of troops, to reduce the insurgents to obedience. But they were in no condition to contend with regular forces; and on being promised a pardon, dispersed of themselves. Their leader, however, fell into the hands of the royalists, and paid his life as a forfeit to his temerity.

This insurrection was hardly suppressed, before another was excited in Yorkshire, which seemed to threaten more important consequences to the government. The rebels were headed by one Aske, a gentleman of fortune in that county, and well adapted, by his natural talents, to head a popular insurrection. The insurgents were joined by a little army of ejected monks, carrying before them a banner, on which a crucifix with five wounds, and a chalice, were painted. They wore the same device upon their sleeves, to animate them in the support of their religion. They styled their march "The Pilgrimage of Grace," and all who joined them were obliged to take an oath, "That they entered into the Pilgrimage of Grace for the love of God, the preservation of the king's person and issue, the purifying the nobility, and expelling all evil counsellors; not for any particular profit of their own, nor to kill any man through envy; but to support the true faith; procure the restitution of the church, and suppress heretics and their opinions." The people were deluded with these specious pretences; they flocked to this religious standard; and Aske soon found himself at the head of forty thousand men. Their first attempt was against the castle of Pontefract, which was considered as a place of strength, but soon surrendered to the insurgents. York and Hull were also easily reduced; and Aske obliged all the nobility in the county to join him, except Henry Clifford, earl of Cumberland, who defended Skipton-castle against all the attempts of the rebels.

The government was greatly distressed for want of troops; five thousand men only could be raised on this emergency. The duke of Norfolk, however, advanced, at the head of this little army, against the rebels; while Henry, in order to amuse them, published a proclamation, commanding all the nobility to meet him at Northampton on the seventh of November. The royalists were encamped at Doncaster, and the insurgents advanced into that neighbourhood. The river Till only separated the two armies; and the rebels attempted twice to pass it, in order to venture a battle, and were twice prevented from executing their purpose by violent falls of rain, which rendered the stream impassable. A superstitious terror now filled the breasts of the insurgents: they were persuaded that heaven itself opposed their design; and listened to the offers of the duke of Norfolk, who promised them a pardon. They dispersed, and returned to their respective habitations.

But this peace was but of a short continuance. The priests renewed their practices for disturbing the public peace; and soon collected a numerous body of men, who were persuaded that religion itself depended upon their defending the ancient superstitions of the church. The duke of Norfolk found it necessary to continue in the north during the winter; but by putting the martial law into strict execution against every one who refused to take the oath of supremacy, he, instead of lessening, increased the disorders. Two gentlemen, Musgrave and Treby, putting themselves at the head of eight thousand peasants, made an unsuccessful attempt on Carlisle, and were afterwards entirely routed by the duke of Norfolk. Musgrave made his escape; but Treby, with about seventy of his followers, being taken prisoners, were all hanged on the walls of Carlisle.

A. D. 1537. Exasperated at these frequent disturbances, Henry sent for the chiefs of the rebels to court, in order to prevent their engaging in any other insurrection. Afke readily obeyed the summons, and was received with kindness; but the lords Darcy and Hussy, together with several other chiefs of the rebels, refusing to obey the king's mandate, were seized, and beheaded on Tower-hill. These executions intimidated Afke: he retired into the country without a licence from the government, and was soon after hanged at York. Fortunately for Henry, the Scottish monarch, James V. was in France during these disturbances in the north of England; so that the rebels could receive no assistance from that kingdom.

Henry was now so used to slaughter, by the frequent executions, that he seemed to delight in blood. He ordered Thomas Fitzgerald, son to the late earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles, who had suffered a long confinement in the Tower for an insurrection in Ireland, to be executed, in order to intimidate the people, who seemed ripe for a revolt. But Stephen Fitzgerald, the earl's youngest son, escaped to the continent, and retired to cardinal Pole, who made use of him in the designs he had formed of recovering England to the obedience of the holy see.

While Henry was thus employed in chastising his rebellious subjects, his queen was delivered of a son at Hampton-Court, to the inexpressible joy of the nation in general, and of Henry in particular. He had now obtained the object of his ardent wishes; he was blessed with a son, the undoubted heir of all his dominions: but his satisfaction was greatly lessened by the death of the queen, which happened soon after her delivery. She was the most beloved of all his wives, and highly celebrated for her humble deportment, her goodness, and her affability. The king was so afflicted with his loss, that he secluded himself from all company several days. The young prince was baptized by the name of Edward, and three days after declared prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester.

A. D. 1538. The birth of a prince tended greatly to confirm Henry's power: he was feared by his subjects, and his friendship courted by the greatest princes of Europe. He now considered the monks as his greatest enemies, and determined to render them unable to give him any disturbance for the future. In order to this, he procured addresses from the two universities; wherein the pernicious nature of religious houses, which harboured only a multitude of lazy drones and swarms of impostors, were fully displayed, and the king requested to remove so great an evil. A visitation was accordingly appointed, and the visitors confounded guilt and innocence. Time and the passions had indeed introduced many corruptions into the cloisters; but it is not reasonable to believe, that the manners of the ecclesiastics should be totally depraved. In some of the religious houses, inventions to impose on popular credulity were discovered; false relics were employed, and false miracles were performed. Some impostures of a more artificial nature were also found by the visitors. At Hales, in Gloucestershire, had been shewn, for several ages, the blood of Christ, said to have been brought from Jerusalem; and it is natural to suppose, that a relic of such importance must be held in the highest estimation. This relic was supposed to be attended with very important circumstances: the sacred blood was not visible to any person in mortal sin, even when placed before him, till he had performed good works sufficient for his absolution. At the dissolution of the monastery, the whole contrivance was discovered. Two monks, who were entrusted with the secret, had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week. This they put into a phial, one side of which was clear and transparent, and the other thick and obscure. Furnished with this instrument of deception, they used it to their own emolument. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were sure to shew him the dark side of the phial, till masses and offerings had expiated his crimes; or rather till his money, faith, or patience, were nearly exhausted; when they turned the bright side of the phial, and blessed him with the sight he had so long and earnestly desired.

At Boxley, in Kent, was a crucifix remarkably famous, held in the highest veneration, and distinguished by the appellation of the Road of Grace. It had been often seen to move, to bend and rise itself, shake its head, hands and feet, roll its eyes, and move its lips. This instrument of religious deception being brought to London, it was broke in pieces at St. Paul's Cross, by Hilsey, bishop of Rochester, before a multitude of spectators; who, with their own eyes, beheld the springs and wheels by which it had been actuated.

It is no wonder that discoveries like these raised a general indignation. The authors of such scandalous abuses were detested; the monasteries were considered as infamous; and the crimes of a few were extended to the whole body of the religious. This gave Henry the advantage he desired; and the monks, convinced that it would be madness to make any opposition, surrendered their monasteries, and many of them received pensions for their subsistence. No less than six hundred and forty-five monasteries were dissolved, twenty-eight of which had abbots, who enjoyed seats in parliament. Ninety colleges were demolished in the several counties; two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chantries and free-chapels; and one hundred and ten hospitals. The whole annual revenue of these establishments amounted to one hundred and sixty thousand one hundred pounds; a sum which did not much exceed the twelfth part of the national income.

Whilst Henry was thus employed in demolishing the basis of superstition, it could not be supposed he would overlook the most famous and respected of all the instruments of popish idolatry, the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Becket was indebted, for the honour of being ranked among the saints, to the vigorous efforts he had exerted in defence of the authority of the Holy See; and a saint of that character must be highly obnoxious to Henry, who was determined to abolish the power of the Roman pontiff in England. He could not bear the thought, that such a furious and obstinate rebel to his prince should be held in the highest veneration by the people, his tomb frequented by pilgrims, and enriched with supererogatory presents. It was not uncommon, in these times, to carry on processions against the dead, and Henry availed himself of the practice. The life of Becket underwent a strict examination; his actions were condemned by the generality of the people; and the miracles pretended to be wrought at his tomb were proved to be forgeries. His name was therefore ordered to be erased out of the Calendar, the office composed for his festival expunged from the Breviary, his bones to be burnt, and his ashes dispersed by the winds. The rich shrine of the saint had also attracted the rapacity of Henry, who converted the whole to his own use. Among the spoils was a diamond esteemed the most valuable in Europe. It was a present from Lewis VII. of France, who made a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Thomas. This jewel was, by Henry's orders, set in a ring, and worn afterwards by that monarch on his thumb. At the same time, Henry, in order to reconcile the people to these innovations, erected six new bishoprics, gave large donations to his courtiers, and settled salaries on the abbots and monks. It was also pretended, that the crown would never more have occasion to levy taxes, but would be able, by the acquisition of the church-lands, to defray all expences of government. The people were, however, soon convinced, that those pleasing promises had no foundation, and that all the riches of the nation would not be sufficient to supply the prodigality of their monarch.

Intelligence of these proceedings no sooner reached Rome, than that city was filled with libels and satires against the person and conduct of Henry: he was represented as the most impious and sacrilegious tyrant that ever disgraced the royal title or dignity: he was compared to Belsazzar, Nero, Domitian, Dioclesian, and particularly to Julian the apostate, whom he was said to resemble in his learning and apostacy, though greatly inferior in moral duties. Cardinal Pole's style was easily distinguished in these invectives, which were soon dispersed over all Europe. Henry, whose vanity and sanguinary disposition daily increased, determined to revenge the insult. The cardinal himself was beyond his power; but several gentlemen of distinction, among whom were his two brothers, were arrested, as his accomplices in a conspiracy against the king's life; and all of them were executed, except Sir Geoffrey Pole, who was pardoned on account of his having discovered all he knew of the cardinal's intentions.

The Roman pontiff had hitherto suspended the bull of excommunication formerly passed against Henry, in hopes of being one day able to accommodate his difference with that monarch; but finding that the late proceedings in England had rendered a reconciliation impossible, he published the bull with great solemnity, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring powers against a prince whom he had conigned to destruction. He even offered the English crown to James of Scotland, provided he was able and willing to wrest it from Henry's head.

But the prince that had dared to drive the religious from their retreats, and committed to the flames the remains of Becket, was not to be intimidated. He knew that the thunder of the Vatican had lost its force; and that the cultivation of reason had removed a corner of the veil which ignorance and superstition had formed to conceal the rays of truth from the eyes of mankind. Henry therefore set the pope's power at defiance; and exacted a new oath from the clergy, by which they renounced the authority of the Roman pontiff. The new translation of the Bible was also now finished, and presented to the king by Cromwell, who was persuaded that nothing could so effectually eradicate the popish superstition as a free toleration of the scriptures in the vulgar tongue. But Henry, who halted half way between the Catholics and the Protestants, would not permit an indiscriminate use of the Scriptures; he would only allow a copy of the translation to be deposited in each parish church, where it was ordered to be fixed by a chain; and took care to inform the public by proclamation, "That this indulgence was not the effect of his duty, but of his goodness and liberality to them; who therefore should use it moderately, for the increase of virtue, not of strife: and ordered, that no man should read the Bible aloud, so as to disturb the priest while he sang mass, nor presume to expound doubtful passages without the advice of the learned." This indulgence was, however, considered as a great acquisition by the friends to the Reformation; especially as they obtained a royal warrant, enjoining the clergy to read the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in English. At the same time, they were ordered to recommend good works; and to teach the people, that relics, rosaries, and other superstitious trifles, were unnecessary to salvation.

A. D. 1539. Notwithstanding Henry had proceeded with such animosity against the Roman pontiff, he piqued himself on his zeal for the Catholic faith: he was even ambitious of defending it by disputation, as well as by persecution; and the doctrine of the real presence, or that of transubstantiation, the most incomprehensible of all the dogmas in the Romish religion, was the point he maintained with the greatest obstinacy. One Lambert, a schoolmaster of London, had ventured to doubt of the real presence; and being cited to appear before the bishops, he appealed to the king. Henry was charmed with having so fine an opportunity of displaying his theological talents. He thought it no derogation from his dignity to hold a public disputation with that reformer. Notice was accordingly given that the king intended to enter the lists against Lambert, and the prelates, the nobility, and many gentlemen of distinction were assembled on this occasion. The king himself appeared in all the ensigns of majesty seated upon his throne: and in the midst of this splendid assembly was produced the unhappy Lambert, and required to defend his opinion against his royal antagonist.

The conference was opened by the bishop of Winchester, who informed the schoolmaster, that the king had taken the present opportunity of convincing him of his errors; adding that if he still continued to persevere in his heretical opinions, he must expect the severest punishment. Lambert defended his opinion with great intrepidity: but the king assisted by ten bishops, who all engaged in the dispute, if indeed so partial a contest deserves the name, effectually confounded the disputant, after the conference had lasted five hours. But though confounded and reduced to silence, he was not convinced: and when the king asked him whether he would live or die? Lambert replied, that he threw himself entirely on his majesty's clemency. The king replied, that he protected not heretics, and that he must either abjure his opinions or perish. Lambert chose the latter; and died with the utmost intrepidity amidst the most dreadful tortures.

Intoxicated with the praises that had been lavished upon him during his dispute with Lambert, Henry exacted with more violence than ever, a submission to his religious sentiments. To think different from him on theological subjects, was equal to committing a capital crime; and he took the advantage of the fervility of his parliament, to make his own opinion the standard of orthodoxy in England. The chancellor informed the two houses, that it was his majesty's desire to extirpate from his kingdom all diversity of opinion with regard to religion; and a committee was immediately appointed to draw up a bill for effecting that purpose. But it was soon found that such a diversity of sentiments prevailed among the members of the committee that there was no hopes of their ever making a report. A bill was, therefore, drawn up, either by Henry himself, or some member of the privy council, and presented to the house, where it was passed into a law. It was called "the bill of the Six Articles," or as the protestants justly termed it, "The Bloody Bill." By this law the presence in the eucharist; communion in one kind; the perpetual obligation of vows of chastity; the celibacy of ecclesiastics; the utility of private masses; and the necessity of auricular confession, were established. Whoever denied the real presence was subjected to death by fire; nor was he even admitted to abjure his error. The punishment of the other articles was also remarkably severe; for though abjuration was admitted, the offender was punished by the confiscation of goods and chattels, and imprisonment. Those who continued obstinate, or who relapsed, were capitally punished. The clergy, who ventured to marry were also subject to death; and fines and imprisonment were inflicted on all those who refused to confess themselves, or to receive the eucharist at appointed seasons. It is difficult to conceive the idea of regulations more unjust and severe. Cranmer alone had the courage to oppose this bill; but when it was passed into a law, he immediately separated himself from his wife, and Henry was satisfied with this proof of his submission. Latimer and Shaxton threw up their bishoprics on account of this act, and were committed to prison.

Nor were the parliament more tenacious of their civil than their ecclesiastical liberties; for by one single act, without scruple, and almost without deliberation, ration, they totally subverted the English constitution. They passed a bill, by virtue of which the king's proclamation obtained the same force as a statute enacted by the whole legislative power.

By another act the king was empowered to nominate any number of bishops, sees for bishops, and cathedral churches, as he thought proper, and to endow them with such possessions as he might judge convenient. An act was also passed, by which the parliament invested in the crown all the abbey-lands, upon the false pretence, that the surrenders made by the abbots, priors, and superiors, had been "without constraint, of their own accord, and according to the due course of common law." Nor did any of the mitred abbots, who still kept their seats in the House of Peers, enter any protest against this statute; though it was sufficiently known that arts of all kinds had been employed; that every motive, calculated to work upon the frailty of human nature, had been set before them; and that it was at last with the utmost difficulty those dignified ecclesiastics agreed to a concession, which most of them regarded as destructive of their interests, as well as sacrilegious and criminal in itself.

The parliament also gave another instance of their condescension and meanness. They passed bills of attainder against cardinal Pole, the countess of Salisbury his mother, the marchioness of Exeter, Sir Adrian Fortescue, and Sir Thomas Dingley, without hearing any evidence to convict them of the crimes which were laid to their charge. The two gentlemen were executed, the marchioness was pardoned, and the countess received a reprieve.

As the libraries of several abbeys were well furnished with books, Henry, desirous of preserving whatever was valuable in these repositories, employed the famous antiquary John Leland to collect the most useful manuscripts, and other monuments of antiquity. He also intended to found a college for the study of the civil law, the purity of the Latin and French languages, and the knowledge of foreign affairs; to serve as a seminary for ministers of state and ambassadors. But the king's own prodigality, and the rapacity of his courtiers, rendered this, and several other similar designs, abortive.

The slavish concessions of the parliament had rendered Henry's will the law of the land; and both the Protestant and Popish parties cultivated his favour with the most abject submission. Bonner, lately made bishop of London, though in secret a zealous partizan of the pope's authority, found means, by the most profound dissimulation, to obtain letters patent for enjoying both the spiritual and temporal revenues of his see during the king's pleasure; and Gardiner, a bigotted son of the Romish church, maintained his influence by the most extravagant submission. These prelates encouraged the Catholics to be extremely vigilant in informing against all who refused to subscribe to the six articles; and no less than five hundred persons were soon thrown into prison. But though Cromwell and Cranmer had not interest enough to prevent the act from passing, they were able, for some time, to elude its execution: they even remonstrated against the cruelty of punishing so many delinquents, and obtained permission to set them at liberty. Thus the uncertainty of Henry's temper gave each party an opportunity of triumphing in their turn. The law of the six articles, which seemed intended to extirpate the reformed religion, was soon followed by a general permission for every one to have the new translation of the Bible in his family; a concession regarded by the Protestants as a decisive victory over the Catholics.

While the contest thus continued in suspense, both parties seemed to be persuaded that the final decision would, in a great measure, depend upon the choice of a future queen, the king having given several intimations of his intention to enter into a new marriage. He first cast his eyes on a daughter of the duke of Guise, but was informed that this princess was already betrothed to the king of Scotland. Cromwell therefore proposed Anne of Cleves, youngest sister to the dukes of Saxony. A flattering picture of that princess, drawn by the hand of Hans Holbein, determined Henry to apply to her father; and the marriage was soon after concluded, notwithstanding the negotiation was opposed by the elector of Saxony, and the princess was sent over to England. The marriage of Henry with this princess would, in all probability, have frustrated all the attempts of Gardiner and his party, had she answered the great character given by her friends of her beauty and accomplishments. But when Henry, who was impatient for a sight of his consort, saw her privately at Rochester, he was so disappointed, that he swore, "she was a great Flanders mare;" and declared, he could never bear her any affection. His aversion was increased, when he found she could speak only German, a language he did not understand; and that the charms of her conversation were not likely to compensate for the homeliness of her person. He would even have broken off the match abruptly, had not his affairs required the friendship of the German princes. A good understanding had, for some time, prevailed between the emperor and the king of France; and even such marks of union appeared, as occasioned great jealousy in the court of England. Henry therefore determined to complete his marriage; and told Cromwell, that since matters had gone so far, he must put his neck into the yoke.

A. D. 1540. The marriage was accordingly performed on the sixth of January; and Cromwell, who knew how greatly his own interest was concerned in this affair, was very anxious to learn from the king, next morning after the marriage, whether he now liked his spouse any better. The king answered, that he hated her more than ever; that her person was more loathsome on a near approach; and that he was determined never to meddle with her. He, however, continued to behave very kindly to the princess; nor gave any intimation of the disgust he had conceived against Cromwell for the share he had taken in this transaction.

The parliament meeting on the twelfth of April, Cromwell opened the session with a speech; in which he informed both houses, that the king, in order to terminate all disputes about religion, had appointed commissioners to examine the contested articles, that a standard of faith might be established on the solid basis of the sacred Scriptures; and that after the truth should be thus made known to his people, he was resolved to punish, with the utmost severity, all those who should presume to prefer their own opinion to the established articles of belief. Cromwell's speech was received with the highest applause; and the peers, in order to flatter the king in the person of his minister, declared, that he was worthy, by his deserts, to be vicar-general of the universe. At the same time, the minister seemed to be in the highest favour with his master, who created him earl of Essex, and installed him a knight of the garter.

The only religious order that now remained in England, was that of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, or of the Knights of Malta. The valour this order had exerted against the infidels, acquired them the favour of the people, and they resolutely refused to yield up their revenues to the king. Henry, determined not to suffer any society to exist in England that professed obedience to the pope, had recourse to the parliament for the dissolution of this order. But their revenues, though very large, were far from satisfying the rapacity of Henry; they were soon squandered away, and the king was obliged to have recourse to his parliament for a supply. He had always found that assembly very lavish of their liberties and the blood of their fellow-subjects, but very frugal of their money; and accordingly they strongly opposed the demand of this tyrannical monarch; nor was it without the utmost difficulty that he obtained the grant.

The king's marriage with Anne of Cleves, which had been principally effected by Cromwell, greatly lessened the power of that minister: Henry was secretly disgusted, and the favours he had lately conferred upon him were deceitful. The duke of Norfolk and Gardiner observed this prognostic of the minister's fall, and determined to improve it. They well knew, that he was hated by the nobility, because they saw themselves eclipsed at court by a person of mean extraction; that he was odious to the catholics, because they regarded him as a sworn enemy to the church of Rome; and that he was suspected by the protestants of having betrayed their interest through timidity. They did not, however, think it prudent to attack him abruptly, but to have recourse to stratagem. They introduced Catherine Howard, a beautiful young lady, and niece to the duke of Norfolk, at court. The king was highly pleased with Catherine; and Gardiner, at once the pander and the priest, made frequent entertainments at his own house for the royal lover and his mistress. The stratagem succeeded; Henry was so pleased with his mistress, that he offered to make her his partner in the throne.

In consequence of this new connection, the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner acquired the highest credit in the cabinet, and made use of the vilest insinuations to ruin the minister. They represented to Henry, that the nation in general was dissatisfied with his administration, and persuaded that Cromwell had abused his majesty's confidence. They added, that as these complaints and murmurings chiefly regarded religion, it would be prudent to satisfy the people by examining his conduct strictly, and even, if necessary, to sacrifice the vicar-general, in order to procure the tranquillity of the kingdom. Henry, who was exasperated against Cromwell, readily listened to these insinuations, and it was determined that the minister should fall a victim to the resentment of the public. He was accordingly arrested at the council-board, and immediately committed to the Tower. Cromwell now experienced the common fate of degraded ministers, that of being forsaken by all his friends: Cranmer alone endeavoured to support him. The more the parliament had flattered him in his prosperity, the more they insulted him in his disgrace. They accused him of heresy and treason, and condemned him to death without examination, and without evidence. In vain he implored the clemency of the king in a letter written in the most affecting strain, and containing the most earnest supplications. Henry was deaf to the soft whispers of humanity; his brutal heart was a stranger to mercy. The minister was executed without delay; and all his services disregarded or forgotten. Cromwell was a man of industry and ability, and worthy of a better master, and a better fate. Though raised from a plebeian origin, he behaved with no insolence to his inferiors; nor forgot in his prosperity to return the obligations he had received during his low condition: no person had cause to complain of his ingratitude.

Henry had now the pleasure of perceiving that the obstacles which had hitherto prevented his divorce, were removed: the two powerful monarchs Charles V. and Francis I. were no longer friends. Charles having occasion to visit Flanders to suppress an insurrection, had begged permission of Francis to pass through his dominions. The request was very readily granted; he was received by Francis with unsuspicious courtesy, and even intrusted with the secrets of his allies. Charles was no sooner out of reach of danger, than he profitted by this indiscretion; he exposed Francis to the resentment of the king of England; and though by acting so treacherous a part, he proved himself unworthy of all confidence, he found means to procure the friendship of a prince, who knew no other rule of conduct than his passions and his caprice.

It was now determined by Henry to procure a divorce from Anne of Cleves; and found no difficulty in obtaining a decision from the convocation in his favour. It was said that there had been a pre-contract between the queen and the marquis of Lorraine; that the king had not "inwardly" given his consent, and that he had never consummated his marriage. These objections were certainly very frivolous, but as the queen made no opposition, they were thought sufficient, sentence was pronounced for a dissolution of the marriage, and the decision of the clergy was ratified by the parliament. The queen expressed no dissatisfaction. She was satisfied on being informed, that the king, would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted sister, and give her precedence before all the ladies of England, except his own wife and daughters; that an estate of three thousand pounds a year should be allotted for her maintenance; and that she might either live in England, or return to her own country. She chose the former, and was even prevailed upon to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, informing him, that she had been treated in the most tender and generous manner by the king, though she could not have him for her husband; and conjuring him not to break the harmony that subsisted between the two courts, on account of any thing that had happened to her in England. Thus was the marriage with Anne of Cleves dissolved on the most frivolous pretences that ever were urged before any court of justice.

This obstacle being removed, Catherine Howard was declared queen of England, after having been for some time privately married to Henry. But this marriage had no effect on the conduct of Henry; cruelty seemed to have taken possession of his soul. Papists and reformers were equally the objects of his infernal passion; they both suffered for the tenets of their religion. The former denied the king's supremacy, and the latter the real presence in the sacrament; both were contrary to the religious establishment of Henry, and therefore both equally obnoxious to punishment. Dr. Barnes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming minister, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney, were condemned to the stake for heresy; but they did not suffer alone, three bigotted catholics shared the same fate, and perished in the same flames, for denying the king's supremacy. Barnes discussed theological questions even at the stake; and as the debate between him and the sheriff turned upon the invocation of saints, he said, that he doubted whether the saints could pray for us; but if they could he hoped, in half an hour, to be praying for the sheriff and all the spectators. This promiscuous punishment of protestants and catholics gave occasion to a foreigner, then in England, to say, That it was of no consequence whether they were for or against the pope, since both lost their lives for their opinions.

But it could not be expected that such despotic cruelty could be executed without exciting the hatred of the people; they conceived an abhorrence for the authors of such detestable proceedings, and some alarming symptoms of an insurrection appeared in several parts of the kingdom. The king's suspicion fell upon cardinal Pole; and this was to him a sufficient reason for putting the countess of Salisbury, the mother of that prelate, to death. She was the last of the Plantagenet race, and venerable both for her age and her virtues. She was led to the place of execution; but even in those distressful circumstances she did not lose her courage. She refused to submit to a sentence pronounced without a trial; and, running about the scaffold, she told the executioner, that if he would have her head, he must win it in the best manner he could. Nor was it till after he had aimed many blows at her neck, that he at last gave her the fatal stroke.

The frequent insurrections of popish faction in the northern counties had so often alarmed Henry, that he now determined to visit those parts in person, in order, if possible, to terminate these disorders, by punishing, with the utmost severity, all who had dared to disturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. The inhabitants were no strangers to his cruel disposition, and therefore wisely determined to deprecate his vengeance, by offering him a considerable sum of money. Henry accepted of the commutation, and desisted from carrying his inhuman designs into execution. Before he left London, he had dispatched Sir Ralph Sadler into Scotland, to propose an interview with James V. and the Scottish monarch had agreed to meet him at York, in order to concert measures for preserving the peace of both kingdoms.

Scotland had, for some time, felt the zeal and fury of sectaries, as well as England: the torch of civil discord flamed both in the northern and southern parts of the British isles. Patrick Hamilton, a young man of a noble family, destined for the church, having, about the year 1527, been sent abroad for his education, imbibed the opinions of the reformers; and, on his return to Scotland, diffused not his religious sentiments. A Dominican, who had insinuated himself into his friendship, perfidiously accused him before the archbishop of St. Andrews. He was tried, condemned to be burnt for his errors, and suffered with all the resolution of an hero. At the stake he cited his accuser to the tribunal of Jesus Christ; and the Dominican, either astonished at his constancy, or overcome with remorse, soon after lost his senses, and expired. The death of Hamilton, who was now considered both as a prophet and a martyr, brought over a great number of profelytes to the Reformation. Among others, was friar Forest, who became a zealous preacher, and professed an extreme attachment to the holy scriptures; which, in those times, was considered as a sure characteristic of heresy. Forest was therefore soon after brought to his trial, and condemned to the flames. While the priests were deliberating on the most proper place for his execution, one of their hearers advised them to burn him in some cellar; "for (said he) the smoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton affected all those on whom it blew."

Such was the state of religious disputes in Scotland when James received the invitation from Henry to meet him at York. The nobility persuaded him to accept the offer; hoping, that if an union was formed between the two princes, they should be able to enrich themselves with the spoils of the church. The clergy were alarmed; they dreaded the consequences of such an interview; and determined, if possible, to prevent it. They represented the danger of making any innovations in the established religion; the pernicious consequences of aggrandizing the nobility, already too powerful; the hazard of putting himself in the hands of the English; and the dreadful situation of his country, should he, by pursuing such impolitic measures, lose the friendship of France. At the same time, they offered him a present gratuity of fifty thousand pounds Scots, and promised that the church should be always ready to contribute liberally to the necessities of the state. These representations, assisted by the influence of the queen, induced James to change his resolution. He delayed his journey for some days, and then sent excuses to Henry, who waited for him at York. The English monarch was not of a temper to bear tamely this affront: he vowed the most severe revenge; but an event, which happened soon after his departure, rendered it necessary for him to return to his capital, and defer, for a season, his revenge against the king of Scotland.

While Henry continued at York, one Lascelles informed the archbishop of Canterbury, that the queen, in the former part of her life, had been little better than a common strumpet. He offered to confirm his information by the evidence of his sister, who had lived as a servant in the old dutchess of Norfolk's house, where the queen had been educated, and where she had carried on a criminal intrigue with Derham and Mannoek, two menial servants. Struck with this intelligence, which it was dangerous either to conceal or discover, Cranmer communicated it to the chancellor and the earl of Hertford, and requested their advice with regard to the most prudent method of proceeding in so delicate an affair. They knew that Henry, though extremely scrupulous in every particular that regarded his honour, was captivated by the youth, beauty, and agreeable disposition of Catherine. He had even put up a prayer in his chapel, returning thanks to heaven for the felicity he enjoyed in the conjugal state; and had desired the bishop of Lincoln to compose a form of thanksgiving for that purpose. But notwithstanding these demonstrations of the king's esteem for Catherine, it was resolved that the matter should not be buried in silence, and that the primate himself was the most proper person to disclose it to his Majesty. Cranmer, unwilling to speak upon so delicate a subject, wrote a narrative of the whole proceeding, and sent it by a special messenger to the king. It is impossible to express the surprize and confusion of Henry when he received the archbishop's relation of the queen's infamous conduct; but, at the same time, he was so fully convinced of his consort's fidelity, that he at first gave no credit to the information, and declared that he looked upon the whole as a malicious forgery; but as he could not rest till he knew the certainty of the matter, he ordered it to be inquired into with such precautions as might preserve the queen from any scandal, should she be found innocent. It was therefore resolved, that the lord privy-seal should examine Lascelles. This he accordingly did, and found him steady in his information. The sister of Lascelles was next examined, and she confirmed the testimony of her brother by undeniable evidence. It was now thought necessary to arrest Derham and Mannoek, which was easily done, as they had not the least suspicion of their danger. They both confessed repeated acts of impurity with the queen before her marriage; and it was also proved, that she had since entertained one Culpepper a whole night in her chamber.

When Henry received the report of these examinations, his grief and distraction deprived him of speech; he vented his distress in a torrent of tears. He appointed the primate, the chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suffolk, and the bishop of Winchester, to interrogate the queen on this subject. She at first denied the charge; but finding her illicit amours were fully discovered, she confessed the whole to the archbishop, who wrote the narrative from her mouth, and she signed it with her own hand. Henry was now convinced of the infidelity of his queen, and determined to take a severe revenge on her, and all her accomplices.

A.D. 1542. A parliament, the usual instrument of Henry's tyranny, was immediately summoned; and the queen's confession being laid before them, they presented an address to his majesty, in which, after entreating him not to be concerned at this untoward misfortune, to which all men are subject, they desired leave to frame a bill of attainder against the queen and her accomplices. They received a gracious answer; and proceeded immediately to attain of high-treason the queen, and the countesses of Rochford, who had conducted her secret amours; and in this act both Derham and Culpepper were included. They also passed a bill of attainder for misprison of treason against the old dutchess of Norfolk, Catherine's grandmother, lord William Howard and his lady, the countess of Bridgewater, and nine other persons; because they were acquainted with the queen's illicit amours, and did not make the necessary discovery before her marriage. Under this tyrannical government the ties of natural affection became crimes; and it was expected that relations should expose the secret failings of each other. Nor were the parliament ashamed to assist the fury and madness of the king. They passed an act, whereby it was declared, that any person who knew, or vehemently suspected any guilt in the queen, and did not, within twenty days, reveal it to the king or council, should be guilty of treason; and that if the king married any woman who had been incontinent, taking her for a true maid, she should be guilty of treason, unless she previously revealed her guilt to him. The people made themselves extremely merry with this extravagant clause. It was pleasantly remarked, that the king must, for the future, look out for a widow, as no reputed maid would ever venture to incur the penalty of the statute.

These acts being passed, the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded, the twelfth of February, upon Tower-hill. The queen confessed her misconduct in the former part of her life; but endeavoured to persuade the world, that she had never transgressed the rules of virtue since her marriage with the king. Lady Rochford found very little pity from the spectators: her execution was considered as a judgment from heaven for her having been the principal cause of the death of Anne Boleyn, and that of her own husband; and this notorious instance of her profligate life tended greatly to clear their characters in the opinion of the world. With regard to the dutchess dowager of Norfolk, and the other persons attainted of misprision of treason, Henry himself seems to have been sensible of the cruelty of their sentence, for he soon after granted them a pardon.

These domestic distresses would have diverted from theological disputes the mind of any prince less jealous than Henry of extending his opinions. He had some time since nominated commissioners for ascertaining the proper articles of belief, in order to establish an uniformity of sentiments in matters of faith and religion; and the parliament passed a law, by which they ratified all the tenets which ought to be acknowledged; and in which they declared they had no other rule, either in religious or temporal concerns, than the will of their master. The produce of the labours of these commissioners, or rather the caprices of Henry, was a small work, intitled, "The Institutions of a Christian Man." This book was received by the convocation, and voted to be the infallible standard of orthodoxy, though it consisted partly of Catholic, and partly of Protestant doctrines. But Henry was not long pleased with his own production. He published another work, intitled, "The Erudition of a Christian Man;" and this, though it differed considerably from the former, was established as the genuine Creed of the professors of Christianity. It was necessary for the people to change their opinions as often as their sovereign. He now retracted the permission he had so lately given his subjects in general to read the Scriptures, restraining that concession to gentlemen only; and even these were allowed to read in such a manner, "That it be done quietly, and with good order." He also made alterations in the missal; ordained that the name of the pope should be erased or blotted out of every book where it was mentioned; and by endeavouring to set bounds to the spirit of disputation, he increased the ardour of zeal, and irritated the taste for innovation. But amidst all the ridiculous creeds which he imposed upon his subjects, he was always attentive to inculcate a passive obedience to his power, and held both the clergy and people in the most slavish subjection.

Henry was now determined to revenge the affront he had received from the Scottish monarch. He published a manifesto, in which he reproached James with the breach of his promise, with having afforded an asylum to several English rebels, and with retaining some territories which belonged to England. He also revived the old claim of the dependence of the crown of Scotland, and summoned James to do homage for his kingdom. The Scottish monarch made no answer to this declaration; but employed his whole attention to raise an army, in order to disappoint the ambitious designs of Henry. His resentment was greatly increased by the French ambassador, who had brought with him considerable supplies of men and money, and was extremely lavish of the promises he made, in the name of his master, of effectual assistance and support.

The command of the English army was given to the duke of Norfolk, who rendezvoused his forces at Newcastle. The earl of Southampton was appointed to command the van; but he died at Newcastle, universally regretted for his abilities as a statesman, and his approved courage and prudence as a general. On the twentieth of October, the English army entered Scotland, and were met by a herald from James, who expostulated with the duke of Norfolk on the injustice of invading the kingdom before any declaration of war had been published. But his remonstrances were in vain: the English general ravaged all the country bordering on the Tweed, and retired to Berwick on account of the severity of the weather. The earl of Huntley had indeed been sent by James, at the head of ten thousand men; but his forces were so far inferior to the English, that he was obliged to act wholly on the defensive.

This invasion did not, however, terrify the Scottish monarch: he levied an army of fifteen thousand men; and being joined by the earl of Huntley with a train of artillery, he determined to invade England on the western side of the Solway Firth. James repaired thither in person; but as soon as every thing was ready for crossing into England, he left the army under the command of his favourite, Oliver Sinclair, who was hated by the Scottish nobility. The consequences of so imprudent an action were soon apparent. The officers chose to sacrifice their king, their country, and their own honour, rather than serve under a person they detested. Accordingly, when Sinclair read his commission at the head of the army, the nobility retired from their posts; and the soldiers following their example, threw down their arms, so that the uproar and confusion became general thro' the whole army. A body of five hundred English forces, under the command of Sir Thomas Wharton, who hovered round the Scottish camp to observe the motions of the enemy, perceiving the disorder that prevailed among their ranks, attacked them with so much fury, that they sought their safety in a precipitate flight. The earls of Caillies and Glencairn, the lords Maxwell, Fleming, Somerville, and Gray, the general Sinclair, with about two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred common soldiers, were taken prisoners, and all their artillery and baggage fell into the hands of the English.

This action, or rather rout, happened at Solway Moss, in the neighbourhood of Carlisle. James was then at Caerlaveroc, where he received the alarming intelligence of the defeat and dissipation of his army by an handful of English forces. He could not support the disgrace: his rage and regret so affected his spirits, that he repaired immediately to his bed, and soon after expired, in the flower of his age. Before his death, news arrived that his queen was safely delivered; on which he asked, with some emotion, whether she had brought him a son or a daughter? Being told the latter, he turned about in his bed, and exclaimed, "How many miseries await this poor kingdom! Henry will be master of it, either by arms or by marriage."

The death of James, and the birth of a daughter, heirs of a kingdom whose friendship was of so much importance to England, gave a new turn to the deliberations in the English council. It was now determined not to drive the Scots to despair, by taking the utmost advantage of the late victory: on the contrary, a scheme was formed for uniting the two kingdoms by a marriage between Edward prince of Wales and the young queen of Scotland. The Scottish prisoners were accordingly interrogated on this subject; and as they were well disposed to encourage the contrivance, they were all set at liberty, on condition of their promising to return to London, if the project should become abortive.

A.D. 1543. The English parliament meeting on the twenty-second of January, were so well pleased with with the success of Henry's arms against the Scots, that they granted him a considerable subsidy. They afterwards passed an act for permitting the nobility, gentry, and merchants, to have English bibles, and other religious books mentioned in the statute, in their houses, for the instruction of their families. This act, which was procured by the influence of Cranmer, contained a clause, which mitigated the punishment of those who should be found guilty of heresy; but the king was empowered either to repeal or suspend the force of the act whenever he found it expedient.

The Scottish prisoners, on their return, found their country involved in confusion. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, was, after the infant prince, the next heir to the crown. He was a nobleman of a weak capacity, of a peaceable disposition, and a friend to the Reformation; but not at all adapted to hold the helm of government in these tempestuous times. The friends of the reformed religion, who were now pretty numerous in Scotland, exhorted him, however, to claim the regency, by virtue of his proximity of blood. Arran listened to their importunities, and resolved to demand it at the meeting of the next parliament. He was powerfully opposed by the popish faction, at the head of whom was Cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrews, and primate of Scotland; a priest of unpopular manners, a zealous Roman Catholic, and of a persecuting spirit. He published the will of the late monarch soon after his death, by which that prince had left the government to him, in conjunction with the earls of Argyle, Huntley, and Murray. By virtue of this instrument, which is said to have been forged by that ambitious churchman, he took possession of the government; and having joined his interest with that of the queen-dowager, sister to the duke of Guise, he obtained the consent of the convention of the states, and excluded the pretensions of the earl of Arran.

He did not, however, long enjoy the power he had usurped. The return of the Scottish prisoners enabled Arran to make the most powerful opposition to the cardinal's administration; and the nation being exasperated at his forgery, the majority of the parliament declared in favour of Arran, and the cardinal was committed to prison. A negotiation was immediately opened with Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador; and a treaty of marriage was concluded; by which it was stipulated, that the queen should remain in Scotland till she was ten years of age; that she should then be sent to England, in order to be educated; that six Scotch noblemen should be sent as hostages to Henry; and that Scotland, notwithstanding its union with England, should still preserve its laws and privileges. But Beaton, having found means to escape from prison, excited the ecclesiastics against this treaty, and awakened the natural antipathy of the Scots against the English. The popish party were indefatigable in persuading the people, that an union with England must be productive of their own slavery. Their endeavours had the desired effect; the English ambassador was insulted by the populace, and the regent had no longer any power to protect him. Persuaded that these violent proceedings must occasion a rupture between the two kingdoms, Sadler summoned the prisoners to return to England, pursuant to their engagements; but all of them refused to obey, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Cassilis, who preferred his honour to his liberty. Henry was so pleased with this noble behaviour, that he received him with great marks of esteem, loaded him with presents, and gave him his liberty without ransom. Beaton was not at all displeased at this refusal of the prisoners, though it reflected disgrace upon their country. He well knew that they must now depend wholly on the government for support, and oppose the English with all their power. A war was now expected between the two kingdoms, and Francis engaged to support the interest of Scotland.

But however desirous the French monarch might be of assisting his Scottish allies, the war he was already engaged in with the emperor rendered it very difficult to send forces sufficient to support them against the power of the English monarch. Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox, was then at the French court; and Francis being informed that he was engaged in an ancient and hereditary enmity with the family of Hamilton, by whom his father had been murdered, proposed that he should visit his native country, and join in supporting the cardinal and the queen-mother; promising, that a supply of money, and, if necessary, even military succours, should be sent after him. He was also flattered with the hopes of espousing the queen-dowager; and in case of the death of Mary, the infant prince, of ascending the Scottish throne in preference of the earl of Arran, whose legitimacy was liable to some objections. Tempted by these alluring prospects, Lenox returned to Scotland, and, on his arrival, exerted all his interest for breaking off the marriage treaty. He assembled a considerable number of forces, in order to wrest the young queen from the hands of the regent; who being unable or unwilling to contend with his enemies, agreed to an accommodation. This important point being gained, the queen and the cardinal, who had now no farther occasion for the assistance of Lenox, desired Francis to recall him; but the earl, informed of their design, withdrew to his castle at Dumbarton, and the following year threw himself into the arms of the English.

Henry, exasperated at the behaviour of Francis, determined to join the emperor against him. He had, indeed, some grounds for complaint against that monarch, besides his behaviour with regard to Scotland. He said, that Francis had engaged to separate himself entirely from the see of Rome, and had not performed his promise; and that he had refused to pay the sums which were due to him. These reasons were sufficient for Henry to abandon the alliance of Francis, and to conclude with the emperor an offensive and defensive league against France. A message was now sent to the French king, requiring him to renounce his alliance with the Turks, and to make reparation for the damage the infidels had done in Christendom. Francis refused the haughty demand, and a declaration of war was the immediate consequence. Charles V. affected to consider Francis as guilty of the greatest crime, by having formed a league with the sultan Solymán; though he should have remembered, that his own ambitious projects had obliged him to court the friendship of the Turks.

An event happened about this time, which gave the Protestants some hopes of enjoying their religion unmolested. The king, on the twelfth of February, married Catherine Parr, widow to Neville, lord Latimer; a woman of great virtue and prudence, and well affected to the reformed religion. By this marriage Henry fulfilled the prophecy uttered in jest, that he would be obliged to espouse a widow. But this event did not put an end to the persecutions carried on against the reformers. A few days after the king's marriage, Anthony Personne, a priest; Robert Testwood, a singing-man; and Henry Fulmer, a taylor; were, at the instigation of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, burnt at Windsor, for reading the writings of the reformed. At the same time, the bishop's own secretary was executed, for denying the king's supremacy.

The league formed between Charles and Henry threatened Francis with the loss of his kingdom. The French monarch, therefore, took the field early, and was successful. The duke of Cleves, an ally of Francis, opened the campaign with a victory over the Imperial forces; and Francis made himself master of the whole dutchy of Luxembourg, and afterwards of Landrecy. But Charles had no sooner assembled his army in the Low Countries, than he took almost every castle in the dutchy of Cleves, and reduced the duke to submit to very rigorous terms. He was soon after joined by six thousand English, under the command of Sir John Wallop, and immediately invested the town of Landrecy. Francis, however, found means to throw succours into the place; and the season being far advanced, Charles was obliged to raise the siege: he, however, made himself some amends, by taking the city of Cambray.

A. D. 1544. The winter season having put a period to military operations, Henry convoked a parliament, where the princesses Mary and Elizabeth were restored to their right of succession. But, what is very singular, Henry would not suffer the parliament to reverse the statute which declared them illegitimate. At the same time, he prevailed upon both houses to invest him with a power of still excluding them, whenever he might think proper. Two very singular acts were also passed this session, and both, in the highest degree, dishonourable. The first gave a full remission to the king of the several debts he had lately incurred by a general loan exacted from his subjects; and even ordained, that those of them who had already received payment, either in whole or in part, should refund the sums they had received to the exchequer. The other established a new oath for the security of his ecclesiastical institutions, and it was enacted, that all those who had taken the former oaths to that purpose, should be supposed to have taken the new one; an absurdity which has, perhaps, no equal in parliamentary proceedings. Henry was, however, afraid of the usual economy of the parliament, and would not expose himself to the mortification of a refusal. But as his usual prodigality had drained his treasury, and as he was unable, without money, to prosecute his wars against France and Scotland, he exacted new loans from his subjects, levied a benevolence, and employed every expedient which the prerogative at that time allowed him.

As soon as the season would permit, Henry sent a fleet and army to invade Scotland. The fleet amounted to near two hundred sail, and had on board a body of ten thousand men. Dudley, lord Lisle, commanded the navy, and the earl of Hertford the land forces. The troops were landed in the neighbourhood of Leith; and, after defeating a small body that opposed their landing, they took that town, and thence advanced to Edinburgh, the gates of which were soon forced; and the city, after being pillaged by the soldiers, was set on fire. The regent and the cardinal being in no condition to oppose so great a force, retired to Stirling. No opposition being made to the English, they continued their ravages, burnt Haddington and Dunbar, and retired into England, having lost only forty men in the whole expedition. This incursion has been censured as ill-concerted: for it is said, if Henry intended to solicit an alliance, he behaved with too much violence; and if he meant to make a conquest, he neglected to improve his success. It may, however, be observed, that having, in conjunction with the emperor, formed the project of an invasion of France, he was solicitous of employing his whole force on the continent.

The plan formed by these two powerful princes, was to invade France at the head of an army of above one hundred thousand men; and it was agreed to march directly to Paris, without entering upon any siege, and thence proceed to the entire conquest of the kingdom. Had this plan been executed, France would, in all probability, have been ruined; for Francis could not oppose to these formidable preparations above forty thousand men. But fortunately for the French monarch, the emperor, at the head of an army of sixty thousand men, had taken the field before Henry landed at Calais; and not to lose time while he was waiting for his confederate, Charles sat down before Luxembourg, and soon made himself master of the place. He thence proceeded to Cambray on the Meuse, which soon surrendered. Ligny met with the same fate; but St. Dezier on the Marne, which he next besieged, made a brave resistance, under the command of Sancerre, the governor.

While the emperor was employed in reducing these places, Henry landed at Calais at the head of thirty thousand men, accompanied by the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk; the earls of Arundel, Oxford, and Surry; the lords St. John, Ferrers of Chartley, Montjoy, and Grey of Wilton; Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Francis Bryan; and a great number of the most opulent persons in the kingdom. Soon after his arrival, he was joined by the count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thousand infantry and four thousand horse. Henry finding the emperor employed in taking places, imitated his example, and invested Montreuil and Boulogne. These sieges necessarily produced delays; and Charles finding the season considerably advanced, and that the scheme for subduing France was likely to prove abortive, concluded a separate peace with Francis. In consequence of this treaty, the count de Buren withdrew his forces from the English army, and Henry was obliged to raise the siege of Montreuil. He had, indeed, taken Boulogne; but this acquisition was of little consequence, when compared with the immense expence of his military preparations.

A. D. 1545. Francis, determined, if possible, to distress Henry, employed the whole winter in fitting out a fleet to invade the coasts of England. They sailed early in the month of July; and on the eighteenth, advanced towards the English fleet, then riding at St. Helens. Here a cannonade began, which lasted several hours, but with very little effect, the art of gunnery being then in its infancy, and the guns and tackle very ill adapted to the intended purpose. Finding their attempt to destroy the English ships abortive, they landed on the Isle of Wight, where they committed the most dreadful ravages, till the militia of the country advanced against them, and drove them to their ships.

Henry now found it impossible to support this expensive war without having recourse to his parliament, who granted him a small subsidy. The clergy were more liberal; and it is remarkable, that during the establishment of the Catholic religion, greater sums were always contributed by the church than the laity. Hence the emperor, when he was informed of the suppression of the English monasteries, and of Henry's profuse donations of their revenues among his courtiers, is reported to have said; "That he had killed the hen which brought him the golden eggs." But though the parliament were so remarkably tenacious of their own money, they were amazingly profuse with regard to the substance of others. They now bestowed upon Henry all the revenues of the universities, chapels, and hospitals; a liberality that regarded the property which ought, perhaps, in justice, to have been the last to have been disposed of. The king, however, took care to inform the universities, that he meant not to encroach upon their endowments. Some idea may be formed of the prostitution of this parliament by one of their statutes, in which they acknowledge, that the king had been always, by the word of God, supreme head of the church of England: that the bishops, and other ecclesiastics, had no manner of jurisdiction, but by his royal mandate; and that he alone was invested with full authority to correct all manner of heresies, errors, vices, and sins. The king made a long and elaborate speech to this parliament, in which he complained of the dissensions that prevailed among his subjects with regard to religion. He told them, "That the several pulpits were become a kind of batteries against each other; where one preacher called another heretic and anabaptist, which was retaliated by the opprobrious terms of papist and hypocrite: that he had permitted his people the use of the scriptures, not in order to furnish them with matter for dispute and railing, but that he might enable them to reform their consciences; and instruct their children and families: that he was grieved to the heart to find how that precious jewel was prostituted, by being introduced into the conversation of every alehouse and tavern, and employed as a pretence for decrying the spiritual and legal pastors: and that he was sorry to observe, that the word of God, while it was the object of so much anxious speculation, had very little influence on their practice; and that though an imaginary knowledge so greatly abounded, charity was daily going to decay." These observations were certainly just; but the example of the king, who encouraged speculation and dispute, was ill adapted to promote that charity and peaceable submission to the established opinion he so strongly recommended.

A. D. 1546. The subsidies voted by parliament enabled Henry to make new preparations for carrying the war into France; but an accident happened at the opening of the campaign, which gave very little hopes of success to the English. The earl of Surry, who commanded the English forces in Boulogne, attempted to intercept a convoy of provisions going to the fort of Outre Eau, which the French had built at the mouth of the port; but was obliged to return with some loss, without effecting his purpose. This was followed by a more considerable defeat. The earl, not the least intimidated by his late unsuccessful attempt, attacked the Marshal de Biez, who was conducting a much larger convoy. But Fortune again declared for the French: the English general was routed, with the loss of about eight hundred men killed on the spot, and one hundred and twenty taken prisoners, among whom was Sir Edward Poyning.

These misfortunes induced Henry, whose animosity against Francis was neither violent nor personal, to think of listening to the terms which had been offered for a peace. He had sufficiently gratified his capricious humour by the short war he had carried on against his former ally; and having reason to apprehend, from his great increase in corpulency, and visible decay of strength, that his end was approaching, he was desirous of finishing a quarrel which might prove dangerous to the kingdom during the minority of his son. Francis was still more desirous of a peace, and it was concluded on the following conditions:

"That the king of France should pay regularly the pension settled by former treaties.

"That Francis should pay in eight years the sum of two millions of golden crowns, in consideration of the pension, and the expence Henry had been at in reducing Boulogne."

"That the king of England should keep possession of Boulogne, together with its territories, till the whole debt was discharged.

"That when all the sums should be paid to Henry, Boulogne should be restored to France, in the same condition as when taken by the English."

The emperor was included in this peace: and with regard to Scotland, Henry agreed, that it should enjoy the same benefit, provided the Scots gave him no cause to make war upon them. Thus Henry terminated a war which had cost him above one million three hundred and forty-three thousand pounds sterling; and all he acquired in return, was only a bad security for a debt which did not amount to one-third of the value. All Henry's expeditions were nearly of the same kind.

But neither experience nor reflection could cure Henry of the madness of introducing new systems of faith, and endeavouring to establish an uniformity of opinion among all ranks of people. He had hitherto strictly ordered divine service to be performed in no other language than the Latin; but he now permitted the Litany to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue; and added to it one petition, "to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and from all his detestable enormities." Cranmer endeavoured to make still farther innovations; and had probably succeeded, had not Gardiner, who was then at the court of the emperor, as ambassador from Henry, wrote to the king, informing him, that if he continued to carry his opposition against the Catholic religion any farther, the emperor would break off all commerce with him. About the same time, Cranmer lost a sincere, and one of his most powerful friends, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, brother-in-law to the king. That nobleman was well affected to the Reformation, took every opportunity to support its professors, and had always maintained a cordial and steady friendship with the king. Henry was sitting in council when he was informed of Suffolk's death, and dropped a tear to his memory; declaring at the same time, that during his whole life, he had never made any attempt to injure an adversary, nor ever whispered a word to the disadvantage of any person. Deprived of this sincere and generous friend, Cranmer himself was exposed to the cabals of the courtiers. His enemies, under the mask of a zeal for orthodoxy, represented the primate as an encourager of heresy. Henry saw their malice, and reproved them in the severest terms. He told them, that he was well acquainted with Cranmer's merit, as well as with their envy and malevolence. Adding, that he was determined to crush all their cabals; and since gentle methods were in vain, to teach them, by the severest discipline, a more dutiful concurrence in promoting his service.

But though the primate himself was beyond the reach of his enemies, the spirit of persecution was far from having subsided: the good and the virtuous still felt the fiery hand of a bigotted zeal. Anne Ascue, a young woman of great merit, who had entered into a strict connection with the queen, was accused of having denied the real presence in the sacrament. Bonner drew from her a recantation; but she qualified it in such a manner as did not satisfy that furious prelate. She was therefore thrown into prison; and her courage being rather roused than depressed by this severity, she wrote to the king, declaring, that with regard to the mystery of the eucharist, she believed as much as Christ had revealed of it, and as much as the Catholic church required; but as she presumed to question the king's explanation of this tenet, this declaration was considered as an insult. The chancellor Wriothesley, a person intoxicated with religious zeal, was sent to examine her with regard to her patrons at court, and the great ladies with whom she had been intimate. But this scheme proved abortive: she refused to discover any of her friends: and though she was put to the torture in the most cruel manner, she still continued resolute in preserving an inviolable secrecy. She was immediately carried to the place of execution, and burnt alive, without having shewn the least inclination to retract. Three other persons suffered with her, and imitated her courage and constancy. All the arguments used by the bishop of Salisbury to prevail upon them to recant their errors, were urged in vain. They maintained their tenets in the midst of the flames, and seemed to glory in their sufferings.

The fidelity and secrecy of Anne Ascue preserved the queen, who had been her principal confidant; but she soon after found herself in the utmost danger of falling a victim to the dogmatical zeal of her husband. Henry, who was now very corpulent, and of a bad habit of body, was afflicted with an ulcer in his leg, which threatened his life, and at the same time greatly increased that peevish and passionate temper to which he was always subject. The tenderness of Catherine was remarkable on this occasion; she attended him with the utmost assiduity, and used every method in her power to soothe his pains, and prevent those dreadful gusts of humour so frequent and fatal in their consequences. The king's favourite topic was theology, and Catherine was frequently obliged to discuss the more abstruse tenets of religion with him. Whether her arguments were too strong for the king to answer, or whether she inadvertently dropt some expressions that shewed she was attached to the Lutheran principles, is not absolutely known; but the king was highly provoked at her presuming to differ from him in any theological speculation. He even complained to Gardiner of the queen's obstinacy; and that furious prelate, pleased at having an opportunity of crushing the very head of the protestant party, persuaded the king to order articles of impeachment to be drawn up against his consort. The chancellor seconded the arguments of Gardiner, and soon after brought the articles to be signed. Fortunately for Catherine, the chancellor dropped the fatal paper, which was found by one of the queen's party, and immediately put into her hands. Sensible of the danger to which she was exposed, she determined, if possible, to avert the storm by prudence and discretion. She accordingly paid her usual visit to the king, whom she found in a more serene disposition than usual. The conversation failed not to turn upon the subject of theology; and Henry challenged her to maintain her usual arguments in divinity. Catherine told the king that such profound speculations were above her comprehension, and, in her opinion, very ill suited to the natural imbecillity of her sex. She added, that though she had often engaged in these speculations, it was only to divert his pains, and profit by his instructions; that his elucidations had withdrawn the veil of obscurity which she had so long wished to be removed, and to effect which she had made use of arguments, though she knew when she urged them they were not conclusive. "And is it so sweet-heart, replied Henry, then, by St. Mary, we are perfect friends again." At the same time he embraced her with great tenderness, and sent her away with assurances of his kindness and protection.

The next day, while Henry and Catherine were walking in the palace garden, the bishop of Winchester, who knew nothing of this reconciliation, appeared with forty of the pursuivants, to seize the queen, and commit her to the Tower. The king no sooner saw the prelate approach, than he took him aside, and was observed to speak to him in a very angry tone of voice. The queen was greatly alarmed, especially on overhearing the terms knave, fool, and beast frequently repeated. The prelate retired in great confusion, and the queen generously interposed to mitigate the passion of the king, who replied, "Poor soul! you know not how little that man is intitled to your favour." The queen was very careful for the future not to offend the petulant humour of her husband; and Gardiner was never able to recover the good opinion of the monarch.

A. D. 1547. This attempt of Gardiner and Wriothesley exasperated the king and the catholic party, and the duke of Norfolk and his son, the earl of Surry, soon felt the weight of his resentment. The duke of Norfolk was, by his birth, allied to the throne; and had distinguished himself by a long series of services to the state. He was uncle to two of Henry's queens, and always considered as the greatest subject in the kingdom. He was an implacable enemy to the reformation, and had taken every opportunity to enforce the laws against them. The earl of Surry, son to the duke of Norfolk, was a young nobleman of great merit, but of very little discretion. Hurried away by his ambition, and exasperated by some affronts he had lately received, he very imprudently irritated the peevish humour of Henry by some menacing expressions; and the king, persuaded that he entertained views of marrying the princess Mary, determined to prevent the great power of his family from becoming formidable to the government during his son's minority. Both Norfolk and Surry were accordingly arrested, and sent to the Tower. Surry was accused of entertaining in his family some Italians, who were suspected to be spies sent by his holiness; and of carrying on a correspondence with cardinal Pole, because one of his domestics had paid a visit to that prelate in Italy: and because the earl quartered the arms of Edward the Confessor upon his escutcheon, he was suspected of aspiring to the crown; though it was well known that both himself and his ancestors had openly, during many years, and even by the approbation of the heralds, maintained that practice. But however frivolous these accusations may now appear, they were then thought sufficient to find him guilty. He was condemned by the lord chancellor, who presided at his trial, and beheaded upon Tower-hill on the nineteenth of January.

The innocence of the duke of Norfolk was still more apparent, though his dutchess, and Elizabeth Holland his mistress, gave information of all they knew against him. The greatest crime of which he was accused was that of having said, that the king was sickly, and could not hold out a long time, and that the kingdom would fall into disorders on account of the diversity of religious opinions. Henry well knew, that all the accusations he could alledge against him would not be sufficient to find him guilty in a trial before his peers, and had therefore, recourse to the usual instrument of his tyranny. He ordered a bill of attainder to be preferred against him, and he was declared guilty of high-treason, without being heard in his own defence. Cranmer, though a friend to the Reformation, and well knew, that Norfolk was a sworn enemy to all innovations in religion, refused to have any share in a transaction that must reflect disgrace on all that were concerned in it. He was therefore no sooner informed that the commons had passed the bill, than he retired to his seat at Croydon, and appeared no more at court, till he was sent for to assist the king in his last moments.

Though the attendants of Henry had for some time perceived that the hour of his dissolution was at hand, no person had the courage to inform him of his dangerous situation. An act had been passed in his reign, which rendered it capital for any person to foretel the king's death, lest, in the violence of his passion, he should cause the law, in all its rigour, to be executed on the author of such friendly intelligence; especially as his late treatment of the Howard family had demonstrated his cruelty did not subside as the springs of life decayed. At length Sir Anthony Lenny ventured to disclose the fatal secret, and exhorted the king to prepare for that awful change which was so near at hand, as his legs were already mortified. Henry, contrary to all expectation, thanked him for the information, and desired that Cranmer might be sent for; but before the archbishop arrived, the king was speechless. The prelate beseeching the king to give him some sign of his trusting in God, through the merits of our Redeemer, he squeezed his hand with great fervency, and immediately after expired, on the twenty-eighth of January, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign.

A few days before his death Henry had issued his royal mandate for the execution of the duke of Norfolk; but expired the night before the day appointed for that purpose; and it was thought improper to stain with blood the commencement of the new reign, especially as the sentence was considered as unjust and tyrannical.

The king, about a month before his death, had made his will, in which, pursuant to the power given him by the parliament, he had settled the succession to the crown of England in the following manner: First, upon the prince of Wales and his posterity. Secondly, upon the children of his present queen, or those of any future marriage he might contract. Thirdly, upon the princess Mary and her issue, but with this express condition, that she should marry with the consent of the executors of his will. Fourthly on the princess Elizabeth, with the same proviso. Fifthly, upon the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his sister, the queen of France, by the duke of Suffolk. Sixthly, on the lady Eleanor Brandon, younger sister to Frances. Lastly, in failure of all these, upon the next lawful heir. By another clause in his will he named the following sixteen executors: The archbishop of Canterbury; the lord chancellor; the earl of Hertford, uncle to young Edward; the lord St. John; the lord Russell; the lord viscount Lisle; Cuthbert Tunstall, bishop of Durham; Sir Anthony Brown; Sir Edward Montague; the chief-justice Bromley; Sir William Paget; Sir Anthony Denny

Denny; Sir William Herbert; Sir Edward Watton; and his brother Dr. Watton. To the lords who were his executors, he left five hundred marks, and to the commoners three hundred, and ordered his executors to pay all his debts. He made the prince of Wales heir to all his moveables, but strictly charged him to be subject to the advice of his council till he was eighteen years of age. He left three thousand pounds a year to each of his daughters, with ten thousand pounds addition, as their whole fortune, if his executors thought proper. To the queen he left three thousand pounds in plate and jewels, and a thousand pounds in money. Another clause in his will sufficiently suggested, that he was far from being settled with regard to his notions in religion: he left money for masses to be said for delivering his soul from purgatory; and though he had destroyed all those institutions, established by his ancestors and others, for the benefit of their souls, and had even left the doctrine of purgatory doubtful in all the articles of faith he published during the latter years of his reign, yet he was determined to take care of the future repose of his own soul, by adhering to the safer side of the question.

Perhaps a more difficult task cannot be imposed upon an historian, than that of giving a summary of Henry's qualities. Lord Herbert very justly remarked; That his history is his best character and description. He was absolutely different and inconsistent with himself, in different periods of his life. While the natural modesty of youth restrained the violence of his turbulent passions, his government was the admiration of foreigners; and he was almost adored by his people; but in his more advanced age, his conduct was entirely changed. He became rapacious, arbitrary, froward, fretful, and so cruel, that he seemed to delight in shedding the blood of his subjects. The grand object of all his pursuits was the gratification of his own brutal appetites: to this he sacrificed every obligation of justice, every dictate of conscience, every feeling of humanity: the cruel fate of the unfortunate Anne Boleyn will fix an eternal mark of infamy on his character. At the same time it must be acknowledged, that with all his vices, follies, and imperfections, Henry possessed many great and agreeable qualities. He was not only liberal and indulgent to his court and family, but also to strangers. He was at once a lover and encourager of the arts and sciences, and his court was fuller of learned men than many of the universities; he made them his companions as well as his counsellors, and advanced them to the highest dignities both of church and state. He was particularly careful of the education of his own children, and his authority induced the nobility to follow his example. The treatment he met with from the court of Rome, provoked him to violence; the danger of a revolt from his superstitious subjects, seemed to require the most extreme violence. He laid the foundation of English liberty by delivering the English church from her slavish and disgraceful subjection to the see of Rome; though he was perhaps actuated more by his unruly passions, than by the motives of conscience and religion. Foreign nations respected his power, his own subjects forgot his vices, and it is history only that regards him as a monster.

Henry had the following issue. By his first wife,

Catherine of Spain; he had two sons and one daughter, viz.

Henry, born Jan. 1, 1511, and died on the twenty-seventh of February following.

Another son, who died soon after his birth, which happened the latter end of the year 1514.

Mary, born February the eleventh, 1516, and who ascended the throne on the death of her brother Edward.

By his second wife, Anne Boleyn, he had the famous queen Elizabeth, and a male child still-born.

By his third wife, Jane Seymour, he had a son named Edward, who succeeded him immediately in the throne.

He had no issue by his three last wives, Anne of Cleves, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr.

By Elizabeth, widow of Sir Gilbert Taillebois, he had a natural son named Henry Fitz-Roy, created duke of Richmond and Somerset, and afterwards made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The beauty of his person, the quickness of his parts, his expertness in all kinds of military exercises, his excellent disposition, and the uncommon endowments of his mind, gained him the character of the finest youth of the age, and raised the expectations of the people very high in his favour. These accomplishments, the honours he had received, and the extraordinary fondness which Henry always expressed for him, occasioned an opinion, that, in defect of legitimate male issue, the king would have found a way to raise this natural child to the throne. But whatever designs he had formed in his favour, they proved abortive by the death of this youth, which happened in the eighteenth year of his age.

Henry VIII. summoned ten parliaments, and twenty sessions were held, though the whole time which they sat during this long reign, did not exceed three years and a half. The absolute will of the king being the law of parliament, and the members being desirous of returning as soon as possible to their country seats, business was soon dispatched; a motion was made and generally carried without the least opposition. Hence these many absurd and tyrannical laws, which multiplied crimes and punishments during the reign of Henry VIII. Had these, indeed, been strictly executed, every man without exception must have been obnoxious to the penalty of high-treason. For example, it was treasonable for any person to assert the validity of Henry's marriage either with Catherine of Arragon, or Anne Boleyn; and it was equally criminal to say any thing to the disparagement of the princess Mary and Elizabeth, the descendants of those marriages. Even a profound silence upon these topics might be dangerous; for when the marriages were declared illegitimate by statute, it was also enacted, that whoever refused to answer upon oath to any point contained in that act, was subject to the pains of death. In order, therefore, to find a person a traitor, it was only necessary to interrogate him concerning the legality of either of the king's former marriages. If he was silent, he was a traitor; and if he answered either in the negative or affirmative, he was equally guilty. Thus the subjects were oppressed under the authority of laws, which ought to have been the guardians of their happiness and security.

E D W A R D VI.

A. D. THE late king was persuaded that he had fixed the government, during the minority of his son, on so firm a basis, that it could not be shaken. But he should have remembered, that his power would cease with his existence; and that the commands of the most absolute monarchs are disregarded, when, by their deaths, they have ceased to inspire terror. Accordingly, the regents had no sooner settled the form of government agreeable to Henry's will, than a change was proposed. It was observed, that it would be very troublesome for the people, and particularly for foreign ministers, to be obliged to apply to fourteen persons of equal authority; and, to remove this difficulty, it was moved, that one should be chosen as their president, with the title of protector of the king's realm, and governor of his person: but though he should enjoy all the exterior symbols of the royal dignity, he should yet be bound, in the exercise of power, to follow the opinion of the executors.

This change, however reasonable, and even necessary, it might appear to the majority, was strongly opposed by Wriothesley the chancellor, a person at once very ambitious and very active. He had no superior in the council, except the primate; and Cranmer having little inclination to mix in public affairs, he flattered himself that the chief direction of the business of the kingdom would fall into his hands. He strenuously asserted, that they had no power to depart from the tenor of the late king's will, authorized by an act of parliament. His remonstrances, however, had no effect on the council; they determined to chuse a protector, in order the more effectually to provide for the public tranquillity. No difficulty occurred with regard to the person proper for this exalted station. Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, maternal uncle to the king, and the more interested in his preservation, as he had himself no pretensions to the crown, was appointed to fill this dignified station, and immediately created duke of Somerset. At the same time, the chancellor was created earl of Southampton. But this mark of favour was far from satisfying the ambition of that turbulent minister; he determined to oppose all the measures of the protector, and render him uneasy in his high station.

In order to this, he resolved to devote his whole time to the affairs of the cabinet; and as his office of chancellor necessarily engrossed a considerable part of his attention, he ventured, without any warrant from the king, protector, or regency, or any other authority than his own, to put the great seal in commission; and appointed four lawyers to execute, in his absence, the office of lord high chancellor of England. A measure so replete with arrogance and presumption could not fail of giving umbrage to the government; and it was determined to suppress the haughty spirit of the ambitious chancellor. The judges being consulted on this occasion, declared, that the commission he had granted was contrary to the laws of England; and that the earl of Southampton, for taking such an unconstitutional step, had not only forfeited his high office, but also rendered himself obnoxious to the severest punishment. A council was now summoned, and the chancellor ordered to attend. But he was so far from making any submission, that he defended his own power in the most haughty manner, and with very indecent language. He called the authority of the council and protector in question, and told them he would not submit to any sentence they might pronounce against him. He was therefore deprived of the seals, and committed a prisoner to his own house, where he continued till the twenty-ninth of June; when he entered into a recognizance of four thousand pounds to pay whatever fine they should think proper to impose upon him. The Catholic party lost a powerful friend by his removal: he was at once an able advocate, and a zealous defender of the Romish religion.

The fall of Southampton increased the ambition of the protector: he now thought himself at full liberty to engross the sole management of the affairs of government. He accordingly procured a patent from the young king, by which he was enabled to overthrow all the appointments of Henry. It invested him, under the title of protector, with the whole regal authority. He appointed a council, consisting of all the former members, except Southampton; but he enjoyed the power of chusing other counsellors, and to consult with such only as he thought proper. With this council he was enabled to execute any measure that might be thought serviceable to the government, without incurring any penalty or forfeiture, inflicted by any law, statute, or ordinance, whatsoever. No resistance was made to this usurpation of power, though it was sufficiently evident that the protector was, in effect, absolute master of the kingdom. Perhaps the people, habituated by custom to the tyrannical government of Henry, might prefer a single person to a council of regency, and think the public tranquillity would be much better secured by the exclusion of parties from the government.

While the English were thus employed in settling the government, Francis I. king of France, paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded by Henry II. a prince of vigour and ability, but less ready in his resolutions than his predecessor, and less enflamed with animosity against the emperor Charles V. He was, in a great measure, governed by the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine, brothers to the queen-dowager of Scotland; and being zealous champions for the papal authority, and the Roman Catholic religion, they determined to prevent the intended marriage between Edward and the young queen of Scotland. Accordingly they persuaded Henry to attempt the recovery of Boulogne, and to reject the late treaties which had been concluded with Henry by Francis I. This perfidious behaviour did not, however, intimidate the protector: he determined, if possible, to execute the dying injunctions of his late master, relative to the marriage between those infant sovereigns, and by that means unite the two kingdoms. But before he proceeded to carry this design into execution, he thought it necessary to provide for the tranquillity of the public, and place the Reformation on so firm a basis, that it might be able to baffle all the attempts of its open and concealed enemies.

The attachment of Somerset to the reformed religion was open and declared. Young Edward had imbibed the same principles. Many of the counsellors having profited by the destruction of the monasteries, were now disposed to plunder the secular clergy; and others were animated against them by the prejudices of opinion, rather than the prospect of interest. Cranmer, who was a Protestant as well as the protector, being consulted on the subject of advancing the reformation, recommended moderate measures. He observed, that it would be very dangerous to introduce a change of religion by violence and persecution; that reason rather than force was the proper instrument for convincing mankind of their errors; and that the people should be conducted to a change in religion by gradual and insensible innovations. He was also desirous of letting the enthusiasm of the reformers grow weaker by time; because the fervors of a new sect always lead to superstition, and to a devotion too pure and spiritual to be adopted. The primate had already procured several of the best books written by the German divines against popery, to be translated and published in England. The queen dowager, Catherine Parr, not only assisted in publishing, but translated great part of the paraphrase of Erasmus on the New Testament.

Cranmer's plan was readily adopted; and the protector, by virtue of a proclamation, to which the parliament had given the force of a law, suspended, for a time, the exercise of the episcopal power, and appointed a general visitation to be made of all the dioceses in England. But those who were charged with this duty were enjoined to proceed with the greatest caution and prudence. The visitors consisted of a mixture of clergy and laity, and had six circuits assigned them. They were enjoined to correct immoralities and irregularities in the clergy, wherever they were found; to abolish the ancient superstitions, and to bring the discipline and worship somewhat nearer the practice of the reformed churches. At the same time they were enjoined to retain, for the present, all images which had not been abused to idolatry; and to instruct the people not to despise such ceremonies as were not yet abrogated; some particular superstitions only were to be retrenched, such as the sprinkling their beds with holy water, the ringing of bells, or using of blessed candles, in order to drive away the devil. By pursuing such gentle methods the reformation proceeded without tumult of confusion; the people were convinced of their errors without being seized with the spirit of enthusiasm; and parted gradually with their ancient superstitious practices, without throwing the government into convulsions. This visitation was the first attempt to execute the design already formed for completing the reformation, which was only begun in the preceding reign.

The greatest difficulty experienced by the visitors, consisted in correcting the zeal of the catholic preachers, among whom were several old monks, who inveighed with all the force of bigotted and disappointed zeal against the reformation. Orders were therefore issued to restrain them in the topics of their sermons: twelve homilies were published, which they were enjoined to read to the people; and they were prohibited from preaching any where but in their own parish churches. In the mean time the protestant divines enjoyed an unbounded liberty by virtue of special licences, which were easily obtained. Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, strongly opposed these innovations, and particularly the homilies, which he represented as very improper, because the delicate and mysterious points of justification and grace, were defined with the most metaphysical precision. The knowledge of these tenets he asserted to be far above the comprehension of the vulgar, and therefore superfluous to the generality of Christians. One of the Calvinistical writers is very angry with Gardiner for this opposition; he calls him "an insensible ass, and one that had no feeling of God's spirit in the work of justification." It was a general opinion at this time, among the protestants, that they could penetrate into the depths of these profound mysteries; and therefore entertained a sovereign contempt for all who confessed their ignorance of them. But though Gardiner opposed the homilies in particular, his objections were not solely confined to them: he remonstrated strongly against the great imprudence of making perpetual innovations, and on the necessity of adhering to some system. "Tis a dangerous thing," said he, to use too much freedom, in researches of this kind. If you cut the old canal, the water is apt to flow farther than you intended. If you indulge the humour of novelty, you cannot put a stop to the people's demands, nor govern their indiscretions at pleasure." His remonstrances had, however, no effect, the visitors proceeded with great prudence in demolishing the ancient superstitions.

The whole attention of the protector was now turned towards prosecuting the war with Scotland. He assembled an army of eighteen thousand men, and equipped a fleet of sixty sail, one half of which were ships of war, and the other loaded with ammunition and provisions. The command of the fleet was given to lord Clinton; while he himself, assisted by the earl of Warwick, lead the land forces. Alarmed at this powerful armament, the French ambassador applied, by orders from his court, to the regency, desiring that a negotiation might be opened, in order, if possible, to restore peace between the two kingdoms, without the effusion of human blood. The request was complied with, and Tunstall, bishop of Durham, and Sir Thomas Rowe, were appointed to meet the Scottish commissaries at Newcastle, where the conferences were opened on the fourth of August. But the English plenipotentiaries refusing to proceed in the negotiation, unless the marriage between the two sovereigns was previously settled, and the Scottish commissioners declaring they had no power to consent to the marriage, the negotiations became abortive, and the protector entered Scotland on the second of September.

But before he commenced hostilities he published a manifesto, in which he recapitulated the reasons that induced the English to have recourse to arms, and urged, by a variety of arguments, the expediency and even necessity of the marriage of the young queen of Scots and Edward being immediately concluded. These arguments were drawn from the situation of the two kingdoms, which nature, by surrounding them by the ocean, seemed to have designed for one empire; from the similarity of the inhabitants in their laws, language, customs, and manners, whereby they were naturally adapted to be united, and to become one people; from the equality of the young king and queen, with regard to age and fortune; from the imminent danger to which Scotland was perpetually exposed from the hostile attempts of a richer and most powerful neighbour; and from the many advantages that must result to the inhabitants of both kingdoms from living in a state of peace and security. The protector added, that exclusive of these considerations, positive engagements had been made for concluding this alliance; and that the Scots were bound in honour to perform, what their interest and safety so strongly demanded.

This manifesto, however, produced not the intended effect: all the protector's remonstrances were rendered abortive, by the arts and intrigues of the queen dowager of Scotland, who was warmly attached to the interest of France, and the Roman catholic religion. Somerset therefore found himself obliged to have recourse to arms, in order to compel the Scots to adopt a measure which no motives of policy or prudence could induce them to embrace. He accordingly continued his march towards Edinburgh without meeting with any opposition, except from a few castles, which were easily reduced.

The Scottish government had not, however, been idle; the earl of Arran had collected the whole force of the kingdom, and his army, which was double to that of the English in numbers, had taken post at Musselburgh, on a very advantageous spot of ground, secured by the banks of the river Esk, about six miles from Edinburgh; while the English lay encamped at Preston-Pans. In this situation several skirmishes passed between the light troops of each army, but without any thing decisive; and Somerset, finding it impossible to draw the Scots to an engagement, and fearing he should soon be distressed for want of provisions, sent an herald to Arran, offering to abandon his enterprize, and to pay all the damages the Scots had suffered from his troops, provided he would give his promise, that the young queen should not be given in marriage to any foreign prince, till she reached the age of chusing a husband for herself. These moderate terms induced the Scots to imagine that the English were intimidated, and that, if the enemy was attacked, the victory would be certain. The priests and monks, who had come to the camp in great numbers, laboured assiduously to propagate this opinion; adding, that they had now an opportunity of inflicting vengeance on their heretical enemy. A movement made by the English towards their ships, confirmed them in this opinion; and that the protector was going to embark his forces. Elated with this idea, and determined to cut off his retreat, they quitted their camp, crossed the river Esk, and advanced, with great precipitation, into the plain, where the Scottish regent drew up his army in three divisions: the first, which consisted of the best troops, was commanded by the earl of Angus; the second by the regent himself; and the third by the earl of Huntley. The earl of Argyle headed a body of Highland archers, who formed a guard to the artillery.

The protector was greatly pleased when he saw the Scots leave their advantageous camp; as he should now have an opportunity of bringing on a decisive action. He drew up his troops in two lines; the earl of Warwick commanded the first, and the protector himself the second. The lord Grey of Wilton lead a reserved body of cavalry, and had orders to fall upon the flank of the van of the Scottish army, as soon as they were engaged in close fight with the first line of the English.

Such was the disposition of both armies, when the Scots advanced to the charge; but a dreadful fire from the cannon of the ships threw the Highland archers into great confusion, and even the whole van began to stagger. Lord Grey perceived the situation of the enemy, and could not resist the opportunity of attacking them before they recovered from their surprize. But he soon perceived he had acted with too much precipitation. The spot occupied by the enemy was fallow land, broken ridges, and separated from him by a slough and a ditch. These impediments rendered the shock of his body of horse feeble and irregular; and the Scottish infantry standing firm, he was repulsed with considerable loss: he himself was dangerously wounded; lord Edward Seymour, son to the protector, was unhorsed; and the English standard in danger of being taken. But the earl of Warwick and the duke of Somerset advanced with so much celerity to support the English horse, that they soon formed behind the infantry, and the battle now became general. The English artillery, planted on a neighbouring eminence, played full on one of their flanks, while the cannon of the ships galled them on the other; and the lord Grey, eager to repair his error, charged them in front with so much fury, that their first line gave way, and an orderly retreat was begun: but the Highland archers betaking themselves to flight, spread a panic through the whole army; the retreat was changed into a precipitate flight, and the whole became one general scene of confusion, terror, and consternation. The bravest of the Scots were put to the sword, and the route and slaughter became so general, that from the field of battle to Edinburgh, the whole ground was covered with the dying and the dead. The priests and monks received no quarter, for having engaged in an enterprize so foreign to their profession. Few victories have been more decisive or more complete. Above ten thousand perished in the engagement and pursuit, and about fifteen hundred surrendered themselves prisoners. The English lost not more than two hundred men. This action, which is known in history by the name of the Battle of Pinkie; from a nobleman's seat of that name in the neighbourhood, seemed to have put a period to opposition, and destroyed for ever the French interest in Scotland.

The regent fled with the queen dowager to Sterling-castle, and the Scottish army was so entirely dissipated, that Arran found the utmost difficulty of checking the incursions of small parties of the English. The protector marched directly to Leith, which made no opposition; but he failed in his attempt against Edinburgh castle. He, however, plundered the town, while the fleet under lord Clinton, burnt all the places on the sea coasts, and took all the shipping in the frith of Forth. Had the duke pursued all the advantages of his late victory, he might have given law to the conquered. But a cabal having been raised against him at London, he hastened his return, leaving Warwick with full powers to negotiate a treaty with Arran, who had desired leave to send commissioners for that purpose. The latter, however, meant only to gain time till succours could arrive from France; and accordingly no Scottish commissioners appeared at the place appointed for the conferences.

When the protector arrived at London, he found that his brother Thomas, who had married Catherine Parr, the queen dowager, and had lately been created lord high-admiral of England, was become his greatest opposer. He had not only joined in the cabals of his enemies, but also made several vigorous efforts to supplant him in the high post he enjoyed. He had already gained such an ascendancy over Edward, that he had persuaded the king to write a letter with his own hand to the house of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of the king's person. Though this attempt struck at the foundation of the protector's greatness, he still endeavoured to reclaim his brother by gentle and munificent methods; but finding he was still determined to pursue his scheme, Somerset found it necessary to summon a parliament, as the only authority that could support him against the machinations of his brother.

But before the session was opened he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and which he proposed to lay before the house at the meeting of the parliament. The council were alarmed at this circumstance, and several lords were deputed to dissuade the admiral from pursuing a scheme which might involve the government in distress, and ultimately terminate in his own destruction. But he continued firm to his purpose, till the council threatened to deprive him of all his posts, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the statute which made it death for any person to disturb the established government. These menaces awakened his attention: he saw the consequences that might result from his disobeying the council, and thought proper to abandon his enterprize; but he was never thoroughly reconciled to his brother.

The late victory over the Scots had greatly raised the reputation of the protector, who now obtained a patent, appointing him to sit on the throne, upon a stool or bench, on the right hand of the king, and to enjoy the same honours and privileges which had usually been possessed by any princes of the blood, or uncles of the kings of England. These honours were invidious to the old nobility, and created the duke many powerful enemies. But if the protector discovered his vanity and weakness in assuming so much state and grandeur, he merited the highest applause on account of the laws, enacted through his influence in this session of parliament; for by these the rigour of former statutes was greatly mitigated, and some steps taken for securing the liberties of the people. All laws were repealed which extended the crime of treason beyond the limits assigned it by the statute of the twenty-fifth of Edward the third; together with all laws enacted during the late reign, for extending the crime of felony; all the former laws against the Lollards or heretics; and the bloody statute statute of the six articles: no person was to be accused of words but within a month after they were spoken. That statute which gave the force of laws to the king's proclamations, was also repealed. Thus were some of the most severe laws ever enacted in England totally abrogated, and the people began to flatter themselves with the hopes of enjoying some share of religious and civil liberty. Hereby, however, still continued to be a capital crime, and punishable by fire. But as there now remained no precise standard by which that crime could be ascertained, it entirely depended upon the rigour or lenity of the judges.

Several laws were enacted, which greatly contributed to promote the Reformation. The cup was restored to the laity; private masses were abolished; the king was invested with the power of creating bishops, without any election of the chapter; and all processes in the bishops courts, those of Canterbury excepted, were to be carried on in the king's name, and sealed by his seal, as in the courts of common law. But the most remarkable bill passed by this parliament, was that which gave the revenues of chantries and colleges to the crown. The preamble to this statute premises, that these funds should be employed to good and godly uses, in erecting grammar schools, in farther augmenting the revenues of the universities, and in making better provision for the poor and needy. But the rapacious courtiers had already, in their imaginations, devoured the prey; and it was not long before it was shared out among them. Cranmer, and several other prelates, were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the appropriation of tithes, and other methods of alienation, were already too much reduced. The primate, therefore, strenuously opposed the bill, and was joined by the bishops of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Winchester, and Chichester: but notwithstanding this opposition, it was passed into a law. By this act no fewer than two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chantries, colleges, and other religious foundations, fell to the crown.

A. D. 1548. Several alterations were now made in the ceremonies of the church, which increased the discontents of the Catholics. Orders were issued that candles should not be carried about upon Candlemas-day, nor ashes on Ash-Wednesday, nor palms on Palm-Sunday; that no images should be suffered to remain in the churches; that auricular confession should be left free, and considered as indifferent. These particulars struck at the root of the Catholic religion; but still the progress of the Reformation was greatly obstructed among the people, by the sermons delivered by the clergy of opposite sentiments. Several attempts were made to remove this inconvenience; but these proving ineffectual, a total silence was imposed upon all preachers in general, which put an end to all the polemics of the pulpit. But this restraint, from the very nature of things, could only be temporal. The protector reflected not, that in proportion as the ceremonies of public worship were retrenched, the people became the more desirous of sermons, which alone could supply the place of sensible objects. The Protestants in particular, who were fond of being addressed from the pulpit, remonstrated strongly against this injunction; and it was thought expedient to establish a practice, which seems essentially connected with the very spirit of Christianity.

Several of the Catholic party opposed these alterations in religion with all their power. Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, was at the head of this opposition, and defended his opinions with great boldness before the council. He laid before them the reasons on which his opposition was founded with all the force of eloquence; and concluded his speech in the following manner: "For my part, my sole concern is to manage the third and last act of my life with decency, and to make a handsome exit off the stage.

Provided this point is secured, I am not solicitous about the rest. I am already, by nature, condemned to death: no man can give me a pardon from this sentence, nor so much as procure me a reprieve. To speak my mind freely, and to act as my conscience directs me, are two branches of liberty I can never part with. Sincerity in speech and integrity in action are entertaining qualities; they will stick by a man when every thing else takes its leave, and I must not resign them upon any consideration. The best of it is, if I do not throw them away myself, no man can force them from me; but if I give them up, then am I ruined by myself, and deserve to lose all my preferences." This opposition of Gardiner drew on him the indignation of the council, and he was committed to the Tower; an act of severity which intimidated the Popish party, and no farther opposition was made to the new ordinances.

The Scots having sent no commissioners to the conferences for a peace, the war was renewed, but without force or vigour. Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, was sent into Scotland, to command the English forces, in the character of lieutenant-general. In the mean time, the lord Grey of Wilton took and fortified Haddington, which made him master of the most fruitful part of Scotland, and whence he made excursions to the very gates of Edinburgh. The Scots were in no condition to oppose the English, till the succours from France landed at Leith about the beginning of June.

These troops, which consisted of six thousand men, under the command of Dese, revived the courage of the Scots, and the siege of Haddington was immediately undertaken. The Scots, who were only formidable in a desultory war, were very unfit for this undertaking: even with the assistance of the French, they despaired of taking the place by assault, and depended entirely for success upon the hopes of starving the garrison. They, however, repulsed several sallies made by the besieged, and shut them up closely within their fortifications.

While the army was employed in the siege of Haddington, the parliament were deliberating on the most proper method of preventing their young queen from falling into the hands of the English, as her marriage with Edward must be productive of an union between the two kingdoms. The earl of Huntley, who at first was disposed to favour the proposal of Somerset, but had changed his opinion by the late violent measures pursued by the English, said pleasantly, "That he was not averse to the match, but that he disliked the manner in which the princess was courted." Several weighty reasons were, however, urged, both for and against the marriage; but at last it was determined to send their young queen to France; and, what was understood to be the necessary consequence, to marry her to the dauphin. She was accordingly embarked on board the French galleys, and after a tempestuous passage, arrived safely at Brest; whence she was conducted to Paris, and soon after betrothed to the dauphin. This event was a fatal blow to the projects of the protector, who now saw, that the marriage he was so desirous of completing was now impossible.

The siege of Haddington was still continued; and the Scots had the good fortune to surprise and cut off a party sent to its relief, under the command of Sir Robert Bowes and Sir Thomas Palmer. But on the approach of the earl of Shrewsbury, at the head of twenty-two thousand men, they raised the siege, and retired with great precipitation. Shrewsbury, however, made no attempt to distress the enemy; he contented himself with reinforcing the garrison, and leaving a large supply of provisions and ammunition in the place. This was effected without the least opposition, and the earl immediately returned to England.

While the war was thus carrying on in Scotland, the protector was indefatigable in completing the Reformation.

Reformation. The public offices of the church were reviewed, a new catechism was published by Cranmer, and a new liturgy was received by the convocation, though not without a long and strenuous debate. The parliament met on the twenty-fourth of November, and confirmed all the orders of council issued for the reformation of religion: Priests were permitted to marry, though the preamble to the act passed for that purpose expressly declared, that it were better for the priests and ministers of the church to live chaste, and without marriage; and it were much to be wished they would of themselves abstain. The new liturgy, drawn up by a select committee of bishops and divines, was confirmed, and ordered to be used in all churches and chapels in the kingdom. This liturgy was nearly the same with that at present used in the Church of England.

But the attention of the protector was now diverted from promoting the progress of the Reformation. His brother had renewed his former practices, and carried them to a much greater length. The queen-dowager, his wife, had some time since died in child-bed; and he flattered himself with the hopes of espousing the princess Elizabeth, who was then in her sixteenth year, and seems to have listened to the insinuations of a man possessed of every talent proper to captivate the affections of the fair. But as Henry VIII. had excluded his daughters from the succession, if they married without the consent of his executors, which Seymour could never hope to obtain; it was concluded, that he proposed to effect his purpose by expedients still more rash and more criminal. He endeavoured to seduce the young king and the courtiers into his interest; he inveighed openly against his brother's administration; and he drew to him a great number of partizans from all the classes of the people. He could depend upon the attachment of ten thousand of his servants and retainers, and had provided arms for their use.

A. D. 1549. The protector, informed of these particulars, attempted to bring him back to his duty and allegiance by gentle methods; but his attempts were in vain; he rejected every offer, and set his brother at defiance. Somerset now laid the whole affair before the council; and a charge, consisting of thirty-three articles, was drawn up against him; and he was committed to the Tower. Dudley, earl of Warwick, son to the obnoxious minister of Henry VIII. was a person of great talents, which qualified him to shine both in the cabinet and the field. But all his virtues were obscured by still greater vices; an exorbitant ambition, an insatiable avarice, a neglect of decency, a contempt of justice. Warwick happening to rise to eminence on the ruin of the two brothers, determined to widen the breach between them; and engaged Somerset to proceed with the utmost violence against his brother, lord Seymour. Commissioners were now sent to interrogate him in prison; but he refused to answer the captious questions that were put to him; desired that his trial might proceed in the legal method; that the witnesses might be confronted with him, and that the heads of his accusation should be laid before him. These demands, however reasonable in themselves, were denied; the laws had long since yielded to force, and it was in vain to expect that the method of proceeding would now be altered. A bill of attainder was preferred against him, and passed without any material opposition in the House of Lords. The Commons were more scrupulous: some of the members objected against the whole method of proceeding by bills of attainder passed in the absence of the accused; and required that a formal trial should be given to every man before his condemnation. This opposition alarmed the ministry. A message was sent from the king, requiring them to proceed; and offering, that the same narratives which had satisfied the lords should be laid before them. This concession produced the desired effect; the bill passed in a very full house: near four hundred voted for it, and not above nine or ten against it. The royal assent was soon after given to the bill, and the admiral was beheaded. His behaviour on the scaffold was very undaunted; and he persisted, with his last breath, in declaring, that he had never committed, or intended to commit, any act of treason against the government. The protector was greatly blamed for proceeding in this manner against his brother, and denying to grant him a fair and impartial trial. But arbitrary judgments were become so common, that it is something singular that the least shadow of evidence should be sought for to justify the condemnation of those who opposed either the court or the minister.

The new liturgy, though received and approved of by all that wished well to the Reformation, yet met with very great opposition from the Catholic party. They were unwilling to abandon the tenets of their ancient religion, and exerted their whole interest to raise disturbances in the nation. A great variety of opinions prevailed, and all attempts to reduce them to an uniformity were frivolous and vain. The government appointed commissioners to enquire after and examine the enemies to the new ritual; and if these were obstinate, and refused to be converted, they were ordered to be delivered over to the secular arm, and punished for their opinions. Several were prosecuted for their heresy, but the greater part of them recanted, and were pardoned. A woman, named Joan Bocher, or Joan of Kent, who denied the incarnation of Christ, persevered in her error, and was condemned to the flames. Cranmer, though of a mild disposition, thought it necessary to punish her; and having engaged Edward to sign her sentence, the young monarch told him, with tears in his eyes, that if any wrong was done, the guilt should be entirely on his head. Cranmer used every argument to reform the woman; but finding all his attempts abortive, he suffered the sentence to be executed, and she perished in the flames. Soon after, one Van Paris, a Dutchman, was condemned for having embraced the heresy of Arius, and suffered with so much resolution and fanatical zeal, that he embraced with transport the faggots which consumed him. But these severities were ill calculated for removing the evil; they tended rather to increase than exterminate heresy. They produced, however, a temporary effect; a conformity to the new liturgy was established, and the murmurs against the late innovations seemed to be lulled asleep on the couch of forgetfulness. The princess Mary alone continued to adhere to the mass, and absolutely refused to admit the reformed modes of worship.

During the last session of parliament, an act had passed the House of Lords, for giving licence to every person to inclose his own grounds, but had been thrown out by the Commons. Irritated at this opposition, the nobility determined to carry the project into execution, notwithstanding their bill had proved abortive in parliament. This occasioned an universal discontent among the lower class of people, who were persuaded that a scheme was now formed for reducing them to an absolute state of slavery. Extreme indigence, to which they had been reduced by various causes, contributed to spread the flame of civil commotion into divers parts of the kingdom. The suppression of the abbeys and monasteries, though doubtless of the utmost advantage to the nation in general, tended greatly to promote the oppression of the poor and indigent. It not only deprived the idle of a resource, but the peasant and the farmer lost a sure market for the fruits of their labour. Besides, the nobility, who were now become the owners of the church-lands, not only raised the rents of the farms, but also distressed the tenants by every method that avarice could invent. The woollen manufacture was carried to a great height in the Netherlands; and the large quantity of bullion imported from America, enabled the grandees of Spain to purchase the finest pieces of their cloth at very high prices. Hence the English wool found a sure and advantageous market among the Flemings. The natural consequence of this was, that the nobility turned their farms into pasture lands, and agriculture, which required the labours, and therefore afforded subsistence, to the husbandmen, was neglected. Hence the tenants and labourers were considered as a burden; and a multitude of people were reduced to beggary. The poorer classes of men could neither maintain their cattle nor themselves. What contributed still farther to oppress them, was the adulteration of the coin, begun in the reign of Henry VIII. and continued by Somerset to answer the necessities of the state. In consequence of this impolitic measure, the good coin was either hoarded up or exported; base metal only circulated, and the poor became unable to provide bread for their families. An alarming stagnation of commerce took place, and the loudest complaints resounded from every part of England.

The protector, dreading the consequences of this universal discontent, exerted himself to quiet the minds of the people. He published a pardon, even after the insurgents had committed overt-acts of rebellion, and appointed commissioners to enquire into and redress their grievances. In consequence of this, many of the inclosures were thrown down, and the nobility were exasperated against the protector, while the people received very little mitigation of their sufferings. The evil was of too complicated a nature to be easily redressed. The inhabitants of almost every county of England gave indications of their being ready to take up arms, and procure by open violence the necessities of life, which they could not obtain by their labour. In Devonshire and Norfolk, the spirit of rebellion threatened the most fatal consequences.

A priest of Stamford-Courtney, had the address to give the disturbances in the west of England, a religious turn, and fed the flame of discontent by every artifice which a misguided zeal could inspire. This artful change of the subject from temporal to religious objects, increased the number of the insurgents, and many of the gentry, particularly Humphrey Arundel, governor of St. Michael's Mount, joined the populace. They were now formed into a kind of regular army, amounting to near ten thousand men. Lord Ruffel, who commanded a small body of forces in Devonshire, being unable to meet the rebels in the field, had recourse to negotiation. But they insisted on the most extravagant articles, declaring that they would never lay down their arms till they were granted. They demanded, that all the general councils and ancient canons of the church should be observed: that the law of the six articles should be executed: that the mass should be said in latin, and the priest alone receive the eucharist: that the host should be elevated and worshipped, and that those who refused to perform that adoration should suffer as heretics: that the sacrament should be only administered to the people at Easter, in one kind: that baptism should be administered at all times, and at any seasons: that holy bread, holy water, and palms, should again be used, and all the images restored; together with all the ancient ceremonies: that the new liturgy should be laid aside, and both the old offices and the processions, be restored: that all preachers before their sermons, and priests in their celebrating mass, should pray for the souls in purgatory: that the people should be forbid to read the bible: that every gentleman should be restrained from having more than one servant for every hundred marks of yearly income: and that half the abbey-lands should be taken from the present possessors, and adjudged to two of the chief abbays in each county.

These demands were received by the regency with that contempt they deserved; and as soon as the rebels found they were rejected, they determined to have recourse to arms in order to force a compliance from the government. Accordingly they marched directly to Exeter, carrying before them crosses, banners, holy water, candlesticks, and other implements of the ancient superstition; together with the host, placed on a canopy. The siege of the city was formed on the second of July; but as the rebels were wholly destitute of cannon, they were repulsed in every attempt to take the place by storm. The citizens were, however, soon reduced to extremity; but they held out till they were relieved. The lord Grey having joined the lord Ruffel with a considerable body of forces, they advanced against the rebels, who were totally routed. Many of the insurgents were executed by martial law. Arundel, and the other leaders were sent to London, where they suffered for their crimes. The priest of Stamford-Courtney was hanged on the top of his own tower, dressed in the popish robes of his order, and a chaplet of beads suspended at his girdle.

But this defeat did not in the least intimidate the rebels in Norfolk. They were headed by one Ket, a tanner, who exercised his authority with the utmost insolence and outrage. They were more numerous than the western rebels, their number being at least twenty thousand. Intoxicated with power, Ket made the most exorbitant pretensions. He demanded that the gentry should be suppressed; that new counsellors should be placed about the king; and that the ancient rites of religion should be re-established. These demands being rejected, the insurgents marched to Norwich, and took post at Mouthold-hill, which overlooks the city. Here Ket, who affected great austerity, and regularity of conduct, erected his tribunal under an old oak, thence called the oak of reformation. Here he issued his ordinances; and committed a thousand enormities, under pretence of redressing some abuses.

Somerset endeavoured to heal these disorders by lenient methods; but the rebels having refused, with the most provoking insolence, a pardon which was offered them, it was determined to reduce them by force. The marquis of Northampton was accordingly sent against them, with about a thousand English infantry, and a body of Italian horse. But the marquis advancing to Norwich, contrary to his orders, his forces were routed with the loss of about an hundred men, among whom was John lord Sheffield. This defeat alarmed the government, and the king proposed to send Somerset at the head of a powerful army, in order to crush the rebels before their numbers increased to a more formidable number. But the protector, who affected popularity, chose not to appear in person against the rebels; but dispatched the earl of Warwick, at the head of six thousand men levied for carrying on the war against Scotland. Warwick marched with the utmost expedition, and came up with the insurgents at Dussingale. A bloody engagement ensued, in which the rebels were totally defeated, and above two thousand of them slain on the spot. Ket was hanged on the walls of Norwich castle, his brother on the top of Windham steeple, and nine of his principal followers on the boughs of the oak of reformation. This defeat intimidated the rebels of Yorkshire, where a considerable party were already in arms. The success of Ket had animated them to pursue the same measures for obtaining redress of their grievances; and his defeat struck them with despair: they threw down their arms and obtained a pardon.

But though the royal authority acquired strength by the suppression of these rebellions, they proved very detrimental to the king's affairs in foreign countries. The forces destined for Scotland were detained in England; and M. de Thermes landing there with fresh succours from France, he had leisure to reduce the distracted state of that unhappy country to some order. He took the castle of Boughtry, and put the whole garrison to the sword. Haddington, however, held out against all his efforts, and it was determined to reduce the place by famine. But this was not easily effected, supplies were continually thrown into the place during the summer, so that all his efforts proved abortive. At last winter effected what his whole power could not perform. The inclemency of the the weather was an obstacle not to be surmounted by the English. The earl of Rutland, warden of the East Marches, received orders to dismantle the place. He accordingly marched thither at the head of a strong body of forces, demolished the fortifications, and brought off the garrison. Nothing was now left to the English of all their conquests in Scotland, except the castles of Lauder, Douglas, Eymouth, and Roxburgh.

Nor were these all the ill consequences that resulted from the late commotions. Henry II. of France, encouraged by the intestine troubles of England, made an effort to execute his favourite scheme of recovering Boulogne. The court had for some time been apprehensive that he had formed that design, and sent over secretary Paget to the court of Charles V. in order to conclude an alliance with that powerful monarch. But Charles having formed a design of extending his dominions by acting the part of a champion for the catholic religion, listened not to the advances made by the court of England for entering into a strict confederacy. In the mean time Henry II. entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of a numerous army, took several castles, equipped a powerful fleet, and attempted a descent on the islands of Guernsey and Jersey; but a squadron of the English ships being immediately fitted out, fell upon the enemy, and drove them from the islands with the loss of above a thousand men.

Disappointed in receiving the expected assistance from the emperor, Somerset was desirous of concluding a peace with France and Scotland; especially as he was in no condition to support the necessary expences, and had experienced the difficulties and dangers that attended ministers in demanding and raising new subsidies: at the same time, he was determined to complete the great work of the Reformation successfully begun. He therefore determined to sacrifice Boulogne, in order to gain the friendship and assistance of Henry. But when he proposed the restitution of that place in the council, he met with the strongest opposition from his enemies; who knowing he was in no condition to carry on the war, were determined; for that very reason, to oppose every measure that had any tendency to procure a pacification, and to embrace the first opportunity that offered for depriving him of his dignity.

The unbounded authority enjoyed by Somerset exposed him to danger. The haughtiness of his carriage, his ambition, the contempt he expressed for all those who refused to be directed by his sentiments, joined to the consideration of his limited and inferior capacity, irritated daily the discontented. Warwick, the most powerful, and therefore the most dangerous of his enemies, formed a very formidable party against him. He had provoked the nobility and gentry by the preference he had shewn the people with regard to the inclosures, and the commotions that followed: they even dreaded a renewal of the same disorders from his present affectation of popularity. He had created a court of requests in his own house for the benefit of the poorer class of people, and readily embraced every measure calculated to promote their interest and safety. But tho' Somerset courted the affections of the people, his power among them was not considerable: the popish party, which still formed a principal part of the illiterate commonalty, were his inveterate enemies, and readily embraced every opportunity to condemn his conduct. All his actions were misrepresented; he was reproached with the execution of his own brother; a crime so unnatural in the eyes of mankind in general, that he was represented as a monster rather than a human being. Add to this the great parade he made of his wealth in erecting that magnificent palace in the Strand, which still bears his name; the parish church of St. Mary, and three bishops houses, having been pulled down, to furnish ground and materials for that structure. These imprudent and impolitic actions had given Somerset's enemies too many advantages over him; they magnified all his imprudences into crimes.

After several complaints, disputes, and fruitless treaties for an accommodation, the lord St. John, president of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five other counsellors, met, on Sunday the sixth of October, at Ely-House, where the earl of Warwick resided; and assuming to themselves the whole power of the council, sent for the lord mayor and aldermen of London; and after arraigning the protector's conduct, and charging him with the most enormous crimes, commanded them to obey no orders but such as were issued by themselves. Informed of this separate meeting, the king sent secretary Petre to know the reason for so uncommon a proceeding. He was very readily admitted, but not suffered to depart till they had deliberated on the state of the nation.

Somerset, on being informed of this defection of the counsellors, removed the king from Hampton-Court to Windsor-Castle; and arming his friends and servants, seemed determined to defend himself against his enemies. But finding that Cranmer and Paget were the only persons of rank that adhered to him, that he was abandoned by his partizans, and that the people did not seem to interest themselves in his favour, he lost all hopes of success, and offered to submit to the decisions of the council, provided they would promise to treat him with candour. This was promised him. He was, however, sent to the Tower, with some of his friends and adherents; among whom was Cecil, afterwards so famous in the reign of queen Elizabeth. On the fourteenth of October, he was brought before the council, and articles of accusation exhibited against him, of which the following were the chief: That he had not observed the conditions on which he had been made protector: that he had treated with ambassadors, without notifying it to the council; and had, by his own authority, disposed of governments and bishoprics: that he had held a court of requests in his own house: that he had debased the coin: that he had issued proclamations in the affair of inclosures, contrary to the opinion of the whole council: that he had not taken care to suppress the late insurrections; but had, on the contrary, supported and encouraged them: that he had occasioned the loss of the forts in the territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furnish them with provisions and ammunition: that he had endeavoured to instil into the king a bad opinion of his counsellors, by persuading him they intended to destroy him: that he had caused the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors: that he had maliciously, not only put the king in great fear, by carrying him so suddenly to Windsor, but thrown him into a dangerous disease: that he had armed himself and his servants; and that he intended to fly to Guernsey or Jersey.

As the duke had received no previous notice of these articles, he was not prepared to give his answer, and was therefore remanded back to the Tower. The marquiss of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Southampton, the lords St. John, Russell, and Westworth, were appointed governors of the king's person; and the principal administration of the government entrusted with the earl of Warwick, but without any title that might give him the least authority over the other counsellors. A revocation of the protector's power was also published under the great seal. But all the arts of Warwick could not persuade the well-meaning part of the council to believe the duke guilty of any thing intentionally bad, either against the king or the constitution of his country: they indeed thought him too obnoxious to the landed interest of England, to continue longer at the head of affairs; and therefore willingly engaged in measures for removing him from the seat of power, as well as for excluding him from ever regaining it for the future.

The Catholic party greatly exulted at the fall of the protector. They flattered themselves that Warwick, who was always considered as a friend to the Romish religion, would restore the ancient faith and mode of worship; but they were mistaken. Warwick always made religion subservient to his interest; and knowing that the king had imbibed a strong attachment to the Protestant doctrines, he was resolved not to oppose his inclinations, nor forfeit his own power by pursuing any violent measures. He accordingly declared his intention to promote the Reformation; and so strongly opposed the measures of Southampton, who was considered as the head of the Catholics, that he retired from court in disgust, and soon after died of vexation. Several other changes were also made in the council; but they all tended to convince the Romanists, that they had nothing to expect for their having been instrumental in the fall of the duke of Somerset. The earl of Warwick was made lord-high-admiral of England; the lord St. John was created earl of Wiltshire, and made treasurer, in the room of the duke of Somerset; Wootton, secretary of state, in the room of Smith; Russell was created earl of Bedford; the marquis of Northampton obtained the office of great chamberlain; and lord Wentworth, besides the office of chamberlain of the household, obtained the two large manors of Stepney and Hackney, which had been torn from the see of London.

Somerset wanted spirit to support his disgrace with dignity; and he was prevailed upon to confess, on his knees, before the council, all the articles of the charge exhibited against him; a submission that disgraced him in the eyes of the nation. The parliament deprived him of all his offices, and condemned him in a large fine. But Warwick thinking he had now sufficiently humbled the haughty Somerset, and that his abject behaviour had effectually destroyed the small remains of his authority, he readmitted him into the council; and even agreed to an alliance between their families, by the marriage of his son, lord Dudley, with the lady Jane Seymour, daughter to Somerset.

A. D. 1550. But though Warwick and his associates had so strenuously opposed a peace with France when proposed by Somerset, they changed their opinion when they had no longer the same motives for their opposition: they were now convinced that a peace was absolutely necessary, and a negotiation was accordingly entered into with Henry's ministers. But the French king, even at the opening of the conferences, declared, that he would not pay the pensions stipulated by his predecessor, being determined not to be tributary to any monarch upon earth. He, however, offered to pay a sum of money for the immediate restitution of Boulogne; and it was accordingly agreed to surrender the place for four hundred thousand crowns; one half to be paid immediately, and the other at the end of six months. Scotland was included in this treaty; and it was stipulated, that the English should restore Lauder and Douglas, and demolish the fortresses of Roxburgh and Eyemouth.

This peace was celebrated with great rejoicings, though it was very far from being agreeable to the people. The restitution of Boulogne, which had been considered as so great a crime even to have proposed it, in the duke of Somerset, opened the eyes of the people: they were now convinced, that the ambition of the courtiers, not any regard for the glory of the king and the welfare of the nation, had raised the storm that had swept Somerset from the seat of power. The murmurs became general, and soon reached the ears of the aspiring Warwick, who, to divert the public attention, and prevent their resentment from proving fatal to the administration, undertook the popular office of enquiring into certain misdemeanors of those who had been intrusted with the management of the public money, some of whom were severely punished.

Warwick had already declared his design to complete the Reformation, and he now began to carry his promise into execution. Several bishops, though they had extended their complaisance very far with regard to the measures of the court, were still friends to the tenets of the Roman church, and it was now determined to seize their revenues. The prosecution was begun with the famous Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, who, in several instances, had rendered himself obnoxious to the administration. He was required to acknowledge his former misbehaviour, and confess the justice of his confinement; to own that the king was supreme head of the church; that the power of making and dispensing with holidays was part of the prerogative; that the common-prayer-book was a godly and commendable form; that the king was a complete sovereign in his minority; that the statute of the six articles was justly repealed; and that the king had full authority to correct and reform what was amiss in ecclesiastical discipline. The bishop made no difficulty of signing all these articles, except the first. He maintained, that his conduct had always been inoffensive; and declared, that he would never own himself guilty of faults he had not committed. But the council, who never intended to accept of any acknowledgment, multiplied articles in proportion to his submission. At last, the prelate, from a dread of totally dishonouring his former conduct by mean compliances, determined to act with vigour. He refused to subscribe any articles they might present to him; and was deposed from his see by a commission appointed for that purpose. Several other bishops, much less suspected and obnoxious than Gardiner, underwent the same fate; as Day, bishop of Chichester; Heath, of Worcester; and Vais, of Exeter.

Nor were these plunderers of the church contented with the revenues of the priesthood; they extended their rapacity to objects of much smaller importance. The council issued an order for purging the libraries of all superstitious books, and all that were plated with gold and silver were condemned for their ornaments. If they were books of literature, they were destroyed, as useless; if of mathematics, geometry, or astronomy, they were supposed to be infected with magic. The libraries of Oxford suffered the utmost outrage; nor had the university power to oppose these barbarous violences; they even feared that their revenues would attract the rapacity of the earl of Warwick. The princess Mary herself was exposed to the utmost danger: she was required to change her religion, or at least to read St. Augustine and the ancient fathers, who would convince her of the errors of popery. But Mary was insensible to all these remonstrances. She was, however, alarmed for her own safety, and formed a plan for making her escape to the court of Charles V. but her design was discovered, and prevented. The emperor, however, made strong representations in her behalf: he even threatened to commence hostilities, if liberty of conscience was refused her. His remonstrances had the desired effect: it was not thought advisable to plunge the nation into a war on so slight an occasion; and Edward, who had imbibed the utmost detestation for the idolatrous worship of the Catholics, lamented with tears the obstinacy of his sister, and his own misfortune in being obliged to tolerate her errors.

A. D. 1551. The sweating sickness, which now raged in England, swept away great numbers of the inhabitants. Several of the nobility also felt the dreadful effects of this alarming contagion; among whom were the duke of Suffolk and his brother. By the death of these two noblemen, the title of duke of Suffolk became extinct in the family of Brandon, which was next in succession to the crown after the two daughters of Henry VIII. The earl of Warwick, who seems already to have formed the design of placing his own family on the throne, immediately procured Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, to be created duke of Suffolk. The last earl of Northumberland died without issue; and Sir Thomas Piercy, his brother, having been attainted on account of the share he had in the Yorkshire insurrection, during during the late reign, the title was extinct, and the estate was vested in the crown. Warwick, therefore, procured for himself those ample possessions which lay in the north, the most warlike part of the kingdom; and was dignified with the title of duke of Northumberland. Lord St. John, the treasurer, was created marquis of Winchester, and Sir William Herbert, earl of Pembroke; William Cecil was knighted, and made secretary of state, and Sir Robert Dudley, one of Northumberland's son, was sworn one of the six ordinary gentlemen of the king's bedchamber.

Several excellent regulations were now made for the benefit of commerce, and restoring the coin of the kingdom to its proper standard. Almost the whole commerce of the realm had hitherto been carried on by strangers. Henry the third had created into a corporation, and invested with particular privileges, all the merchants of the Hanse towns; and the council, sensible of the prejudices done by this means to the national industry, suppressed the grant; and all foreigners whatever, from this period, being obliged to pay the same duties, the English turned their attention to commerce, and a spirit of industry began to appear in the kingdom. But all these pleasing attempts were in danger of being rendered abortive by the civil commotions, excited by the unbounded ambition of the duke of Northumberland, who considered all increase of titles or possessions, either to himself or his adherents, only as steps to farther acquisitions; and perceiving the duke of Somerset, though deprived of his dignity, and even greatly lessened in the public esteem by his late pusillanimous conduct, still preserved a considerable degree of popularity, he resolved to ruin a man, whom he considered as the chief obstacle to his ambitious projects.

The alliance so lately concluded between their families had been productive of no cordial union; it only afforded Northumberland an opportunity of effecting, with more ease and certainty, the destruction of his rival. He began his infamous design by alienating the affections of the young king from his uncle, whom he represented as a very dangerous subject: he spread a report, that Somerset had caused himself to be proclaimed king in several counties, and that he was preparing an armed force to make himself master of his majesty's person. At the same time he continually offered him fresh insults, in order to provoke him to commit imprudent actions; and had gained over many of the friends and servants of that unfortunate nobleman to his interest. Thus provoked, the unguarded Somerset let fall some menacing expressions against Northumberland, and his treacherous confidants carried to his enemy every passionate word that dropped from him; they even revealed the schemes which they themselves suggested. The king was informed of these pretended discoveries, and by too readily believing the slanderous tales, he abandoned his uncle, and consented to his being put under arrest.

The treacherous and hypocritical Northumberland having thus obtained his majesty's permission, the duke of Somerset, the lord Grey, David and John Seymour, Hammond and Newdigate, two of the duke's servants, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were all apprehended the same night, and committed to prison. The next day the dutches of Somerset, with her two favourites, Crane and his wife, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, Banister, and others, were taken into custody. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had acted as a spy upon the duke's actions, charged him with having formed a design "to excite a rebellion in the north; to attack the horse-guards on a muster-day; to take possession of the Tower; and to raise an insurrection in London." But the only accusation that seemed to have some truth for its foundation was, that he had formed a design to murder the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, at an entertainment that was to be made for them at lord Paget's. Crane and his wife corroborated Palmer's evidence with regard to the last scheme; and it appears that some rash design of that nature had been proposed, though no regular plot had ever been formed, nor any measures taken for its execution.

The duke's trial came on before his peers at Westminster-hall, on the first of December, the marquis of Winchester presiding as high-steward. He denied the charge, and demanded to be confronted with his accusers; but this request, however equitable, was denied, and the court proceeded to the trial. The depositions of the witnesses as given before the privy-council, were delivered in to the jury, but they were neither produced in court, nor confronted with the prisoner. The duke's defence was, however, so satisfactory with regard to the treasonable part of the charge, that the peers gave a verdict in his favour; but they found him guilty of the other part of the charge, and he was condemned to suffer as a felon, pursuant to a statute passed in the reign of Henry VII. declaring it felony for any person to form a design of killing a privy-counsellor.

A. D. 1552. The behaviour of Somerset, from the time he received his sentence, was calm, resigned, and unaffected; he employed his time in reading, and composing exercises of devotion. He made decent application to the king in favour of his wife and family, and on the twenty-second of January he was carried to the scaffold on Tower-hill, where he was to suffer. He was attended on this melancholy occasion by Dr. Cox; and after performing some devotions, he addressed himself in a speech to the people, in which he declared his innocence with regard to the king, and his fidelity to his country: he submitted to his sentence, because awarded by the law: he professed his zeal and affection for the protestant religion, and a sincere satisfaction in what he had done to promote it. He expressed the highest regard for the person of the king; he exhorted the people to pay both him and the council the most implicit obedience: declared he died in peace with all mankind; asked pardon of all whom he had offended; and requested the prayers of all present. On finishing his speech, he adjusted himself with the utmost calmness on the block, where he received the blow which put a period to his life.

A dreadful groan ran through the whole audience when the fatal stroke was given. Many rushed in and dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they preserved as a precious relic; and several of them, when Northumberland, some time after, met a similar fate, upbraided him with this cruelty, and displayed before his eyes these symbols of his crime. Somerset certainly deserved a better fate. He was a person of great virtues, eminent for his piety, courteous and affable, sincere and candid in all his transactions, a patron of the poor and oppressed; but a much better general than a counsellor. The faults he committed were owing to weakness, not to any bad intention. He was never accused of personal vices, nor guilty of falshood, of perverting justice, of cruelty, or of oppression.

Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old soldier, and Sir Miles Partridge were hanged; and Sir Michael Stanhope, with Sir Thomas Arundel, beheaded, as the duke's confederates; but strenuously denied, in their last moments, the crime for which they suffered. Lord Paget, chancellor of the dutchy of Somerset, was deprived of his office, and condemned to pay a fine of six thousand pounds; and lord Rich, lord high chancellor, was also deprived of the seals, for having sent a letter to Somerset, informing him of the designs of the council.

The parliament, which met on the twenty-third of January, passed several bills both of a civil and religious nature; but the most remarkable was that which regarded the crime of treason; to which the commons annexed a clause of infinitely more consequence than the bill itself. It was declared, "That none should be attainted of treason on this act, unless two witnesses should come, and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except such as should make a voluntary confession; and that none should be questioned for any thing said or written against the king or government, but within three months after it was done." This equitable and constitutional clause was strongly opposed by all Northumberland's faction, as it totally condemned their late proceedings in the case of the unfortunate duke of Somerset; but notwithstanding all their arts, it passed both houses, and has ever since remained one of the chief bulwarks of English liberty.

Tonstal, bishop of Durham, was one of the most eminent prelates of that age, both on account of his learning and abilities, and the unblemished integrity of his life. He had always opposed by his vote and influence, all the late innovations in religion; but they were no sooner established, than he had readily submitted, and conformed himself to every system of doctrine which was established by authority. He justly concluded, that all private opinions ought to be sacrificed to the great concerns of public peace and tranquillity. But neither his obedient and tractable conduct, nor the unimpeached rectitude of his life and morals, could secure him against the rapacious designs of Northumberland, who had formed a design of appropriating to himself the ample revenues of the see of Durham, and of acquiring a principality in the northern counties. But before this design could be executed, it was necessary to deprive Tonstal of his bishopric. A bill of attainder was therefore brought into the house of lords, where it passed with only two dissenting voices, Cranmer and lord Stourton. But when the bill was sent down to the commons, they insisted that witnesses should be examined, in order to prove the charge against him; that the bishop should be confronted with his accusers and be permitted to speak in his own defence. These equitable demands were refused, and the commons nobly exerted the power with which they were intrusted, and threw out the bill. This opposition of the commons, so unusual in that age, convinced Northumberland that he had nothing to hope for from their condescension, and every thing to fear from their opposition. It was therefore resolved to dissolve the parliament, which had subsisted from the beginning of the present reign.

A. D. 1553. The utmost pains were taken to procure a parliament more subservient to the administration than the last. Accordingly the king wrote circular letters to all his sheriffs, requiring them to return such members as would serve the court; an example of the most fatal tendency, as the freedom of elections was a very essential part of the national liberty. The labours of the court were not in vain; the parliament answered all the expectations that were formed of it; no opposition was made to the measures of the administration. Tonstal had, during the recess of parliament, been deposed by lay commissioners, and the sentence was now confirmed by the parliament, who divided the see of Durham into two bishoprics; but the dignity of an earl palatine was vested in the king, who gave it to Northumberland. They also gave the ministry another mark of their attachment; they granted the king two subsidies and two fifteenths. Edward himself was a great economist; but the rapacity of his courtiers was so insatiable, that notwithstanding the plunder of the churches, colleges, and hospitals, the fall of the many manors that belonged to them, and the four hundred thousand crowns received from France, for the restitution of Boulogne, the debt of the crown amounted to three hundred thousand pounds sterling.

During the spring of the preceding year Edward had been seized with the measles, and afterwards with the small-pox, but passed through both without any dangerous symptoms, and his health had some time been fully re-established, when he was seized with a cough, which ended in a consumption. It was, however, hoped that the king's youth, the approach of spring, and the medicines administered by his physicians, would by degrees get the better of his disorder; but it proved of too malignant a nature, and increased so fast, that when the parliament met in the beginning of March, both houses were obliged to attend him at Whitehall, to hear the reasons for their being called together.

Northumberland perceived that it was now necessary to complete the design he had formed for placing his own family on the throne of England. He therefore suffered none but his own creatures to approach the royal person. At the same time he affected the most anxious concern for the young monarch's health and recovery. By these hypocritical expressions of duty, he soon gained the first place in the affections and confidence of young Edward. This point being gained, the next was to prevail upon the king to alter the succession. Edward, who was sincerely attached to the protestant religion, had often expressed his dread of the fatal consequences that would inevitably attend its professors, if so bigotted a catholic as his sister Mary should ever ascend the throne. Northumberland improved these melancholy reflections, and artfully insinuated, that the only method of averting those dreadful misfortunes from the professors of the new religion, consisted in changing the succession. He added that the king possessed the same power with his father, and might therefore transfer the crown from the princess Mary to the lady Jane Grey, eldest daughter to Frances Brandon, now dutches of Suffolk. Observing, at the same time, that the princess Elizabeth must inevitably share the fate of her sister; because the only pretence they could use against Mary was her illegitimacy, which equally affected Elizabeth, the marriages both of Catherine and Anne having been declared unlawful by the legislature.

Edward, whose prevailing passion was the interest of the reformed religion, was pleased with this expedient. He knew the lady Jane to be a person equally distinguished for the accomplishments of her mind and person: strongly attached to the reformed religion, a friend to virtue, and a lover of her country. He therefore determined to leave the crown to that accomplished princess; especially as her mother had been expressly mentioned in the will of Henry VIII. as heir to the throne after his own children.

It was now necessary for Northumberland to finish the other part of his political fabric, in order to settle the crown on his own family. This was effected by persuading the duke of Suffolk to give his daughter the lady Jane Grey, in marriage to his fourth son, the lord Guildford Dudley. Suffolk, who owed all his preferments to Northumberland, hesitated not to form the offered alliance. This being effected, Northumberland determined to strengthen his interest by other marriages, and accordingly brought about a match between the lady Catherine Gray, second daughter to the duke of Suffolk, and the lord Herbert, eldest son to the earl of Pembroke; and bestowed his only daughter Catherine, upon lord Hastings, eldest son to the earl of Huntingdon. These marriages were celebrated with such remarkable pomp and festivity, that the people, who hated Northumberland, could not forbear expressing their indignation in the warmest terms, at seeing such public demonstrations of joy, while their beloved monarch was languishing on the bed of sickness.

Nothing now remained to complete the design of Northumberland, but the execution of the change which Edward had determined to make in the succession. On the eleventh of June, Sir Edward Montague, chief justice of the Common-pleas, Sir John Baker and Sir Thomas Bromley, two of the judges, the attorney and solicitor-general, attended the council, in obedience to a summons they had received for that purpose, and Edward gave them the minutes of an intended deed for altering the succession, with orders to draw them up in the form of a patent. They were were astonished, and desired leave to consult together on a subject of so much importance to the kingdom in general, and themselves in particular. After some time, they returned, and declared, that they could not obey the king's orders. They justly observed, that the settlement of the crown by Henry VIII. was made pursuant to an act of parliament; whereas this not only wanted that authority, but, by an act passed in the beginning of the present reign, it was declared to be treason in any of the heirs, their aiders and abettors, to attempt to change the order of succession. The duke of Northumberland was so incensed at their refusal, that he behaved in the most indecent manner; it was even feared he would proceed to violence against their persons. The king declared, he intended to summon a parliament, in order to obtain their ratification of the deed; but in the mean time, commanded them, on their allegiance, to draw the letters patent in the legal form. At the same time, the judges were informed by the council, that their refusal would subject them to the pains of high-treason. At last it was determined that a special commission should be passed by the king and council, commanding the judges to draw a patent for the new settlement of the crown; and that a pardon should be granted them for any offence they might commit in executing the commands they had received. The patent was accordingly drawn, and signed by all the judges, except Sir James Hales, who, though a sincere friend to the Reformation, obstinately refused to put his name to the instrument. Cranmer alone, of all the officers of state, opposed this scheme, and laboured assiduously to persuade Edward not to alter the succession. He alledged, that he could not, without perjury, sign the patent, as he had already sworn to the observation of Henry's will; but, at Edward's earnest intreaty, and Northumberland's authoritative instances, he signed the instrument.

The health of Edward now declined visibly every day, and all hopes of his recovery vanished. The people had not scrupled, for some time, to impute the disorder of Edward to the practices of Northumberland; and an incident which now happened tended to confirm them in their opinion. His physicians were all discharged by an order of council procured by Northumberland, and the king committed to the care of an ignorant old woman, who engaged, by the help of her nostrums, to restore him, in a short time, to his former health and vigour. But unfortunately for the peace of England, her promises were never performed. The symptoms were every day aggravated; his cough increased; his legs swelled, his colour became pale and livid, and he resigned his breath at Greenwich on the sixth of July, in the sixteenth year of his age, and the seventh of his reign.

Edward was almost idolized by his subjects. He was of a mild and sweet disposition, and scrupulously attached to the principles of equity and justice. His learning was far superior to his years. He loved the liberal arts before he knew them. Had he been indulged with a longer life, there is all the reason in the world to suppose he would have made his people happy by a wife and equitable administration.

M A R Y.

A. D. 1553. A Civil war is the general consequence of a breach in the order of succession. England had now been involved in that dreadful calamity, had not the duke of Northumberland, the sole author of this ambitious attempt, been hated by the people. Mary was known to be a bigotted Catholic; but her title to the crown, after the death of her brother, admitted of no dispute; for the objections stated by the friends of lady Jane were new, and unknown to the nation. Mary was considered by the people in general as the legal successor of Edward. But the ambition of Northumberland was not to be restrained; he determined to support the title of lady Jane, tho' he could not be ignorant that he was acting contrary to the opinion of the people. He knew the opposition would be powerful, and therefore determined to act with caution. He concealed the king's death for some days; and prevailed upon the council to request the attendance of the two princesses, Mary and Elizabeth, under pretence of the bad state of health of their brother, who desired the assistance of their counsel, and the consolation of their company.

Ignorant of the treacherous design, Mary readily obeyed the summons, and was arrived within half a day's journey of the capital, when she discovered the snare that was laid for her destruction. She received a letter from the earl of Arundel, informing her of the death of the king, of the settlement of the crown upon lady Jane, and of the design of Northumberland to seize her person. She was now convinced of the necessity of immediately providing for her own safety. The sudden death of one of her servants, who was supposed to have died of the plague, furnished her with an excuse for a precipitate return. Nor did she think herself safe till she reached Framlingham, in Suffolk; whence she wrote, in character of queen, to the council and nobility, demanding to be acknowledged and proclaimed.

Northumberland finding it in vain to dissemble any longer, threw off the mask, and resolved to act in a more open manner. He engaged the council to depute him, and the earl of Suffolk, to Sion-house, a seat on the banks of the Thames, where the lady Jane then resided, to inform her that she had been appointed by the deceased king to succeed him in the throne. Jane, who was nearly of the same age with Edward, had received her education with him; and could personal merit have entitled her to the crown, she had enjoyed it without opposition. She was a lady of the most amiable person, the most engaging disposition, the most accomplished parts. The study of the learned languages was at once her employment and her delight; and she preferred the lessons of Plato to the amusements of the court. She was a stranger to ambition; she desired not to disturb the tranquillity of her country. She had hitherto been unacquainted with the secret dispositions of Edward in her favour, she never imagined she was destined to the throne. Struck with surprize and consternation at the message, she refused the offer; alledging the preferable right of the two princesses; and warning them of the fatal consequences that would, in all probability, attend so dangerous, and, in her opinion, so criminal an enterprise; begging they would let her continue in the private station she had hitherto enjoyed. She wished to refuse a sceptre to which she had no right, and which she considered as a burden.

Every argument was used by her father-in-law, her father, and her husband, whom she tenderly loved, to combat this resolution; and she at last yielded to their importunities, but with so much reluctance, that her consent was rather extorted than given. She was immediately conducted to the Tower, where it was then customary for the new monarchs to reside some days before their coronation. The council, who found themselves, in effect, Northumberland's prisoners prisoners, were obliged to attend. They issued orders for proclaiming the lady Jane; but so thoroughly were the ambitious schemes of Northumberland detested, that they were observed only in the capital: the injustice of that nobleman had effectually effaced the merits of the lovely victim of her family's ambition. The news of this revolution was received with silent surprize by the people; nor were any of those acclamations heard, which are usual on such occasions: even the heralds seemed to perform their office with regret.

During these transactions, Mary exerted all her interest to oppose the designs of Northumberland, and to assert her own title to the crown. She was attended by great numbers of the neighbouring inhabitants; and, by positively promising to leave religion in the same state she found it, reserving nothing more than a liberty to profess her own, she fixed the people in her interest; and though strongly attached to the Reformation, they promised to support her with their lives and fortunes. She was now joined by numbers of the nobility and gentry; particularly by the earls of Bath and Suffex, Sir Thomas Mordaunt, Sir John Wharton, Sir William Drury, Sir Henry Bedingfield, and Sir Henry Jernegar, who all repaired to her standard, and brought her a strong reinforcement. Sir Edward Hastings, brother to the earl of Huntingdon, having been ordered by the government to levy troops for the service of lady Jane, deserted to Mary, at the head of four thousand men. Even the fleet which had been sent by Northumberland to cruise on the coast of Suffolk, in order to prevent either the escape of Mary, or the landing of foreign forces to her assistance, submitted to that princess.

These unexpected events alarmed Northumberland, who ordered the army in the neighbourhood of London to march immediately towards Newmarket, under the command of the duke of Suffolk. But the counsellors persuaded Northumberland to head the army in person; observing, that his known valour, his superior military acquisitions, and the dread of his name, already terrible in Norfolk by his victory in the late reign, would strike the insurgents with fear. He followed their advice, and joined the army, which amounted to six thousand foot and two thousand horse.

The approach of Northumberland alarmed several of Mary's friends, and they advised the princess to retire to the continent. Had the duke advanced with that expedition which the cause he had undertaken to support demanded, the advice had, probably, been followed; but he marched in so slow and deliberate a manner, that Mary's friends had time to recover from their fears, and to join her standard with all their forces. When Northumberland reached Bury, he found that great numbers of his men had deserted, and he was obliged to wait for reinforcements from London before he could advance against Mary's army.

The departure of Northumberland gave the counsellors an opportunity of leaving the Tower, where they had been in some measure confined by that ambitious nobleman, under pretence of attending upon the person of lady Jane till her coronation. They assembled at Baynard's Castle, a house belonging to the earl of Pembroke, and invited thither all the noblemen whom they conceived to be well affected to Mary. A considerable number attended; and the conference was opened by the earl of Arundel, who inveighed, in the strongest terms, against "the cruelty and injustice of Northumberland, his insatiable avarice and unbounded ambition, the criminal design he had formed for altering the succession, and the wickedness in which he had involved the whole council: and concluded with moving, that they might return immediately to their duty and allegiance, which they owed their lawful sovereign, by proclaiming Mary queen, as the only method they could now take to preserve the tranquillity of the state, and recover their own honours."

Pembroke seconded the motion; and laying his hand upon his sword, swore he was ready to fight any man who should presume to oppose so salutary a measure. But there was no occasion for employing force: the majority expressed their approbation of the proposal: the lord-mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend immediately; and Mary was proclaimed on the nineteenth of July, in the streets of London and Westminster. Te Deum was sung in the cathedral of St. Paul's, and the event celebrated with great rejoicings by the populace. Even the duke of Suffolk himself, who commanded in the Tower, finding all resistance would be in vain, ordered the gates to be thrown open, and declared for queen Mary. Lady Jane again descended to a private station; which she would never have left, had not the ambition of her relations forced her to grasp a sceptre which belonged to another.

Orders were now dispatched to the duke of Northumberland to disband his army; but before they reached his hands, he had been deserted by his troops, and endeavoured to gain the favour of the queen by an early submission: he proclaimed her queen with all the external marks of joy and satisfaction. But Mary was not to be deceived by the hypocritical behaviour of Northumberland; she knew him to be an inveterate enemy to her whole family, and that his expressions of loyalty and zeal for her service were wholly extorted by fear. She therefore immediately sent the earl of Arundel to arrest that ambitious nobleman, his sons and accomplices. The haughty Northumberland lost at once both his hopes and his courage. Arundel no sooner informed him of the purport of his visit, than he fell at his feet, and, in the most submissive manner, begged his favour. This abject behaviour, so peculiar to fallen insolence, excited the contempt, rather than the pity of Arundel. He told the duke the queen's orders must be obeyed; and Northumberland, together with two of his sons, and his principal accomplices, were sent to London, and committed to the Tower. The duke of Suffolk, lady Jane, and lord Guilford Dudley, were also taken into custody.

All opposition being thus destroyed, Mary, attended by vast numbers of people, and a long train of courtiers, set out from Framlingham for London, where she was met by the princess Elizabeth, with a body of two thousand men. She had raised those forces as a defence for her own person during the troubles which seemed to threaten the kingdom with all the horrors of a civil war; but on being informed of her sister's success, and the entire submission of Northumberland's party, she proceeded, at the head of her little army, to join her sister; and had the address to gain her confidence, by assuring her that these men were raised for her service.

Mary made a very pompous entry into London; and proceeding immediately to the Tower, where the duke of Norfolk, who had been detained prisoner ever since the death of her father; Courtney, son to the marquis of Exeter, who, without being charged with any crime, had been subject to the same punishment ever since his father's attainder; the three prelates, Gardiner, Tonstal, and Bonner, who had been confined for their adherence to the Catholic religion, appeared before her, and implored her clemency and protection. She embraced them all in the most affectionate manner, saying to the constable of the Tower, "These are my prisoners;" ordered them instantly to be set at liberty, and admitted them to her confidence and favour. The prelates were restored to their sees; Courtney was created earl of Devonshire, and Gardiner made lord high chancellor of England.

Notwithstanding the promise Mary had made to continue the religion established by Edward, she was determined to make promises, oaths, justice, and even interest itself, give way to her favourite project of restoring the religion of the church of Rome. She granted, indeed, a kind of general amnesty, and remitted the subsidy voted to the late king. But these were vain and fallacious appearances; they were soon followed by all the rigours of tyranny. The queen, naturally solemn, melancholy, and opinionated, was so much the more susceptible of the impressions of false zeal, as she had been brought up in the most profound ignorance; and while her head was disturbed about her religion, her heart was the more severely set against the Protestants. From these sources her whole reign became a scene of misery, and the kingdom was deluged with the blood of its inhabitants.

Her first care, after securing the persons of those from whom she expected the greatest opposition, was to consult with her friends the best method of extirpating the reformed religion. She was so determined to keep no measures with the Protestants, and force the kingdom to join immediately in what she called the Union of the Catholic Church, that had it not been for the more artful counsels of Charles V. and bishop Gardiner, she had sent directly for cardinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to the bishop of Rome. But they both disapproving of a step of such dangerous tendency, the queen was, with great reluctance, prevailed upon to suspend her resolution for the present, and to content herself with publishing a liberty of conscience in affairs of religion.

This declaration, which was made by the queen in council on the twelfth of August, was rendered as public as possible, and the partizans of Mary magnified it as a noble instance of the queen's generosity. The Protestants, however, considered it in a very different light: they were alarmed for their religion; and their fears were soon confirmed by the confidence of the Catholics, who made no scruple of inveighing, in the most bitter terms, against the tenets of the Protestants. Bourne, one of the chaplains of bishop Bonner, in a sermon preached before that prelate in the cathedral of St. Paul's, used the most indecent invectives against Edward's administration, particularly with regard to the Reformation. But he should have remembered, that the memory of Edward was still dear to the people who were alarmed for their religion, and it could not be supposed they would part with it easily. Accordingly a furious tumult was excited: some of the audience reproached him in the harshest terms; others pelted him with stones; and one of them threw a dagger with such dexterity at the preacher, that it narrowly missed his face, and stuck fast in the wood of the pulpit behind him. At last the people grew so furious, that Bourne would probably have been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent Protestant ministers, interposed, and conveyed him, by a private door, out of the church, to a neighbouring house.

So glaring a proof of the people's dislike to popery should have been a caution to the administration not to proceed too zealously in favour of superstition: but it produced the contrary effect; they determined to have recourse to more violent measures. The Protestants were filled with terror: they plainly perceived that religion and the laws of their country would soon suffer a violent change, and that those who refused to adhere to the new statutes would be considered as rebels. The city of London shewed, on this occasion, some dawnings of the spirit of liberty; they made no enquiries into the tumult excited against Bourne in the cathedral. The government suspecting the magistrates were not sufficiently assiduous in the cause of superstition, insisted on their declaring whether they were able, by their own authority, to prevent all public tumults; and if they thought themselves incapable of effecting so necessary a design, the lord mayor was ordered to surrender the sword of justice into the queen's hand, that she might herself use it for the good of her people.

Mary's reign had not yet been stained with any sanguinary act; but it was now thought necessary to open the sluices of severity, which soon deluged the land with blood. On the eighteenth of August, the duke of Northumberland was brought to his trial in Westminster-hall, and arraigned for high-treason.

After the indictment was read, the duke desired permission to propose two questions to the peers who were appointed to decide his fate: first, Whether any person could be guilty of treason for having obeyed orders given him by the council, under the great seal? Secondly, Whether those who were equally guilty with himself could sit as his judges? The high-steward answered, That the great-seal of an usurper had no authority; and that those peers who had neither been impeached nor convicted, were innocent in the eye of the law, and therefore might be admitted on any jury. These answers, though far from being uncontrovertible, sufficiently convinced the duke, that it would be absolutely useless to make any objections: he therefore pleaded guilty to the indictment. His example was followed by the marquiss of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, who were tried at the same tribunal, and were all condemned to suffer as traitors. Sir John and Sir Henry Gates, Sir Andrew Dudley, and Sir Thomas Palmer, who had been so instrumental in bringing the duke of Somerset to the block during the late reign, pleaded guilty, and received the same sentence.

The character of the queen, and the present situation of affairs, left Northumberland no hopes of favour. He was, indeed, detested by all parties, and his death was considered as a necessary act of justice. On the scaffold, he professed himself a member of the Catholic religion; and lamented his having plundered the effects of the church, especially as it was not now in his power to make restitution. But whether these were his real sentiments, or whether he hoped, by this declaration, to render the queen more favourable to his family, cannot now be known. However that be, the people who had sincerely lamented the duke of Somerset, beheld with joy the punishment of his oppressor. Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates, suffered with him. The rest were thought proper objects of the royal clemency, as they pleaded constraint as an excuse for their treason. Suffolk himself was pardoned, and recovered his liberty; an indulgence which he owed, in a great measure, to the contempt entertained of his capacity. Sentence had been pronounced against the lady Jane, and her husband the lord Guilford Dudley, but without any design of carrying it at present into execution.

The troubles occasioned by the ambitious Northumberland being entirely appeased, the administration applied themselves to execute the queen's favourite design, the re-establishment of the Popish religion in England. They began with silencing all preachers, under pretence of discouraging controversy, except such as should obtain a particular licence from Gardiner; and it was easily foreseen that none but Catholics would be favoured with such a privilege. Bradford, one of the two Protestant ministers who had rescued Bourne in the late tumult at St. Paul's, was committed to prison, and his companion, Rogers, was confined to his own house. Judge Hales, who alone, of all his brethren, had refused to sign the instrument which transferred the crown to lady Jane Gray, was sent to prison, where he was treated with such severity, that he fell into a frenzy, and put an end to his own life. Sir Edward Montague, who was also a Protestant, was deprived of his office, and fined a thousand pounds, for having assisted in drawing up the settlement of the crown in favour of lady Jane; and his post given to Sir Thomas Bromley, a bigotted Papist, though he had been equally concerned in drawing up that deed, and also signed it without hesitation. Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, and Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, were imprisoned, for daring to preach without a licence from Gardiner. Coverdale, bishop of Exeter, was also confined to his own house, for the same crime. Peter Martyr, professor of divinity at Oxford, suffered so many indignities and insults from the enemies of the Reformation, that he was obliged to leave his chair, and retire for protection to the archbishop's palace at Lambeth. Some zealous Catholics moved, that he might be committed to prison; but Gardiner opposed their attempts with his whole authority. He pleaded that the professor had come over in consequence of a particular invitation from the government, and was therefore protected from persecution by every precept of equity, and even by the laws of nature and nations. These reasons had the desired effect; and Gardiner generously furnished him with supplies for his journey.

Bonner, the sworn enemy of Cranmer, had industriously propagated a report, that the archbishop had promised the queen to make a public recantation of his errors, and to return into the bosom of the Roman church. This report so exasperated the good old prelate, who perceived that Bonner's sole intention in propagating so base a calumny, was to delude the people into a compliance with popery under the sanction of his name, that he thought it incumbent on him to draw up some public testimony against this aspersions. He accordingly wrote a declaration, in which he called the queen herself to witness that he never made any such declaration as his enemies alleged; and offered, with the assistance of Peter Martyr, and four or five others whom he would name, to defend, against any number of catholic divines, in a public disputation, the liturgy, doctrines, and every part of the reformation, and to prove the whole to be agreeable to the tenets and practice of the primitive church, and warranted by the holy scriptures. He added, "that as the devil was a liar from the beginning and the father of lies, so he had, at this time stirred up his servants to persecute Christ and his true religion; that the lying spirit now endeavoured to restore the latin satisfactory masses, a thing of his own invention and device; and in order to effectuate his purpose, had falsely made use of Cranmer's name and authority." This inflammatory paper raised the fury of the catholics, and the rather as they well knew the abilities of the protestant divines he mentioned, and did not chuse to enter the lists with such able disputants. Cranmer was, therefore, committed to prison, tried for the part he had acted in opposing the queen's accession, and sentence of high treason was pronounced against him. The sentence was not, however, executed; Cranmer was reserved for a more cruel punishment. He had been doomed to destruction the moment Mary ascended the throne, though the apology he published hastened his imprisonment. Mary should have remembered that Cranmer had done her many good offices with her father; it was owing to his interposition that the severe prejudices that monarch had entertained against her were mitigated; but being the person who pronounced her mother's divorce, and the author of the establishment of the Reformation in England, he became the object of her most inveterate hatred.

The imprisonment of the primate was followed by that of bishop Latimer. Nor was there hardly a bishop, or even a preacher who had signalized himself in establishing the tenets of the Reformation, and did not either recant or fly beyond the seas, that escaped either deprivation or imprisonment. John a Lasco, a Prussian nobleman and minister of the German protestant church in Austin-friars, with all the other reformed preachers, who were foreigners, were banished the kingdom. These were followed by a great number of English families, who had embraced the Reformation. They foresaw that the destructive hand of bigotry would soon light the flames of persecution in their unhappy country, and were unwilling to behold the miseries of their fellow-subjects.

The people had now no hopes of redress but from the parliament, which was summoned to meet on the fifth of October. But they soon found that the commons had now lost that spirit they exerted in the case of Tonstal. It was barely necessary to speak the word, and the national religion was changed. The nobles knew it was their interest to support the queen, and the commons were most of them papists. Mary was well informed of this, and therefore ordered a mass of the Holy Ghost to be performed in latin, with all the ancient ceremonies, before both houses of parliament, on the first day of opening the session, though directly contrary to an act of parliament. Dr. Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, and Dr. Harley, bishop of Hereford, nobly supported the laws of their country: they refused to kneel, and were immediately thrust by violence out of the house. This violation of the laws of Edward was followed by an act that abolished them. Thus, by bringing things back to the state in which they were at the death of Henry the eighth, the mass was established, and Mary continued in possession of the title of supreme head of the church. Here it was thought she would have stopped, and it was pretended, that the other abuses of popery, which were chiefly grievous to the nation, would never be revived. But it soon appeared that this was only the first step towards establishing the Romish religion in England. The parliament, however, passed an act of a popular nature. They abolished every species of treason which was contained in the statute of Edward III. and every species of felony which did not subsist before the first year of Henry VIII.

But however ready the parliament might be in gratifying the queen with regard to the affairs of religion, they were determined to follow their own judgment in other articles. Among those her choice of a husband appeared of so much importance to the interest of the nation, that they resolved not to submit tamely, in that respect, to her will and pleasure. The ambitious Charles V. having by his despotism and disregard to the principles of natural justice, occasioned a revolt in the empire, and been obliged to submit to articles of peace, which secured the independency of Germany, was very desirous of retrieving his losses by acquiring the crown of England to his family. His son Philip was a widower, and the emperor immediately on the death of Edward, sent over an agent to signify his intentions to the queen. Mary, who was very desirous of being united with a house from whence she derived her origin, and which might afford her assistance in the execution of her designs with regard to the catholic religion, embraced the offer with great satisfaction. The negotiations were carried on with the utmost secrecy and success. But the commons were no sooner informed of this intended marriage, than they made it known to the whole nation. The parliament were greatly alarmed with the thoughts of an alliance which they considered as prejudicial to their country; they could not bear the thoughts of seeing a Spaniard on the throne of England, especially one who had already patronized the inquisition in his own dominions, and recorded his cruelty with the blood of the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, Naples, Sicily and Milan. The commons now shook off their submission to the court, and boldly remonstrated on this delicate subject. Mary expected not such spirited measures, and the next day dissolved the parliament.

Gardiner was charmed at the boldness of the commons, and advised the queen to suspend the progress of the ecclesiastical innovations till after the marriage was completed, as he foresaw that the assistance of Spain would be necessary to complete the intended design. He added, that as great pains had been taken to prejudice the nation against the Spanish alliance; and if that point was urged, at the same time with the further innovations in religion, it would possibly occasion a general revolt and insurrection. The queen had some time before desired pope Julius III. to reconcile herself and her kingdoms to the holy see; and requested that cardinal Pole might be appointed legate for the performance of that pious office. The nomination of Pole to perform this ceremony was not agreeable either to the emperor or Gardiner. The cardinal, though more sincere in his religious opinions, was less guided by maxims of civil policy than the English prelate. Pole was therefore stopped by order of the emperor at Dillinghen, a town on the Danube, Danube, and Charles afterwards obtained Mary's consent for this detention.

But however cogent the reasons of Gardiner might be with regard to suspending the ecclesiastical innovations, they were not sufficient to restrain the furious zeal of Mary; she caused the new statutes to be carried into execution with the utmost rigour. The mass was universally restored. Celibacy was exacted of the priesthood, and vast numbers of the clergy were deprived of their benefices, for having availed themselves of the indulgences of their late beloved monarch. A visitation was appointed in order to restore more perfectly the ancient rites. The visitors were enjoined to forbid the oath of supremacy from being taken by the clergy on their promotion to any benefice; notwithstanding the laws of Henry VIII. were still in force. So contradictory are generally the actions of bigotted enthusiasts.

A. D. 1554. The Spanish marriage was at last concluded, and that it might give as little disgust as possible, the articles were drawn up very favourable and even advantageous to England. It was agreed, that though Philip should have the title of king, the administration should be solely in the hands of the queen; that no foreigner should be capable of enjoying any office in the kingdom; that no innovation should be made in the English laws, customs, or privileges; that Philip should not carry the queen abroad without her consent, nor any of her children without the consent of the nobility; that sixty thousand pounds a year should be settled on her as a jointure; that the male issue of the marriage should inherit together with England, both Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that, if Don Carlos, Philip's son by his former marriage, should die, and his line be extinct, the queen's issue, whether male or female, should inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip.

The publication of these articles, instead of pleasing the English occasioned a general discontent. They distrusted, with reason, the artful emperor, and still more his son, who was equally inclined to superstition and tyranny. They were shocked with the idea of those barbarities which had torn in pieces the old and new worlds. The inquisition displayed itself in all its horrors; and the most specious advantages seemed only intended to veil the most hideous slavery. The spirit of revolt spread itself through the kingdom, and the people seemed determined to maintain their independence or perish in the attempt.

Sir Thomas Wyatt, a Kentish gentleman, very considerable on account of his ample fortune, and still more so by the opinion the world entertained of his virtues and abilities, engaged to arm the inhabitants of Kent, while Sir Peter Carew, a gentleman of great interest in the west of England, undertook to assemble the inhabitants of Devonshire. The duke of Suffolk also engaged in this insurrection, and promised to raise the Midland counties. Carew, prompted either by his impetuosity or his apprehensions, took up arms before the day appointed. In consequence of this rash action, his troops were soon dispersed by a body of the queen's forces, and he himself obliged to take refuge in France. Suffolk was more unfortunate; he was disappointed in his hopes of raising the inhabitants of the Midland parts of the kingdom, committed himself to the care of a servant, who betrayed him to the earl of Huntingdon, and he was sent a prisoner to London.

Wyat was at first successful. He summoned his friends to meet him in the field on the twenty-fifth of January, and was immediately joined by Sir Henry Inley, Sir George Harper, the two Knevets, Sir Thomas Colepepper, the two sons of lord Cobham, and many other gentlemen of distinction in Kent. Proper persons were immediately dispatched into different parts of the county, to rise the people, while he himself, with some of his principal followers, retired to Rochester, took possession of the bridge, and fortified the eastern part of the city, which he intended as a rendezvous for his army. At the same time he ordered a manifesto to be published at Maidstone, and other places, against the queen's marriage, and invited every well wisher to his country to join him in his endeavours to defend England from the insolent and tyrannical government of a haughty foreigner. The people were soon alarmed at their danger, and flocked to Wyat's standard in considerable numbers.

This rebellion threw the queen and her council into great consternation. They were incapable of making any vigorous efforts against the force of a discontented people. The inclemency of the season rendered it very difficult to raise a number of forces, and those that had been collected to escort Mary to the capital, were disbanded. It was therefore determined to send an herald to Wyat, with assurance of a full pardon; but the herald not being suffered to deliver his message, the duke of Norfolk was dispatched against the rebels, at the head of six hundred of the trained-bands, and the queen's guards. The two parties soon met, but the very instant the duke's artillery began to play, the Londoners deserted and joined the insurgents. This treacherous action threw the duke into the utmost consternation. The ranks of his little army were thrown into confusion, and it was with great difficulty that he himself and Sir Henry Jernegan, captain of the queen's guards, were saved by a precipitate flight. Thus the rebels, without striking a blow, became masters of the field, the duke's baggage, and eight pieces of brass cannon.

Animated by this success, Wyat led his army towards the capital, persuaded that the Londoners would open their gates, and declare in his favour. At Dartford he was met by lord Hastings and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, who promised him, in the queen's name, every reasonable satisfaction he should require. This concession raised the presumption of Wyat; he now thought himself invincible, and had the insolence to demand possession of the tower, and of the queen's person, with authority to change the council at his pleasure. Hastings could not bear to hear such shameful conditions with any degree of patience; he defied Wyat, and returned immediately with Cornwallis to court.

The demands of Wyat increased the consternation of the council. The queen repaired to Guildhall, acquainted the citizens with the insolent answer of the rebels; asserted she had done nothing in the marriage treaty, without the advice of her council, and declared her resolution to throw herself upon the protection of the faithful city of London. Pleased with this condescension in their sovereign, the citizens resolved to oppose the rebels. They ordered the bridge to be strongly barricadoed, and every precaution to be taken that had any tendency to render the efforts of the insurgents abortive, should they attempt to force a passage into the city.

Wyat, who was ignorant of these resolutions, advanced as far as Southwark, in order to cross over the bridge into the city; but finding it would be difficult, if not impossible to force a passage, he determined to cross the Thames at Kingston; but found on his arrival, that the bridge was broken down. This obliged him to halt some time till the bridge was repaired. By these delays, the critical season, on which all popular commotions depend, was entirely lost. He entered Westminster indeed without resistance; but no person of note joining him, his men became dispirited, and insensibly forsook their leader, who was at last taken prisoner near Temple-bar by Sir Maurice Berkley. The principal leaders were also taken, and the scene closed with the most bloody executions. Above seventy persons suffered for this rebellion. It had been industriously reported, that Wyat on his examination, had accused the princess Elizabeth and the earl of Devonshire, as accomplices places in this insurrection. But Wyatt took occasion to declare on the scaffold, before all the people, that they had no share whatever in his rebellion.

Several attempts had been made to accuse the princess Elizabeth of some design against the peace of the government, and she was in the utmost danger of falling a sacrifice to the malevolence of her sister. Her being the daughter of Anne Boleyn, her attracting, by her superior qualities, the regard of the nation, and her engaging the affections of Courtney, earl of Devonshire, who was allied to the crown, and on whom the queen had matrimonial views, were crimes which the gloomy soul of Mary could never forgive. She was shut up in the Tower, and all access to her denied. But the declaration made by Wyatt rendered it impossible to prove any thing against her; and she made to good a defence before the council, that there was not a single pretence left for keeping her in confinement. She was therefore restored to her liberty; but on refusing an offer of marriage made her by the duke of Savoy, she was again committed to custody, under a strong guard, at Woodstock. The earl of Devonshire experienced the same ungenerous treatment: he was equally innocent with the princess; nothing could be proved against him; but he was committed prisoner to Fotheringay castle.

Mary, who was incapable of generosity, and to whom the virtue of clemency was unknown, determined to remove every person from whom the least danger might be apprehended. Lady Jane Gray and her husband had languished in prison ever since the queen's accession, and it was now determined to finish the dismal tragedy. Fakenham, abbot of Westminster, was sent to the Tower to denounce the fatal message. Lady Jane received the tidings of death with great composure: she had long expected it; and the innocence of her life, as well as the long train of calamities she had suffered, rendered the passage through the valley of the shadow of death not unwelcome. During three days, the Romish priests were perpetually disturbing her with religious controversies; but even in these melancholy circumstances, lady Jane had presence of mind sufficient to baffle all their attempts: she defended the tenets of the Reformation with great learning and eloquence. She also wrote a letter, in the Greek language, to her sister Catherine, exhorting her to maintain, in every circumstance of life, a like steady perseverance. On the morning of her execution, her husband desired permission to see her, but she refused her consent: she feared the tenderness of a parting interview would overcome the fortitude of both, and render them incapable of finishing the period of life with that constancy which was necessary in their melancholy circumstances. "Our separation (said she) will only be for a moment; we shall soon rejoin each other in the regions above, where our affections will be for ever united, and where the storms of adversity, and even death itself, can never afflict us more." She beheld, from the window of her prison, with steadiness and composure, her husband carried to execution, and his headless trunk brought back to the Tower. And being informed that he met death with great tranquillity, she expressed an eagerness to follow him.

It was at first intended to have executed them both on the same scaffold erected on Tower-hill; but the council fearing that the compassion of the people, arising from their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, might excite some dangerous commotion, it was thought proper to alter the resolution, and orders were accordingly issued that lady Jane should be executed within the walls of the Tower. When she entered the scaffold, Sir John Gage, constable of the Tower, begged her to bestow on him some small present, which he might keep in perpetual remembrance of her. She gave him her table-book, wherein she had just written three sentences on seeing her husband's dead body; one in Greek, one in Latin, and the other in English. At the moment of execution, without complaining of any one, she acknowledged that her punishment was just, for having, though contrary to her own inclinations, submitted to become the instrument of the ambition of others. She added, that her example might be of some use to posterity; and teach the world, that without personal guilt, we may be justly punished for circumstances which tend to the prejudice of the state. Thus fell, in the bloom of life, the lady Jane Gray, whose innocence merited a much better fate. She was only in the seventeenth year of her age; but her beauty, spirit, sense, and virtue, did honour to her country; and her happiness, had she been left to the indulgence of her own studious inclinations, would have been more to be envied than that of princes: but the fatal ambition of her family cropt the lovely flower before it was expanded in its full lustre.

The duke of Suffolk was soon after tried and executed. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was also impeached, but owed his deliverance to the amazing spirit and abilities he discovered on his trial. He challenged the court to bring proof of any one overt-act of the treason of which he was indicted; and no positive proof being produced, he was acquitted by his jury. But so great was the power of the judge, and so malignant the spirit of the ministry, that the jury, for daring to obey the dictates of their own consciences, were prosecuted, and severely fined. John Throgmorton experienced the effect which such severe and despotic proceedings produce on the human mind. Though equally innocent, he was condemned on the same proofs which were thought so weak in the case of his brother.

By these perversions of law and justice, the government became every day more odious; and it was thought necessary to disarm the people, to prevent insurrections. In the mean time, the queen summoned a parliament; and Gardiner, who had received vast remittances from the emperor, employed the money in corrupting the members to a degree till that time unprecedented in England. The bishop, as chancellor, opened the session in a speech, in which he maintained the queen's hereditary title to the crown; affirmed she had a right to chuse a husband for herself; observed the good use she had made of that right, by preferring an old ally, sprung from the house of Burgundy; mentioned the posterity of Henry VIII. of whom there were now surviving but the queen and the lady Elizabeth; and added, that in order to prevent the calamities which might result from the claims of different pretenders to the crown, it would be necessary to grant the queen a power of naming her successor; a power, said he, which ought not to be considered as a new thing in England, because it had been formerly bestowed on Henry VIII.

The parliament were sufficiently inclined to gratify the queen in all her reasonable desires: but when the liberty, the independence, and even the very being of the nation, were exposed to such imminent danger, they could not by any means be persuaded to comply. They were no strangers to the inveterate hatred the queen bore to the lady Elizabeth, nor to her strong attachment to the house of Austria. They remembered her bigotry and superstition, which prompted her to prefer the establishment of the Catholic religion to all considerations of justice and national interest. They observed that Gardiner, in his speech, had carefully avoided giving Elizabeth the title of the queen's sister, and thence inferred, that a design was formed of declaring her illegitimate. They apprehended, that Mary, if invested with the power she demanded, would bequeath the crown to her husband, and, by that means, render England a province of the Spanish monarchy. They were the more inclined to entertain these suspicions, when they heard that Philip's descent from the house of Lancaster was carefully traced and explained, and that he was represented as the true and only heir by right of inheritance.

Convinced of their danger, and determined never to part with their independence, the parliament resolved solved not to intrust the queen with the power she demanded. They saw the precipice, and were desirous of keeping at a secure distance from its brink. They could not refuse confirming the articles of the marriage, because they were extremely advantageous to England; but they absolutely refused to agree to any such law as was recommended by the chancellor. They would not even declare it treason to attempt the death of the queen's husband while she was alive; and a bill being brought in for that purpose, it was rejected at its first reading. At the same time, in order to deprive Philip of all hopes of ever being able to exercise any authority in England, they enacted a law, by which it was declared, "That her majesty, as their only queen, should solely, and as sole queen, enjoy the crown and sovereignty of her realms; with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courtesy of the realm, or by any other means."

Nor was the spirit of the parliament, notwithstanding all the corrupt practices of Gardiner, confined to the queen's marriage: they opposed the measures of the court in other instances. Bills were brought in for suppressing the many dangerous and erroneous opinions contained in books published by the reformers; for reviving the statute of the six articles; with those against the Lollards, and those against heresy and erroneous preaching; but they were all thrown out by the Commons. A sufficient proof, that however inclinable the parliament might be to gratify the court in some points, they were yet determined to follow their own judgment in others. Provoked at these repeated oppositions, Mary thought proper to dissolve the parliament.

Philip was not in haste to embark for England; and the queen, consumed by impatience, expected him with a degree of anxiety that affected her health. At length he arrived at Southampton on the nineteenth of July. Philip, on his first landing, drew his sword, and carried it for some time naked in his hand; and when the magistrates presented him with the keys of their town, he received them without speaking a single word. The queen met the prince at Winchester, where the marriage ceremony was performed, with great pomp and splendor, by bishop Gardiner. Philip was not formed to attract the affection of the English: his cold, reserved, imperious air, and the vexatious ceremony, that, in a manner, cut off all access to his person, rendered him obnoxious to the people. Mary, however, loved him, even for the same qualities that acquired him the hatred of others. The only way to Philip's heart was to gratify his ambition.

Gardiner had been some time employed in influencing the elections for members to serve in the ensuing parliament. No endeavours to obtain this necessary acquisition were neglected: bribery, corruption, promises and menaces, were employed by the chancellor's emissaries. By these measures, a parliament was secured, that were ready to signalize their zeal for the Romish church, whenever the court thought it necessary to introduce any bill for that purpose. At their meeting, the king and queen rode together on horseback, in their robes, to the parliament-house, two swords of state and two caps of maintenance being borne before them. The first act of the senate was to secure the admission of cardinal Pole, invested with the dignity of legate; and in order to this, the late act of attainder passed against him was annulled; and the queen, by her prerogative, dispensing with long established statutes, he was empowered to act in his office of legation. On his arrival at London, he exhorted the parliament to be reconciled to the holy see: upon which the two houses expressed their regret at being separated from the Church, and their resolution to annihilate every thing that schism had attempted against it. They requested absolution in the most humble manner. This the cardinal readily granted; and, in the name of the sovereign pontiff, removed all censures. It was with equal surprize and joy that Julius III. received this important intelligence. But the submission would never have been made by the nobility who were in possession of the church-lands; had not measures been prudently taken to assure them that their estates should not be taken from them. The parliament accordingly confirmed their possession; and they, in return, did not hesitate to come into all the measures of the court: they readily sacrificed their liberty, and the exercise of their reason, at the altar of superstitious bigotry: they shewed the utmost indifference with regard to religion, or even the lives of their fellow-subjects; and renewed the old sanguinary laws against heretics which had been abolished in the reign of Edward VI. and once more lighted up the piles for consuming all who thought differently from the Roman church. Such, however, was their rooted aversion to Spain, that though the queen laboured with the utmost assiduity to procure her husband to be declared presumptive heir to the crown, and invested with the administration of public affairs, she failed in both attempts: she could not even prevail upon the parliament to agree to his coronation, nor obtain from the Commons a subsidy for assisting the emperor in his war against France.

Conscious of the general odium under which he laboured, Philip altered his conduct, and endeavoured to obtain the favour of the public by procuring the enlargement of several persons of distinction, who had been confined in consequence of the jealousy or resentment of the court; but nothing was more acceptable to the nation than his protecting the lady Elizabeth from the malice and cruelty of her sister; and obtaining for her the enjoyment of her liberty. He well knew, that if this princeess fell a sacrifice to the malevolent disposition of the queen, Mary Stuart, queen of Scots, and wife to the dauphin of France, was the next in the order of succession, and consequently, that England would be annexed to that crown. To prevent an incident of such importance to his own tranquillity, Philip affected a generosity little consistent with his real character.

A. D. 1555. But even those acts of clemency could not procure him the favour of the Commons; they firmly refused to grant him any power in the administration; and the queen perceiving that it would be in vain to make any farther attempts, dissolved the parliament. A splendid embassy was soon after sent to Rome, to inform his holiness of all that had been transacted in the English parliament; and to make tenders of submission to the holy see in the name of the king, queen, and three estates of England. But before their arrival, Julius III. was dead, and St. Peter's chair filled by Paul IV. a proud, haughty, insolent ecclesiastic: He was so far from receiving the English ambassadors with that kindness they had reason to expect, that he refused to give them audience, because Mary had styled herself queen of Ireland, as well as England; a title which neither herself, nor any of her predecessors, had received from the holy see. In consequence of this, they were obliged to wait till a bull was expedited for investing Mary with that title, and then they were admitted to an audience. The pope appeared astonished when the ambassadors expressed their hopes that he would confirm to the laity the possession of the church-lands. He blamed Pole for exceeding his commission; and wondered how any person could presume to harbour a thought, that he would grant any confirmation to acts in themselves iniquitous and sacrilegious. He even issued a bull, denouncing the severest anathemas upon all who should withhold from the church, or the religious orders, any part of their property. He also demanded Peter-pence, which had been so long abolished. The nobility heard of these determinations of the pontiff without emotion; the thunder of the Vatican had lost its force in England, except among a few enthusiastic bigots who still trembled at the threatenings of the holy father. Among these was the queen herself, who, notwithstanding the measures pursued at the commencement of her reign, thought herself obliged to give up such church-lands as remained in her possession, and to found new monasteries till the treasury was exhausted. It was in vain that the council represented to her the interest of her crown; "I prefer (said she) the salvation of my soul to ten such kingdoms as England."

In the mean time, the ministry was chiefly engaged in consulting the methods proper to be pursued for re-establishing the ancient religion. Cardinal Pole, and bishop Gardiner, were the two churchmen most in favour, and between these a very important question was frequently debated before the queen and council, namely, Whether the laws lately revived against heretics should be executed in their full extent and rigour, or should only be employed to prevent the reformers from making any farther innovations. Pole, sincerely attached to the Catholic faith, and virtuous from principle, was for moderation and indulgence. Gardiner, who had politically complied with all the caprices of Henry VIII. and who would have been equally complaisant to his successor, had he not been driven to extremities, a zealot from interest, indifferent by principle, was for violence and punishment. The legate maintained, that nothing could be more contradictory to the spirit of Christianity than religious persecutions; that while they punish an error as a crime, they overturn at once society and its laws: at the same time, they give the most convincing reason to suspect, that those who employ them are by no means convinced of the truth of the doctrines they are solicitous to establish, because they seem afraid of submitting their cause to be decided by fair and impartial argument. He added, that such treatment could only make hypocrites, or, what is still worse, outrageous fanatics; and that experience had sufficiently proved, that instead of producing uniformity in religion, it usually increases the progress of heresy, by irritating the zeal of sectaries, who gain proselytes by the exemplary patience of their martyred brethren. On the other hand, a prudent indulgence extinguishes the zeal of sects, prevents the spirit of cavilling and revolting; the attachment to any particular tenets gradually decays; the common occupations and pleasures of life succeed to the acrimony of disputation; and the same person who would before have set flames and tortures at defiance, is engaged to change his religion from the smallest prospect of favour and advancement, or even from the frivolous hopes of becoming more fashionable in his principles.

Gardiner opposed these arguments urged by the legate with reasons more adapted to the gloomy, malevolent mind of the queen and her husband. He asserted, that this political conduct had nothing to do with religion. "If the Divinity (said the chancellor) has thought proper to reveal certain principles to mankind, it is ridiculous to suppose that he has not given a criterion by which they may be ascertained; and a prince who knowingly allows these principles to be perverted or adulterated, is infinitely more criminal than if he gave permission to the vending poison, under the form of bread, to his subjects. No human motive can stand in competition with the cause of heaven. The more severe the punishment, the sooner heresy will expire, and the more effectually will the public utility be consulted. Have not even the Protestants themselves made use of the same punishments? Did not Calvin cause Servetus to be burnt at Geneva? And did not Cranmer bring Arians and Anabaptists to the stake? If terror makes hypocrites, children at least, who are brought up in orthodox principles, will not imitate the hypocrisy of their fathers; they will preserve the precious pledge of faith, though obtained, perhaps, by the dissimulation of their parents."

These reasons, however inconclusive in themselves, were adopted by the bigotted Mary; but willing, at the same time, to pay some regard to the counsels of Pole, she ordered him to take upon himself the reformation of the clergy, and charged Gardiner with the work of extirpating the Protestant religion. It was now determined to execute the laws against heresy in their full force; and England was soon filled with scenes of horror, which has ever since rendered the Catholic religion the object of general detestation. We could wish, indeed, for the honour of humanity, that the mantle of oblivion could be drawn over these detestable actions; but the pen of history must not dissemble the excesses and dreadful consequences of bigotted zeal. The horrid scenes which must be displayed furnish an important, though a melancholy, lesson to mankind.

The two first victims of religious fury were Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, and Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's; both eminent for their learning, their piety, and their virtue. But Gardiner's plan was first to attack men of that character; vainly imagining, that terror would force them to submission; and that their example, either of punishment or recantation, would naturally influence the multitude. Rogers had preserved the life of Bourne, the popish preacher at St. Paul's, at the hazard of his own; and therefore deserved some favour at the hands of Gardiner, who was no stranger to that circumstance; but no regard was shewn to this eminent preacher; the dictates of justice and humanity had lost their force. Rogers was even denied the favour of seeing his wife and children, whom he tenderly loved. But this denial could not shake his constancy: the ties of nature gave way to the influence of religion; and he went with cheerfulness to the stake, and perished in the flames with unshaken constancy.

Hooper behaved with all the fortitude of a primitive martyr, and shewed a noble contempt for all the insults he received. He was tried with Rogers in London, but sent down to his own diocese to be executed. This circumstance, which was contrived to strike a greater terror into his flock, was a source of satisfaction to Hooper, who sincerely rejoiced in having an opportunity of giving testimony, by his death, to the doctrine he had formerly inculcated from the pulpit. When he was fastened to the stake, a stool was placed before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it, and which it was still in his power to merit by his recantation. But life, on such conditions, was despised: he ordered it to be removed, and cheerfully prepared himself to suffer the sentence pronounced against him by his enemies. His death was attended with every circumstance that could heighten its severity. The wind, which was very strong, blew the flames of the reeds from his body; the faggots were green, and did not easily take fire; all his lower parts were consumed before his vitals were affected; one arm dropped off, while he continued to beat his breast with the other. He was heard to pray, and exhort the people to adhere to their religion, until his tongue, swollen with the violence of the agony, stopped his speech. He was full three quarters of an hour in torture, but bore the whole with a constancy that was truly astonishing.

About the same time, Mr. Laurence Saunders, minister of Allhallows, Bread-street; and Mr. Rowland Taylor, rector of Hadley, in Suffolk, were delivered over to the secular arm, and sealed the truth of the doctrines they had taught with their blood. Saunders suffered at Coventry, and was also indulged with the offer of a pardon; but he rejected it with disdain, and embraced the stake, crying out, "I salute thee, O cross of Jesus Christ, O life eternal!" Taylor was executed among his ancient friends and parishioners; and repeated, in the midst of the flames, a psalm in English. On which one of the guards struck him on the mouth, and bid him pray in Latin. Another, still more violent, struck him on the head with his halbert, and the blow put a period to his life.

These inhuman executions, merely for the sake of opinion, enflamed the nation, and Gardiner began to be under apprehensions for his safety. Perhaps the dictates of conscience; or the soft whifpers of humanity, might also have some place in causing him to wish he had never engaged as a principal in these barbarous executions. But however that be, he refused to act any longer; and devolved his odious commission on Bonner, bishop of London; a man of the most profligate and abandoned morals; and, at the same time, of so savage and cruel a disposition, that he seemed to delight in the torments of those unfortunate persons whom his iniquitous sentences committed to the flames.

The retreat of Gardiner did not, however, abate the fury of persecution. Human nature appears not, on any occasion, so detestable, and, at the same time, so absurd, as in these religious persecutions, which sink men below infernal spirits in wickedness, and below the beasts in folly. It would be useless to multiply instances of this kind; the savage barbarity on the one hand, and the patient constancy on the other, are similar in all. A few more will, therefore, be abundantly sufficient.

Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, was burnt at Caermarthen. He appealed to cardinal Pole, but it was not regarded, and he received the crown of martyrdom. Ridley, bishop of London, and Latimer, the old bishop of Worcester, were burnt at Oxford. They were both celebrated for their learning and virtue, and both perished in the same flames. They mutually exhorted each other to patience; and, when fastened to the stake, Latimer cried out, "Courage, my brother! we shall this day kindle such a torch in England; as, I trust in God, shall never be extinguished." Thomas Hawkes, when bound to the stake, told his friends, that if he found the torture supportable, he would give them a sign, and failed not to do it. His zeal for the cause in which he suffered so amazingly supported him, that he stretched out his hands, the signal agreed upon, and in that posture expired.

The passion for martyrdom, infused by these examples, communicated itself to the young as well as to the old, and even to women. One of the sex, whom they executed, was pregnant, and near the time of her delivery when she suffered. The excruciating tortures excited the pains of labour, and she was delivered in the midst of the flames. One of the guards, more merciful than the rest, snatched the helpless infant from the fire; but a barbarous magistrate commanded it to be thrown back into the flames, saying, that the offspring of an heretical parent should not be suffered to live.

These unhappy people, though condemned to tortures shocking to humanity, were not always convicted of having inculcated tenets contrary to the established religion: they were taken up merely on suspicion, and condemned on refusing to sign certain articles. Hence they excited the concern and admiration of their own party, and a general hatred against the government. Philip perceived the whole nation was agitated; and, by an artifice suitable to his character, endeavoured to throw the whole odium of these barbarities on the English bishops. He ordered friar Alphons, his confessor, to disclaim these sanguinary proceedings from the pulpit. The ecclesiastic obeyed; and, in a sermon preached before their majesties, he exclaimed against all religious persecution, and accused the bishops of all the barbarities that had been inflicted on the Protestants. Alarmed at this charge, Bonner himself refused to be any longer concerned in such sanguinary proceedings, unless others, as well as himself, were involved in the odium. The fires of persecution ceased for a time, and repeated orders were sent from the council to quicken their diligence. At last the court threw off the cloak of dissimulation, and acted in an open manner. A kind of inquisition was established, by appointing commissioners to take an exact account of all heresies; to punish all neglects of the Catholic worship in churches and chapels; to proceed against the clergy who did not preach the doctrine of the eucharist; to punish every person who did not hear mass, who did not assist at the service of the church, who did not receive the eucharist, or use the holy water. The justices of the peace were ordered to appoint spies over the conduct of the people: to summon the accused, without discovering the accuser, and to put to the torture such obstinate persons who would not confess. Nor did the tyranny of the court terminate here; a proclamation was issued, commanding all who were possessed of heretical books, to burn them without reading or shewing them to others: and declaring that all who refused to pay an implicit obedience to these orders should be deemed rebels, and executed immediately by martial law.

England was now reduced to a more deplorable condition than ever Spain itself, where the inquisition is established with all its horrors. But still the protestants supported their tenets with astonishing resolution, and the doctrines of the reformation increased surprizingly amidst these complicated scenes of horror and distress. The iron rod of tyranny was displayed in vain; every martyrdom was equivalent to a thousand sermons against popery; and the ashes of the sufferer, like seed disseminated in a fertile soil, produced an hundred fold. The protestants were far more numerous at the close, than in the beginning of this bloody reign; though it is computed, that in the space of three years, no less than two hundred and seventy-seven persons were burnt for heresy, among whom were five bishops, twenty-one clergymen, eight gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbandmen, servants, and labourers; fifty-five women and four children.

The execution of archbishop Cranmer, filled up the measure of iniquity in this atrocious reign. He had been long confined in prison, and it was now determined to punish him as a heretic. He was tried before Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, a commissioner from the pope. Dr. Martin and Dr. Godwin, accused him of being twice married, of keeping a wife secretly in the reign of Henry VIII. and openly in the reign of his successor, of publishing books against, and forsaking the doctrines of the Roman church; and of denying the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. He owned the facts, and they cited him to appear before the pope in eight days, though they knew it was impossible, as he was then their prisoner. He was, however, on not appearing, condemned as contumacious. Bonner, bishop of London, and Thirley, bishop of Ely, were sent down to Oxford to degrade him. The former performed his office with his usual insolence, using the most bitter raileries and invectives against the prisoner, during the ceremony, while Thirley melted into tears. The primate's behaviour was uniform and becoming his unfortunate circumstances. He said he was not sorry to be thus cut off with all his pageantry from his relation to the see of Rome; but thought it great injustice to condemn him for not going to that capital, when they kept him close confined in prison. At the same time he denied the pope's authority over him; and appealed from his sentence to a free general council.

Though the queen was satisfied that Cranmer would perish eternally, she was desirous of augmenting the weight of his misfortune, by ruining his honour and consigning his name over to infamy. Persons were accordingly employed to attack him; not by reason and argument, against which they knew he was too well prepared, but by the most artful flattery, insinuation, and address. They displayed before him, in the most fairest point of light, the dignities and honours to which his character still entitled him; if he would merit them by a recantation: they flattered him with long enjoying these powerful friends whom his humanity and beneficence had procured him during the course of his prosperity; and the great advantages that might yet result to society by his labours. These insinuations shook the firmness of the primate, primate, who influenced by that love of life so deeply engraven in the human heart, and terrified at the prospect of those dreadful tortures he was condemned to suffer, permitted, in an unguarded hour, the feelings of nature to over power his resolution; he agreed to sign a paper, acknowledging the doctrines of the papal supremacy, and the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. The queen, whose perfidy was exceeded only by her cruelty, resolved that this recantation should not save his life. She sent orders that he should acknowledge his errors in the church before the whole congregation, and thence be led immediately to execution.

But the malevolence of Mary was for once disappointed. Cranmer had now resumed his proper dignity, had sincerely repented of his weakness and apostacy, and determined, instead of the declaration they expected, to speak the real sentiments of his heart without disguise. He accordingly began his address to the audience with observing, that he was sufficiently acquainted with the obedience he owed to his sovereign, and the laws of his country; but this duty extended no farther than to submit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without resistance, whatever punishment they might inflict upon him; that a superior duty, the duty which he owed his Maker, obliged him to maintain the truth on all occasions, and not to abandon, by a base denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had imparted to mankind; that there was one error in his life, which, above all others, filled him with the most unfeigned sorrow and repentance, the insincere declaration of faith to which he had unhappily been induced to agree, and which nothing but the fear of death could have extorted from him; that he cheerfully embraced the present opportunity of atoning for his crime, by a sincere and open recantation; and was willing to seal with his blood that doctrine which he verily believed to be revealed from heaven; and that as his hand had erred in betraying his heart, it should first be punished, and by a severe, but just sentence, first expiate the guilt of that crime which it had been the instrument of committing.

Exasperated at their disappointment, his enemies dragged him from the church, and conducted him to the stake amidst the shouts and insults of the catholics. But having now collected the whole force and vigour of his mind, he bore their scorn, as well as the torture of his punishment, with surprizing courage: he stretched out his right-hand, and without discovering the least sign of weakness, or even of feeling, held it in the flames till it dropt off. His mind seemed to be wholly possessed with reflecting on his former fault, and he was heard to exclaim several times, "This unworthy hand has offended." Satisfied with that atonement, he re-assumed a wonderful composure and serenity of countenance: and when the fire surrounded his body, he seemed to be entirely insensible of all his outward sufferings, and by the force of hope and christian fortitude, to have raised himself above all bodily sensations, and to triumph over the fury of the flames. Cranmer was a man of the most amiable character; equally distinguished by his piety and learning, and possessed of candour, sincerity, benevolence, and indeed of almost every virtue that could render him the object of public esteem and veneration. His death was lamented by the ingenuous of all parties, and he is considered as the hero of the protestant faith. Cardinal Pole succeeded him in the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury; and sincerely disapproved of the violent measures of the court, but wanted power to oppose its sanguinary proceedings.

It is not at all surprizing that Mary should be guilty of these shocking cruelties, as she was almost destitute of education, extremely bigotted to her own resolution, and of a gloomy, malevolent disposition; but it is astonishing, that, considering the state of the kingdom at that period, when the number of protestants greatly exceeded that of the catholics, she was suffered to survive one moment the commission of such horrid barbarities. It was not, however, long before she felt the effect of the public hatred. The ministry became extremely unpopular; and every thing bore the marks of disgust and aversion. Mary's ill temper was increased by several mortifications. She had flattered herself with an imaginary pregnancy, and when she found her mistake, she fell into a profound melancholy. Philip, disgusted with a wife who was extremely jealous, without being in any respect amiable, made preparations for returning to the continent. The choler which consumed her, she discharged upon the protestants, by daily enforcing the persecutions, and even by expressions of rage against all her subjects, by whom she knew herself to be hated.
